FBIS FOREIGN BROADCAST INFORMATION SERVICE

NOTE

JPRS publications contain information primarily from foreign newspapers, periodicals and books, but also from news agency transmissions and broadcasts. Materials from foreign-language sources are translated; those from English-language sources are transcribed or reprinted, with the original phrasing and other characteristics retained.

Headlines, editorial reports, and material enclosed in brackets [] are supplied by JPRS. Processing indicators such as [Text] or [Excerpt] in the first line of each item, or following the last line of a brief, indicate how the original information was processed. Where no processing indicator is given, the information was summarized or extracted.

Unfamiliar names rendered phonetically or transliterated are enclosed in parentheses. Words or names preceded by a question mark and enclosed in parentheses were not clear in the original but have been supplied as appropriate in context. Other unattributed parenthetical notes within the body of an item originate with the source. Times within items are as given by source.

The contents of this publication in no way represent the policies, views or attitudes of the U.S. Government.

PROCUREMENT OF PUBLICATIONS

JPRS publications may be ordered from the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, Virginia 22161. In ordering, it is recommended that the JPRS number, title, date and author, if applicable, of publication be cited.

Current JPRS publications are announced in Government Reports Announcements issued semi-monthly by the National Technical Information Service, and are listed in the Monthly Catalog of U.S. Government Publications issued by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

CRITICISM OF JERUSALEM'S BEING MADE ISRAEL'S CAPITAL

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 14 Aug 80 p 4

[Article by M. L. Snoussi]

[Text] The Israeli Knesset's passage, Wednesday, 30 July, of the "constitutional law" to make Jerusalem "the eternal and indivisible capital of the Zionist State" is not only a challenge and an act of defiance launched at the Arabs and Moslems throughout the world, but also a breach of international law and an attack on the morale of the United Nations.

Jerusalem has always been the Holy City for all monotheistic religions. It also belongs to all believers, debarring none. It is for this reason that it was considered an international city by both the SDN [League of Nations] during the inter-war years and afterwards by the UNO [United Nations Organization].

If the Moslems and particularly the Arabs have always claimed the right to manage it, it is because for 15 centuries, by their tolerance and their respect for Judaism and Christianity, they have rightly been the sole guarantees of its protection from barbarism. In fact, throughout the 12th Century, during which the crusades laid the city waste, the latter, under Moslem control, continued to enjoy religious peace. No religious monument was destroyed or even defaced.

However, will this be so with such fanatics as Begin, the deputy Guela Cohen, the extreme right Hatehia Movement (revived), the Rabin Kahan gangs, the members of the Ghoush Emounim, and even Labor Party members, who have voted for this law? Didn't the above, despite UN resolutions, back in 1967 initiate a Jerusalem disfiguration action by so-called archeological excavations and the destruction of numerous districts, in order to wipe out forever this city's religious and historical character? Didn't they also support the attempt made in August 1967 to burn down the most prestigious Mosque: Al Aqsa?

Once again this just goes to prove that Zionism is an ideology, one and indivisible, with the same objective, namely, to establish an empire whose capital, for the time being, would be Jerusalem and finally, Rome. The only difference between the Likoud and the Labor Party members, regardless of any other trend of opinion, is in fact merely a subtle nuance in tactics.

A strange statement of fact: Didn't the advocate of Zionism quite simply say "The day we take over Jerusalem...I would like to destroy everything that is not sacred to the Jews and I would burn down every historical monument." However, only one single voice in Israel saw in this vote a meaningless policy with very serious consequences. In fact, only the Avneri delegate, from the Shelli left, had the courage, during the discussion of this law, to state that "This is a declaration of war against the Moslem world."

Indeed, the Arabs and Moslems will lose no time in firing back a stinging reply to this new challenge, nor, this time, recoil before any obstacles or hesitate to use every means possible, for, as President Bourguiba never ceased to repeat, should the Zionists get to the top, that their overbearing pride and their stubbornness will lead to nothing save their own undoing, since the Arabs have both men and time at their disposal. And if Sadat is willing to take one slap in the face after the other from Begin, this will not be the case for all the Arabs.

On the other hand, this vote is not only a declaration of war on the Moslems, but also on the Christians. And now is the time to resort to their influence with the Pope and with Europe in this matter, for Christian monuments are also in danger.

RETALIATION AGAINST CAMP DAVID THREATENED

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 21 Jun 80 p 13

[Interview with Majid Abu Sharar, Member of Central Committee of Fatah, by Kamil Fa'ur, in Beirut; date not given]

> [Text] Majid Abu Sharar Tells AL-WATAN, "We Will Break Legs of Those Who Lean Towards Camp David; 10 Bitter Palestinian Days Revitalized Fatah; al-Shak'ah and Khalaf Are Two Symbols of the Struggle of Our People in the Country; the Soviet Union Is Our Ally and the United States Is Our Nation's Arch Enemy; Supreme Coordination Committee Between the Palestinian Revolution and Iran."

Brother Majid Abu Sharar, former secretary of the Revolutionary Council of the Fatah Movement and present member of Fatah's Central Committee thinks that the fourth conference, which was recently held by Fatah, was a significant turning point. The principal thing [in that conference] is the fact that Fatah affirmed its political program which declares that a democratic Palestinian state in Palestine is the ultimate goal, and that a national authority is an interim goal. Until these goals are achieved, the Palestinian rifle must continue to be on the ready. Camp David means the betrayal of the Palestinian question. Going on record with that position was not enough for Fatah; it decided to confront those who have been thinking about veering towards Camp David. "We will break their legs!" This is what Abu Sharar said. Accordingly, we must open the Arab fronts towards Palestine. First of all, the Jordanian front must be restored in accordance with the resolutions Fatah adopted in its conference.

Abu Sharar added, "The United States and Europe are thinking of oil first. Fatah has the match that could set off a total explosion of U.S. interests in the area." The interview that Abu Sharar had with AL-WATAN follows:

[Question] Can you tell us how the makeup of the new Central Committee is viewed in Fatah, and if there is any truth to accounts that there is a Right, a Left and a Center in that committee?

[Answer] The fourth general conference of the movement took place after an absence of about 9 years. During this period three general conferences were to have been convened. Hence comes the special significance of this conference. It constitutes a courageous step on the road of developing the movement and, consequently, developing the Palestinian revolution and its capabilities.

To face in 10 days what has been accumulating over a period of 9 years is difficult and complex, but it is possible. This is just what happened in our conference. We discovered the moment we convened the conference that we had a mountain of problems.

We were being called upon to deal with these problems and not to ignore, not even for one instant, an important and a major fact. That fact is that we have withstood all the conspiracies which had sought to bring an end to the revolution during the past few years. We are still carrying the gun; we are still fighting; we are still realizing for the people and for the Palestinian Revolution a new political gain or a new diplomatic gain every day. Our gains have been equal to or slightly greater than our losses. Based on the principle that the revolution is still alive, is still capable of surviving and is still capable of living and developing, we faced this mountain of our problems. The leadership of the movement faced a sweeping flood of critical remarks. People were questioned rigorously, but responsibly. The senior staff and the junior staff in the conferences proved that cruel criticism was not motivated by a desire to hurt others as much as by a desire to bring about development.

Ten Bitter Days

These were 10 long days; they were bitter and cruel, but they were truly Palestinian. It was the Palestinian will, the will of the fighter, the will of the peasant who is clinging to his land in his homeland, Palestine, the will of the farmer in the ravaged plantations of Ghaza, the will to live in Bassam al-Shak'ah, in Karim Khalaf, the will of Kamal 'Adwan and Kamal Nasir--it was this will that prevailed throughout the 10 Palestinian days which we experienced during the Fatah Conference. We interwove our pain and our suffering with our ambitions, and we came out with bylaws that are based on respect for democratic life within the movement, on centralized democracy and on setting up the organization as the backbone for domestic life. We also established our political program which rejected the [principle of] settlement because the Fatah Palestinian will at the conference considered a settlement at this stage to be in line with the Camp David course all the way. We also defined our strategic goal, and we did not run away from writing down our interim goal--I mean the interim programs of the PLO which do not conflict with our strategic alliance with the Soviet Union. We confirmed the fact that the United States is the country that heads the list of enemies of our nation and our people. We confirmed the nature of the relationship with the masses, and we considered it to be the foundation. [We established] that relationships with regimes must serve relationships with the masses and not vice versa. We confirmed our view towards Jordan which must be restored as the most important political, military and media base for the Palestinian Revolution.

This is what was achieved in our conference. At the end of the conference a new central committee was elected, and it was charged with putting the bylaws into practice, protecting the course and unity of the movement and translating the political program into obvious and distinct political practice. The Central Committee is an expression of the will of Fatah's infrastructure, which is basically a national liberation movement. All ideas in that movement coexist on a common ground of commitment to principles, goals, methods and the political program. From now on this will be the standard. It is on this basis that people will be called to account and evaluations made. But as far as talking about a Right and a Left in the movement, these are ambiguous expressions that have various political implications. It is true that within any national liberation movement there is a trend that is always striving for the development of the liberation movement and for pushing it towards democratic life and towards progress on the road to victory; [and it is also true] that there is always a trend that fears democracy and fears pushing the movement towards progress. But in the end we find that the logic of life and the product of daily victories do push a movement forward, and this is exactly what happened in our recent conference. It is a fundamental [requirement] that we be patriotic and democratic, and that we consider our national question to be a fundamental question and that we consider democratic life to be [the ingredient] which protects the revolution and the continuation of the struggle that is continuously pushing the revolution into positions that are more progressive and leading to achieving the goals of the revolution.

The Mandatory Powers of the Revolutionary Council

[Question] In your capacity as a former member of Fatah's Revolutionary Council and as secretary of that council, will you define for us that council's mandatory powers?

[Answer] We now have a revolutionary council that is fundamentally different from the former council. The representative power of the new council is greater than that of the previous council. The number of members in the new council rose to about 75, whereas in the past there were about 43 members. Among the members of the new council are 40 members who are elected by secret ballot from the general assembly; 15 members, who are members of the Central Committee; and 20 members who are elected members of the Revolutionary Council. Our bylaws stipulated that in the absence of the general assembly, the Revolutionary Council was to be considered the highest authority to monitor, to audit, to make decisions and to form monitoring and follow-up committees. This means that we now have a higher authority that can reckon with the daily leadership, that is, the Central Committee, on a permanent basis. This is a significant achievement that we were able to realize in our fourth conference.

[Question] How is the decision made to convene the Revolutionary Council?

[Answer] There is a special internal rule that determines the council's meetings and the method of conducting business in the council. This is an internal, secret rule.

The Barrel of Oil and the Match

[Question] Some Zionist officials are attributing the upheaval in occupied Arab territory to three factors: first, the presence of the PLO in Lebanon; second, the new European position on the Palestinian question; and third, the U.S. position of having a partial understanding of this question. My question is this: how do you evaluate the European and American positions in their current and probable forms?

[Answer] The principal reason for the uprising in our occupied homeland is the presence of the occupation. Wherever there is occupation, there is must be resistance. This is what is happening concerning our Palestinian people who are well-versed in struggle and who have a long history of fighting British colonialism and the Zionist colonialism that ensued. Our people will continue to struggle until we ralize the creation of our Palestinian, democratic state. Our Palestinian, democratic state will not only bring to an end the problem of Palestinian banishment and homelessness, it will also end the pain of the Jew who is torn between his loyalty to the land of his birth where he had lived and his loyalty to the Zionist movement which treats him as though he were a commodity to be used for establishing a base on Palestinian territory to protect the interests of imperialism. Regarding how we evaluate the Arab posture vis-a-vis Europe and the United States, [let me say this]: the United States and Europe look upon the Middle East area through their own interests in the area, and especially their oil interests. The view which the United States and Europe have of Israel is governed by the fact that the Zionist entity constitutes an advanced base for the protection of imperialist interests in the area. As long as these interests are secure and safe and as long as the Zionist entity is capable of protecting these interests, we must not wait, not for one instant, for any change in U.S. and European policy vis-a-vis the Palestinian question and the problem of the Middle East. Those who believe otherwise are the servants and the clients of imperialism. Accordingly, we can also understand the reason for this unending attack on the Palestinian Revolution ever since its birth. The revolution is fighting over an ocean of oil which is being plundered by imperialism with the direct protection of Israel. In the final analysis, the Palestinian Revolution will either be slaughtered and defeated at the gates of the oil wells or it will create the circumstances that will enable the Arab nation to liberate its oil, defeat imperialism and do away with the justification for the survival and the existence of Israel as a guardian of imperialist interests in the area.

This explains why we are always being subjected to unlimited pressures from Arab reactionaries who give us crumbs with one hand and hold a gun to our hearts with the other hand. It is Arab reactionaries who have been bent on taming the revolution and turning it from a power that threatens imperialism and its interests into a tame revolution that constitutes no threat to imperialism and its interests. This is the essence of the struggle in the area where reactionaries followed by imperialism and by Israel have failed. They will also fail in the future [in their efforts] to tame the revolution and to bridle the capabilities of its surge to the farthest limits.

U.S. policy and European policy then are interested in the barrel of oil and the match. As long as the barrel of oil is flowing peacefully to the United States and to Europe, this nation will remain deprived of its will; its resources will be plundered; and it will remain shackled in backwardness, oppression and ignorance. Accordingly, Israel will remain strong and contentious. However, whenever the match is brought close to the opening of the oil barrel, the matter will certainly be different. This is a question that may not be discussed in detail.

Those who are counting on the development of U.S. and European policy in the context of current circumstances are simply steering themselves towards Camp David with either good or bad intentions. We will not [join Camp David]! The political program of the Fatah Movement demands that we break the legs of those who steer themselves towards Camp David. [This is our right] just as it is our right to breathe. The political program of the Fatah Movement has established models for proper and clear solutions for confronting all the treachery that is contained in the policy of the United States and Europe. The only thing we have to do is turn these models into practical plans to protect our revolution and guarantee its survival.

Defiance and Resistance

[Question] Has the time come for the Defiance, Resistance and Opposition Front to assume an official Arab critical posture on Camp David? How do you view this problem and are there alternatives which you are pointing out?

[Answer] The Defiance and Resistance Front still constitutes the better framework, but not the ideal one for confronting Camp David. This is because it is still a weak and a tenuous framework. We, the Palestinians, must strive before others to develop this framework so we can propose alternative plans to Camp David on a foundation of inevitable change in the Arab political map. Without this political change, which we should not discuss now in detail, we will remain prisoners of our impotence to confront the Camp David process. We must finally get out of the cycle of reaction and enter into that of taking action. I believe that our fourth conference has taken us out of the cycle of reaction and into that of taking action.

Al-Shak'ah Is a Symbol of Struggle

[Question] The official media in Jordan provided impressive coverage to Brother Bassam al-Shak'ah. What does this mean to you from your perspective on the uprising inside the country and on the political consequences in general of that uprising?

[Answer] It is natural for the Jordanian official media to provide strong coverage to Bassam al-Shak'ah who today represents one of the most prominent symbols of struggle, not only in the struggle of our Palestinian People, but also in the struggle of nations in the world that aspire to independence and liberation. Didn't Bassam al-Shak'ah say, "When they blew up my legs, they wanted to keep me away from the land, but I suddenly became closer to the land without my legs?" Why did they [try to] blow up Bassam al-Shak'ah? They [tried to] blow up Bassam al-Shak'ah because he is a Palestinian Arab who has been struggling daily against the occupation and under the slogan that the PLO is the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. They [tried to] blow up Bassam al-Shak'ah and Karim Khalaf because they are two Palestinian symbols fighting for national Palestinian independence against Zionist occupation, the Arab mandate and all attempts to obliterate the Palestinian national personality. Bassam al-Shak'ah has struggled for over 20 years just as every Palestinian fighter who lived in the West Bank has. When the Zionist occupation came, he continued to resist for 13 years so as to achieve Palestinian national independence. I understand, just as Bassam al-Shak'ah, Karim Khalaf and every Palestinian fighter and warrior do, the meaning of resisting occupation and the meaning of Palestinian national independence.

Lebanese National Conciliation

[Question] We would like to shift to the Lebanese scene. There is now the question of the resignation of the government of Dr Salim al-Huss and the formation of a new government. Do you think it is necessary to form a national coalition government that would incorporate the basic political influential factors on the Lebanese scene?

[Answer] It is known that we are pursuing a clear policy vis-a-vis the Lebanese scene. This policy is based on the foundation of a tireless and a sincere effort to create conditions that would bring about the security, the unity, the safety and the Arab character of Lebanon. We are [also] reserving our right to take action on the Lebanese scene in accordance with the agreements that we have with the Lebanese government. We also affirm the fact that we refuse to give up any one of those rights or to accept settlement not only in Lebanon, but also anywhere else outside Palestine. The problem of forming a government is purely a Lebanese matter wherein we are governed by the view of our strategic ally in Lebanon. I am referring to the Lebanese National, Progressive and Pan-Arab Movement which has already presented its view of national conciliation. We had supported this view at the time. President Sarkis had also presented his view of the conciliation, and we had supported it then. Any loyal, patriotic Palestinian will have to promote this conciliation so that Lebanon can regain its vigor and its health.

In the Same Foxhole

[Question] The second matter that is being raised quite passionately now on the scene is that of the future of relations between the PLO and the Lebanese National Movement in its new structure. Another problem is that of the future of relations with the Amal Organization. How do you view all this?

[Answer] We consider the opinion expressed by the National Movement in any form it sees fit to organize its matters and its affairs inside the Lebanese arena to be a matter that we support, encourage and try to make successful. We are in the same foxhole with the National Movement, and we will continue to be. With regard to the future of relations with the Amal Movement, [it is our opinion] that Amal has no alternative but to become an inseparable part of the National Movement. It would accordingly be represented in the Central Political Council of the National and Progressive Movement. We will try to achieve this goal because the fact that Amal is still outside this framework is creating problems that we do not need. Our national arena must definitely not be subjected to disorder or to weakness; we must rather always strive to strengthen and fortify it.

With Syria With No Reservations

[Question] Is It true that the Syrian authorities have arrested Palestinians who are accused of assisting the Moslem Brotherhood? By the way, what is your position with regard to the activities of the Moslem Brotherhood in Syria?

[Answer] I do not know of any Palestinians who were arrested for helping the Moslem Brothers in Syria. This is a question that should basically be addressed to our brothers in Syria. But regarding my position on the activities of the Moslem Brotherhood in Syria, [let me say that] on the basis of the fact that what is happening in Syria is an internal matter that interests our brothers in Syria only, we consider any action taken against Syria at this time when Syria is opposing Camp David and proclaiming a clear position rejecting Camp David and any other settlement based on the Camp David Accords [to be objectionable], whether it be taken by the Moslem Brothers or by others. The purpose of this position is to weaken the Syrian national position and to push Syria in the direction of submitting to the conditions of Camp David. We support without reservations a Syria which is opposed to Camp David. We support without reservations a Syria which is opposed to the United States and to the conspiracies of reactionaries. Our stance stems from a Palestinian, fighting, nationalist position. We must work to develop this Syrian position and to push Syria towards taking positions that are more serious and more stern against Camp David, against the United States and against reactionaries. Syria's defiance of Camp David has had positive effects on the Palestinian scene and is hardening the Palestinian national position. The fact that Syria is subject to extortion by the United Staes and by Israel does also leave negative ideas on the Palestinian scene. Hence we are advocating the development of cooperation and coordination between the Syrians, the Palestinians and the Lebanese National and Progressive Movement so that a strong front can be created to defy Camp David and the United States.

A coordination Committee with Iran

[Question] The question that remains to be asked is whether or not you have noticed any coolness in Palestinian-Iranian relations. How strong are these relations and what is their future?

[Answer] Palestinian-Iranian relations are controlled by absolute hostility to U.S. imperialism and to Zionism. We were in agreement with the Iranian Revolution before its success over the slogan of hostility to imperialism and over the slogan of liberating Palestine. Accordingly, Palestinian-Iranian relations are strategic relations which neither party can renounce or escape. Iranians are committed to their hostility to imperialism and to liberating Palestine; and the Palestinians are committed to their hostility to imperialism and to liberating Palestine. Interventions have taken place here and there and especially in the gulf to undermine this relationship or to portray it as a cool relationship. Let me affirm here that we did discuss this point at great length in our fourth conference, and we did establish that the Iranian Revolution was a strategic ally of the Palestinian Revolution and the Palestinian people.

We cannot get the better of any tactical alliance here and there. This alliance is rather a strategic one. The future of Palestinian-Iranian relations is one that must experience more cooperation and coordination in the context of practical steps. In our conference we advocated that these steps be taken and confirmed. Tjere can be no doubt that the nature of the struggle in the area and the nature of the dangers that are facing force expedition in taking such steps. Among these steps is the establishment of a supreme coordination committee between the Palestinian Revolution and the Iranian Revolution.

TUNISIAN-SAUDI ARABIAN CULTURAL COOPERATION

[Text] Yesterday afternoon, Mr Fouad Mebazaa, minister of information and cultural affairs, welcomed Dr Amri Ibn Bakir, rector of the Faculty of Economy and Administration at the King "Abdelaziz" University in Jeddah. The conversation dealt with the means to be brought into play in order to strengthen the cooperation between the two countries in matters of culture and information as also in the assistance which Saudi Arabia can lend to Tunisia in its effort to recover its visible Islamic traces.

On this occasion, Mr Ibn Bakir gave the minister a general idea of the book which he is writing and which has some bearing on President Habib Bourguiba's politics.

Present at this interview were Messrs Robeh Dkhill, the minister's principal private secretary, and Kacem Bousnina, Tunisian Ambassador at Jeddah.

BRIEFS

ARAB-ISLAMIC MEETING--Habib Chatty, secretary general of the Islamic Congress Organization, and the Islamic delegations accompanying him will be involved in intensive activity and important meetings beginning next week in Tunis. We note in particular the talks that will take place between the Islamic Congress Organization and the League of Arab States beginning this Tuesday, 19 August, for the purpose of establishing concerted cooperation based on clear principles making it possible to give both organizations new stimulus and to stand up effectively against every kind of challenge. We recall that during a recent visit to Tunisia, the secretary general of the Islamic Congress Organization was received by President Bourguiba and the prime minister, both of whom expressed satisfaction at this action aimed at strengthening Arab-Islamic solidarity. ISLAMIC WORLD LEAGUE CONTRIBUTES FUNDS FOR WEST BANK MOSQUES

Amman AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 14 Jul 80 p 3

[Article: "Arrangements Discussed for Holding Third Conference of Ministers of Religious Trusts in Amman; Half Million Riyals From Islamic World League To Support West Bank Mosques"]

[Text] Amman--Mr Kamal al-Sharif, minister of religious affairs and holy places, who is a member of the constituent assembly of the Islamic World League, discussed preparations for the third conference of religious trusts and Islamic affairs ministers in his meeting with Muhammad Safwat al-Saqqa Amini, assistant secretary general of the Islamic World League. The conference is to be held in Amman early next year.

Mr al-Sharif reveiwed preparations made by the ministry of religious trusts for this conference, as Jordan will be the host nation for this conference.

He also presented some suggestions pertaining to coordination between his ministry and the office of the secretary general of the conference of religious trusts ministers. There was agreement in viewpoints on the basic problems discussed. Those who attended the meeting agreed upon the necessity of making arrangements to convene the followup committee (created by the conference) in Mecca during the coming pilgrimage season.

Those who attended the meeting listened with interest to the detailed statement delivered by Prof Hassan Fatin Tahbub about current conditions in occupied Palestine, especially Jerusalem, and the encroachment upon Islamic holy places by the brutal Zionist enemy. The statement dealt with the prevailing situation among Muslim citizens, who are being subjected to various types of injustice, intimidation and pressure designed to drive them out and weaken them, in preparation for making the entire territory Jewish. It also reviewed repair and support requirements for the mosques and Islamic institutions on the West Bank, and the region's need for missionaries and spiritual advisers to stimulate and spread the call to Islam.

The Islamic World League delegation was favorably disposed toward fulfillment of these requirements, and requested a detailed report concerning these needs. Consequently it will be possible to study them and make effective decisions about them in accordance with the League's capabilities. Muhammad Safwat al-Saqqa Amini presented a check for a half million Saudi riyals to Kamal al-Sharif as an initial installment to benefit the mosques on the West Bank. Later on, the ministry is to provide the office of the league's secretary general with reports on this sum, and a list of the mosques which have benefitted from this donation.

At the end of the session those who attended the meeting agreed on the necessity of continued coordination. They also agreed to meet whenever necessary.

SEVERAL PORTFOLIOS BROUGHT UNDER KARMAL'S DIRECT CONTROL

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 22 Jul 80 pp 3, 6

[Article: "Russians Decide to Help Babrak Karmal, Khalq; Several Ministries Brought Under Karmal's Control; Rivals in Cabinet Lose Power"]

[Text] Kabul, 21 July--In order to strengthen Babrak Karmal's position, the administrative structure is being overhauled. Radio Kabul announced establishment of a presidential department to oversee all ministries. The office of the prime minister and some important departments in the ministry of the interior come under this new department. This means that Karmal's position has been made very strong. Strangely enough, only a short time ago there were rumors of his illness and even death.

The BBC reports from Delhi that the government has decreased the authority of Mohammad Gulabzoi, minister of the interior and chief rival of Karmal. In addition to this, a special department is being set up to coordinate all Islamic affairs. This step is meant to give a pro-Islamic facade to the government. All this indicates that the Soviets have decided to support Babrak Karmal and the Khalq party. The government is also helping people going on pilgrimage to Mecca. The deputy prime minister, Asadullah Sarwari, left to visit Moscow last month. According to some Western reporters, Karmal had insisted on Sarwari's leaving the country. It should be remembered that Sarwari was regarded as one of Karmal's rivals.

MUJAHIDIN KILL MINISTER OF EDUCATION, TWO DEPUTY MINISTERS

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 24 Jul 80 pp 1, 6

[Article: "Mujahidin Shoot Three Ministers of Karmal Government; Several Ministers Disappear Mysteriously; Turmoil in the Capital; Twelve People Sentenced, Two to Death, for Demonstrating Against Russians"]

[Text] Tehran, 23 July--The Mujahidin killed Dr Anahita Ratebzad, the minister of education; Wali Safeer, deputy minister of education; and the deputy minister of the interior; in Kabul.

According to AFP, an Indian technical adviser arriving in Delhi said that the deputy minister of the interior was shot as he was sitting in his car in a business district. A passing taxi showered bullets on the car of the deputy minister whose name is not known. Another tourist arriving in Delhi from Kabul said that the minister of education, Anahita Ratebzad, was also killed. This source did not reveal the conditions under which this lady minister met her death.

Quoting Radio Kabul, the BBC reports that the deputy minister of education, Mohammed Wali Safeer, has been buried. The radio did not reveal the details of the deputy minister's death. However, according to other sources, he was killed by the Mujahidin near Kabul. Government sources in Kabul did not verify these reports.

According to other reports, several ministers in Karmal's cabinet have disappeared mysteriously.

The ASSOCIATED PRESS says that according to reliable sources, a so-called revolutionary court in Kabul has sentenced 12 people for violent demonstrations against the Russian soldiers. Two of these were sentenced to death.

Military sources in the U.S. say that most of the weapons in the hands of the Mujahidin were provided by deserters from Karmal's army. These bring weapons and ammunition with them. In addition, the Mujahidin get weapons in their surprise attacks on the government army.

MANY KILLED IN CLASHES BETWEEN KHALQ AND PARCHAM FACTIONS

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 26 Jul 80 pp 1, 6

[Article: "23 Soldiers Killed in Bloody Clash Between Khalq and Parcham Factions in Afghan Army; Khalq Soldiers Refuse to Recognize Parcham Commander in Ghazni; Both Factions Fighting Hard in Kabul; Many Government Officials and Senior Officers Arrested or Killed"]

[Text] Kabul, 25 July (APP/PPI)--Khalq and Parcham factions in the Afghan army have started to clash with each other. A few days ago, 23 soldiers were killed in two skirmishes. Many more soldiers were seriously wounded. In Ghazni, Khalq soldiers in the government army refused to recognize a commander belonging to the Parcham faction. Many government officials and senior officers around the country have been arrested. It is reported that many of these have been killed, and that tension in Kabul is coming to a head. Armed men are stationed all over the city.

In Lowgar Province, a large number of Afghan Mujahidin have been fighting the Russians and the Afghan army. In the meantime, the rift between the ruling party's Khalq and Parcham factions has spread to the army resulting in big clashes among Afghan soldiers. Twenty three Afghan soldiers have been killed in these clashes. Russian MIG jets and helicopters are flying over Lowgar Province and Ghazni in addition to Kabul. News about fierce battles between the Mujahidin and the government forces at (Kanjak), 40 miles from Kabul has been received. It is rumored in Kabul that many government officials have been killed. Members of the Khalq and Parcham faction are attacking each other at night. A traveler arriving in New Delhi from Kabul reports that many high ranking officers and officials have been arrested there, while other Afghan officers have been either killed or wounded by the Mujahidin in many clashes.

According to a report, Kabul radio announced the names of persons sentenced to death. All of these are senior officers connected with the Khalq faction. They are being kept in Pul Charkhi jail. Mohammed Katawazi, minister of information in the cabinet of deposed president Hafizullah Amin, is among those arrested. Kabul radio also announced that President Babrak Karmal will review the sentences passed on these people. According to reports from Kabul, the purpose of this radio announcement was to further disrupt the Khalq faction.

Among important changes made by the government was the appointment of a Parcham commander in place of a Khalq commander of an army garrison in Ghazni. The officers of this garrison refused to cooperate with the new commander, since they are members of the Khalq faction. The new commander had to be recalled. According to other information from Kabul, Russian soldiers have been stationed outside the garrison to thwart attempts by Afghan soldiers to join the Mujahidin. Also, students who had staged a boycott, but returned for examinations held from 15 to 19 July, have been arrested. Information has also been received about (cancellation?) of the scholarships of 42 female students.

Tourists arriving from Kabul say that due to the heavy military traffic in Kabul, civilians have a hard time going out. One tourist reports Babrak Karmal's first public appearance in a long time.

According to the Voice of America, the number of soldiers guarding important buildings in Kabul has been doubled.

Last week, there was a marked increase in the number of helicopters and fighter planes circling over Kabul. The puppet government headed by Karmal was worried about the Mujahidin staging an attack on Kabul to coincide with the opening ceremonies of the Olympics [in Moscow].

It is reported that the Russians are using a new kind of armored vehicle in Afghanistan. These vehicles are like tanks up front, while the rear part is used for transporting soldiers.

AFP reports that according to Delhi sources, the Mujahidin have asked Afghan businessmen to close their shops on 27 and 28 July in protest against the Russian occupation. The news agency says that according to some tourists, the situation in Kabul is very serious now.

The Associated Press reports that the Parcham and Khalq factions of the ruling party are drifting apart. Their rift has had its impact on Afghan soldiers. Twenty three Afghan soldiers have been killed in two clashes resulting from this rift. One of these clashes took place in Kabul's Karga military depot. This clash resulted in the death of 13 soldiers. Another 25 soldiers were wounded. The second clash took place on 24 July at the Pul Charakhi military camp. Eight soldiers belonging to the Parcham faction [and two to Khalq] were killed and many more were wounded. The Russian army had to interfere to stop these clashes. In order to do that, two Russian tanks and armored vehicles were stationed at the site of the clashes.

According to the latest news, Afghanistan's deputy minister of education, Mohammed Yusuf, who was killed by the Mujahidin on 21 July, was buried in the government cemetary in Kabul. According to some diplomatic sources in Delhi, a large number of doctors, lawyers, and teachers have left Afghanistan along with their families. According to this source, these people are paying a steep price for their passports. They are leaving Afghanistan for fear of strict measures by the government against them, because they have not whole-heartedly supported the Karmal government.

FORMER AFGHAN KING URGES DIPLOMACY TO SOLVE AFGHAN CRISIS

Karachi JASARAT in Urdu 2 Aug 80 pp 1, 6

[Article: "Many Tribes Have Written to Me; Soviets Requested Me to Take Over After Being Disappointed With Hafizullah Amin; Diplomacy, Not War, Needed to Solve Afghan Crisis; Interview With the Former Afghan King"]

[Text] London, 1 August--The former ruler of Afghanistan, Shah Zahir Shah, would consider returning to his lost throne, but is not ready to take any action against Russia. He hopes that the Western powers will force the Russians out of Afghanistan. Then, by "universal demand," he would be invited to retake the throne of Afghanistan.

According to the French news agency GAMMA, the deposed ruler is still following his old practice of keeping both Russia and America happy. He says he was asked by the Soviets to take over Afghanistan in September 1979, when the Soviets were disillusioned with Hafizullah Amin. The former king refused on the grounds that he would be treated in the same way as Noor Mohammad Taraki and Hafizullah Amin.

Shah Zahir Shah, who is living in Rome, said in an interview with the French reporter Olivier Farran that a large number of Afghan people want him to return to power and that he has received many requests saying: "Those of us who are fighting for freedom believe that you are the only leader who can unite the Afghan nation under the one flag of Islam. Therefore, please rise and help us fight the anti-Islamic forces." According to Zahir Shah, these petitions are being sent by the chiefs of different tribes.

Zahir Shah said that he believes that the problem of Afghanistan cannot be solved by war; it needs diplomatic effort. He disclosed that China had promised to provide arms to the Mujahidin, but did not fulfill its promise. He wants the Western powers to force Russia out of Afghanistan. Answering a question about the reinstatement of monarchy in Afghanistan, he said that the situation has changed so much. Unarmed Afgan youths are fighting Russian tanks and dying bravely. The deposed ruler said that he did not want to discuss his return or becoming a king again, since it might cause more bloodshed, and he did not want the brave youth of Afghanistan to shed even one additional drop of blood.

Zahir Shah became king of Afghanistan on 18 April 1933 when his father, Gen Nadir Khan, was murdered. He was only 19 years old then, and for the next 20 years he followed the policy of not accepting any help from outside, to avoid his country becoming an arena for international conflict. However, when he appointed his brother-in-law Mohammad Daud Khan as prime minister in 1953, this policy was changed. Daud Khan was also minister of defense and internal affairs. Thus, all power was transferred to him, and he asked both Russia and America for financial and military help. The U.S. refused to give military aid, and this paved the way for the Russian intrusion into Afghanistan in 1955.

This started the flow of Russian military, technical, and financial aid. At this point, the U.S. also offered help, and, since then, Afghanistan became divided into two spheres of influence. Russian aid dominated the northern part, and the southern part was under the influence of the U.S. When the Afghan people objected to all of this, Zahir Shah fired Daud Shah as prime minister. Zahir Shah continued improving relations with the U.S., and, to pacify the people, took some steps to establish a democratic system. One [concession] was that no person related to the royal family could become a minister. However, all these steps could not satisfy the popular demands. Daud Khan took advantage of the resulting period of uncertainty, and, while Zahir Shah was in Italy, took control of Afghanistan on 17 July 1973. Zahir Shah has been living as an exile in Italy since then.

HIZB-E ISLAMI REPORTS HEAVY CASUALTIES ON RUSSIANS, KABUL GOVERNMENT

Islamabad THE MUSLIM in English 1 Sep 80 p 8

[Text]

PESHAWAR, Aug. 31: The Mujahideen of Hizbe Islami attacked Jalalabad Air Base recently and shot down three helicopters, destroyed five tanks and killed 85 Russian soldiers says a Press release of Hizbe Islami, Afghanistan.

Heavy fighting was also reported between the Muslim fighters and invading Russian forces in Pusaraka area in Jalalabad. In this fighting, several Afghan tanks were reported to have been destroyed and 60 Russians were killed. Report from Laghman province says that Mujahideen also attacked a garrison in that area and after a few hours of heavy fighting, seven tanks were destroyed and three Russian soldiers were killed. Three Russian trucks, full of weapons and ammunition were also seized by Mujahideen while three other trucks were destroyed. A Russian convoy was also attacked by Mujahideen in Surkhakan area.

Reports from Kunnar province say that Mujahideen attacked Russian forces in Sratak area of Asmar district, about 30 km to the east of Chagha Sarai, centre of Kunnar. In this clash, which lasted for three days, 35-Afghan soldiers were killed. Sizeable weapons and ammunition was also captured by Mujahideen. The road between Chahga Sarai and Bacikoot was blocked by the Mujahideen. As the Russian forces tried to pass the blocked road, they were attacked violently by the faithful Mujahideen as a result, some Russians were killed.

According to the Press release, fighting is continuing in the suburbs of Kabul. Recently Shah Rahman, a government spy alongwith two other Parchamis was killed by the Mujahideen in Bagrami district, 20 km to the east of Kabul.

On Aug. 21, the house of Gen. Mohammad Hussain, the father of Babrak Karmel, was burnt by brave Mujahideen in Shiwaki district and at the same time, the Shiwak High School for Girls which was the centre of Communists was also destroyed. On Aug. 22, Ghulam Hazrat son of Sikander, the Deputy Minister of Public Affairs, was attacked and wounded seriously.

The Russian tanks and armoured cars attacked the Mujahideen killing the field Commander of Mujahideen. His body was taken away by Mujahideen. Seven children and women were killed while five other were wounded seriously during the raid.

JAIL ATTACKED: Meanwhile, Islamic Alliance for Liberation of Afghanistan has issued the following Press release. According to a report from Kunduz, Mujahideen attacked on Kunduz Central Jail and released a number of prisoners including Mujahideen in this attack, the third on the same jail. One tank was destroyed. In Kunduz City, Mujahideen killed 12 Parchamis and captured some weapons and destroyed one armoured vehicle. The office is located near Spoen Zar Hotel, which is the headquarters of Parchamis in Kunduz. This section of the city is virtually in the hands of Mujahideen who can walk with their weapons freely even during the day time.

KABUL CLAIM: Afghanistan Government radio on Saturday said 500 insurgents were killed and 200 captured in battles with armed forces in the remote north-western province of Faryab.

"Our people have achieved success against counter-revolutionaries", claimed a broadcast monitored in India.

The broadcast quoted the official Bakhtar News Agency as saying that 500 guerillas were "destroyed" in Maymana, Faryab's main city 470 kilometres north-west of Kabul. About 500 rifles were seized from the guerillas, it said.—PPI/APA

'FRONTIER GANDHI' SUPPORTS AGGRESSION--Islamabad, 22 July--Justifying the Soviet aggression in Afghanistan, Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan, who is known as "Frontier Ghandi," said that had the Russians been 3 days late in their action, America, with the cooperation of Pakistan, would have taken over Afghanistan. Addressing newsmen in Poona, "Frontier Gandhi," who is known for his opposition to the establishment of Pakistan, said that he agrees with the position India has taken regarding the Afghanistan issue. He said that he views this situation the same way Indira Gandhi does. The Russian invasion, according to him, came because America and Pakistan were going to attack Afghanistan within 3 days. ANTI-KARMAL ATHLETES EXECUTED--Moscow, 1 August (APP, UPI)--500 Afghan residents are being tortured in Russian jails. These Afghans had requested immigration to Western countries. Meanwhile, four of the athletes who had refused to return to Afghanistan from Moscow, and had asked Western countries for political asylum have been sent to Kabul and executed. One source said that many Afghans are in Russian jails where the KGB is torturing them. This source said that a spokesman of the Afghan Olympic team confirmed that many members of the team wanted to emigrate to Western countries. The spokesman further said that the whole Afghan team is kept under guard round the clock, and its members are not allowed to contact anyone. This source also reported that many Afghan citizens who were in Moscow before the Russian aggression are being arrested to avoid their fleeing to America and other countries. This source also admitted that he tried to get a visa for himself to emigrate to Germany or the U.S., but failed in his attempt, and was later questioned by the KGB twice. QASHQA'I TRIBESMEN SET FOR REVOLT

[Text] A senior revolutionary guardsman has warned of an impending tribal revolt in the south of Iran along the Persian Gulf.

Dr. Mashallah Aein, head of the Revolutionary Guardsmen at Firuzabad, the center of the Qashqaie tribe stronghold in Fars province, said yesterday that the former minister of defense and governor-general of the oil rich province of Khuzestan, Ahmad Madani was busy mobilizing the southern tribes with the help of the U.S.

"These tribes have been receiving heavy armaments through the southern ports along the Persian Gulf for quite a long time," he said.

A Majlis deputy warned last week that the U.S. was sending large amounts of arms and ammunition to the tribesmen in the south of Iran.

Madani, has been called on to appear before an Armed Forces Revolutionary Court next week. He quit his seat in the Majlis two weeks ago on the pretext that the Majlis was not representative of the people.

According to the senior Revolutionary Guardsman, Madani was said to be playing an important role in the conspiracy.

Asked what was being done to foil the conspiracy, the Guardsman said: "We have drawn up certain plans which I cannot reveal at present. But no matter what we do, we would definitely mobilize the local tribesmen."

He said there was a war of nerves going on in the area and tribal leaders were creating an atmosphere of repression in order to frighten the local inhabitants.

The senior tribesman further backed up his warning by referring to the early seasonal migration of Qashqaie tribesmen saying large amounts of arms and ammunition were being moved to the mountainous areas in Fars province.

He said local tribal chieftains had already lodged themselves around the mountainous areas near Basij, west of firuzabad, and some 180 of their guards has secured vital routes in the area preventing all movement.

TEACHERS MUST HAVE 'RIGHT' POLITICAL VIEWS

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 21 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] TEHRAN – Probing of one's beliefs is not becoming of a revolutionary society and is utterly inconsistent with freedom of thought as lived and expressed in Islam, a law graduate seeking admission as teacher has said in a letter to presidential adviser Mousavi Garmaroudi.

A copy of the letter sent to the Persian daily 'Enqelab-e Eslami' and published yesterday claimed that a questionnaire which the law graduate applicant for the teaching post was called upon to answer by the Ministry of Education, made it obligatory on him to reveal his personal private political convictions.

It alleged that the procedure was unfair and pointed to partiality and prejudice in the selection of teachers. It is very clear that the selections were being made not on the merits of the applicants qualifications to be a teacher but on the basis of his political beliefs.

The student revealed in the letter that among the questions were those such as : "what are your views on Dr. Beheshti?" And again : "Name a few of Iran's political parties, and what are your views on them?"

Many of the questions had no relevance to the fitness of applicants for the teaching post. All that is required in an application of this nature were the qualifications and bio-data of the student, his previous records and fitness to be a teacher, the letter said.

KURDISH REFUGEES RECOUNT PERSIAN ATROCITIES

Baghdad AL-JUMHURIYAH in Arabic 3 Jun 80 p 8

[Article: "The Appeal to the Conscience of Mankind From the Iranian Kurdish Villages Is so Loud as To Deafen the Ears"]

> [Text] "Key to Paradise" is one of Khomeyni's religious rulings which justifies killing any opponent of his regime, especially the Kurds.
> A family mourns four of its children and flees with three others out of fear.
> A total of 1,571 Kurdish Iranian families have sought asylum in Iraq.

Do not kill, Allah orders us, save rightfully. This is what the true religion of Islam says. Its opinion is as clear as the light of day. There is no double-talk in its words. Its rules are definite. Where do the new Iranian leaders stand with regard to the opinions and precepts of Islam? They declared to the world at large that they adhere to the precepts of Islam and act according to the Sharia and the Koran!! But take a look at these international news agency reports published in more than one Arab or foreign newspaper:

--So-called revolutionary guards enter a Kurdish village, kill the men and loot the homes.

--The Kurds accuse Khomeyni and his government of using American-made Phantom planes to drop napalm bombs on peaceful villages. More than 80 youths are executed in one Kurdish village.

--Photographs of world news agencies show scenes of execution of a number of Kurds tied to the windows of their homes, in the presence of their mothers, fathers, wives and children. Other pictures show Kurdish children being wrapped in shrouds after they were killed by the bullets and bombs of Iran's Persian leaders.

And so on! One can read and see many more news and pictures which cry out to save humanity in Iran from the claws of those who claim to be Moslems! Since when did religion justify killing an innocent child? Since when did it justify dropping bombs (American-made of the type used against the Vietnamese people) on peaceful villages? We do not know of a religion which allows the dragging of men out of their homes and executing them in front of their families without a trial or even an accusation. Can such actions be called human? Where is the reaction of mankind to which God sent Islam to save it from the acts of evildoers.

The Flight of Kurdish Iranian Families to Iraq

About 1,571 Kurdish Iranian families, most of them women and children, took refuge in revolutionary Iraq where peace and security reign. This is the Iraq of the Ba'thist revolution, the revolution of 17 July! These families fled from the bombs and bullets of Khomeyni's guards who entered the villages in military cars, and left them in ruins. The bodies of the victims were left on the streets and the houses were looted. The women who hid and were not hurt lament the fate of the villages. An investigative reporter of AL-JUMHURIYAH met with members of these stricken families. Explaining the reasons for his seeking refuge in Iraq, one of them, Mr Rahim said: "We left Iran without any of our belongings. We fled the neo-Nazis who attempt to destroy every non-Persian individual."

Kicked and Beaten To Death While Holding the Koran

"What are the methods adopted by the neo-Nazis," we asked Mr Rahim? He answered: "I will mention this incident. It is an example of scores of incidents that take place inside the area where Arabs and Kurds live in Iran. It may wake up those whom Khomeyni and his gang fooled with sweet talk. They pretend to be Islamic, but Islam is innocent of their deeds. A few days ago, Persian elements of Khomeyni's came to our homes carrying American made weapons. They rounded up 86 men of the village and executed them. Before they executed the men, the mayor of the village came out carrying the Koran in his hands and appealed to Khomeyni's agents. He explained to them that the men were innocent Moslems, and that Islam forbids slaying them. The mayor was kicked and beaten to death." We asked: "Is your stay in Iraq a temporary one"? He answered: "Yes, we are part of the Iranian land which we left. We shall return after we achieve victory over the irresponsible gang which pretends to be religious."

AL-JUMHURIYAH met with another Iranian Kurdish refugee who talked about one of the principles of Khomeyni's group. He said: "Khomeyni's group uses what is called 'Key to Paradise' to justify their inhumane actions." We asked: "What is the Key to Paradise"? He answered: "It is a principle which says that slaying any opponent of the regime is justified, and that the killer will go to heaven. It is a new religious ruling of the new shah with a turban. Islam will haunt him till doomsday. Islam has many humane and democratic aspects. How can such a ruling which justifies murder be ascribed to Islam? Thus, you see the bodies of innocent Kurds lying in the streets--not only Kurds but also Arabs living in Iran, and every Iranian who opposes the regime of the new Shah.

"Everybody recognized the game played by Khomeyni when he pretended his hostility to America and the Zionist entity [Israel]. How can he justify his cooperation with America's agents? The hostage game became boring and lost its attraction to those who were fooled at the beginning. This became clear after the declaration of the Iranian regime's representative at the United Nations. He said: 'We have benefited from the hostages for propaganda purposes. They are of no use now. We will set them free as soon as possible.'"

Finally, AL-JUMHURIYAH met with a family which left Iran. After the family rested for a short period from fatigue and hunger, the wife was in tears lamenting her four children killed by blind Persian hatred. The father said: "I came here with my family to save those who survived the bullets of the Persian regime. The Iraqi revolutionary government granted a monthly allowance and living needs to every family which took refuge in Iraq. The good heart of the Iraqi revolution has room for all oppressed members of the true [Islamic] religion. It is a heart full of love and kindness to all men of goodwill."

IRANIAN DEPORTEES FROM IRAQ SEEK JOBS IN ARAB WORLD

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 16 May 80 p 11

[Article: "Iranians Driven Out of Iraq Look for Jobs in Other Arab Countries"]

[Text] Tehran--Iranians expelled by Iraq following the strained relations between the two countries continue to ask Arab diplomats to find them jobs in other Arab states. These deportees, estimated at 35,000, including businessmen, teachers, engineers and physicians, face many problems in Iran due to unemployment in the country and their inability to speak Persian. They speak Arabic.

A group of the deportees gathered in front of the Tunisian Embassy to appeal to Mr Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the Arab League, to seriously study their situation and urge the Iraqi Government to return them to Iraq or make a just settlement for the properties they could not take out of Iraq. The Arab diplomats have refused to comment on the possible steps which the Arab governments may take regarding resettlement of these deportees.

The IRAQI NEWS AGENCY in Baghdad reports that an arrested member of the banned al-Da'wah [Islamic vocation] Party disclosed on 15 May criminal plans of the party for the assassination of top officials in Iraq.

The agency described Hamid 'Aziz, the arrested member, as an agent of Iran. The agency quotes him as saying that leaders of al-Da'wah "charged him with preparing a map of government departments and agencies in preparation for assassinating officials and blowing up buildings according to instructions of the Persian regime."

The Iraqi authorities had arrested many members of al-Da'wah, which it regards as an agent of Iran, and decided to inflict capital punishment on anyone proved to be a member of this party.

The agency quoted 'Aziz as saying that he distributed weapons which were smuggled from Iran to cells of the party in Iraq. The weapons included handguns with silencers and grenades.

IRAQI-IRANIAN DISPUTE, PLO INTEREST IN MEDIATION REVIEWED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 30 May 80 pp 29-30

[Article by Huda al-Husayni: "Between Iraq and Iran, Battles Are Permissible but War Is Forbidden"]

[Text] As observers expected, the sharp tension along the Iraqi-Iranian border did not lead to a military confrontation between the two nations.

It is known that the dispute reached its peak during the middle of last month, when the Iraqi Navy increased its patrols in the Gulf in response to Tehran's decision to put its armed forces on alert. The world was concerned about the security situation between the two countries only because of its concern about the oil in the region. This was so much so that some Western voices started to offer advice. When Sadegh Qutbzadeh, Iran's foreign minister threatened to close the straits of Hormuz, the SUNDAY TIMES advised the United States to block the straits before Iran did. The SUNDAY TIMES suggested that the Sixth Fleet in the Indian Ocean should undertake the blockade operation. The FINANCIAL TIMES advised that France and Italy expedite the delivery of military ships ordered by Iraq so that Baghdad also may be in a position to block the flow of oil in the Gulf.

The present quiet on the Iraqi-Iranian borders does not eliminate fears or preclude the possibility of renewed flare-ups between the two countries.

A few years back, when the situation deteriorated between Iraq and Iran and reached the brink of a bloody war between the two countries, it was the result of Iranian pressure on Iraq to give a part of Shatt al-'Arab to Iran. The pressure was applied through Iranian support for an Iraqi Kurdish separatist movement. The Algiers agreement of 1975 halted the possibility of a flare-up throughout the Gulf area. But the situation in 1975 differs from the one in 1980, because Iran under the Islamic Revolution is different from Iran under the shah with regard to the Palestinian question. Iran under the shah sided with Israel, while Iran under Khomeyni is for the Palestinians.

We know that the strategy of the Palestinian Liberation movement is based on agreement of the Arab and Islamic world on the Palestinian question and on disagreement within the western world with regard to this question, so as to be able to exploit this disagreement in European, American and international circles.

As the Palestinian movement pays the price for every dispute among any two or more Arab or Islamic nations, it is in the interest of the Palestinians now to restore harmony between the nations of the area which support the Palestinian cause. Yasir 'Arafat cannot divorce himself from the Iranian revolution on which he bet and won. Indeed he made Khomeyni commit himself and Iran to the Palestinian cause. In fact, Khomeyni called for the liberation of Jerusalem even before Abu 'Ammar [Yasir 'Arafat] told him: "You have an even greater responsibility to liberate Jerusalem than myself." In spite of the internal and external difficulties facing the Iranian revolution, its leaders have not lost their concern for the Palestinian cause. Every statement made by them mentions the liberation of Jerusalem. The Iranian revolution did not hesitate to send Iranian officials to southern Lebanon. Converting the Israeli Embassy in Tehran into a PLO office was done with fanfare, particularly in view of the extent of the shah regime's association with Israel. The Iranian revolution did not stop providing the Palestinian movement with military and financial support in spite of the serious economic problems facing it. The strongest connection between the Iranian revolution and the Palestinian resistance became obvious when the Iranian leaders expressed their willingness to offer the Greater Tumb, the Smaller Tumb and the Abu Musa islands to the Palestinians if they asked for them.

This is the reason for the repeated efforts of Abu 'Ammar to mediate between Iraq and Iran to pacify the situation. The Palestinian mediation has not been a direct one between the two countries. It started out as a Palestinian move among the Arab countries and ended up as a move by the Arab countries, especially as the damage to the Palestinian question from the conflict between Iraq and Iran would not be any less than the damage this conflict would inflict on the two countries and the Gulf area as a whole.

Attention focused on Iraq. Some nations issued statements while others sent delegates to discuss the situation. The Gulf states put aside their fear of the Iraqi regime and stood with Iraq, especially when Iran threatened to export the revolution to the states of the area. Press headlines in the Gulf states stressed the bonds between the Gulf states in these terms: "If the pillars of Baghdad fall, so will the edifice of the Gulf fall apart," and "If the storm hits Iraq, violence will plague the entire Gulf area." Thus, the risk of damage to the Palestinian cause was equated with risks of damage to the Arab nations and Iran as well.

Arab mediation started when King Husayn of Jordan stated that all Arab countries should stand with Iraq and wished that the Islamic revolution in Iran would support the causes of the Arab nations. A Saudi official arrived in Iraq. Shaykh Sa'd al-Abdullah al-Sabah, the Kuwaiti crown prince, travelled to Iraq, Jordan and Syria. And an Iraqi-Kuwaiti communique affirmed that the security of the Gulf was not the responsibility of one single nation but the responsibility of all [Gulf] nations, free of any foreign intervention of any kind. The communique also emphasized the support of the two nations for the Palestinian resistance movement.

The Arab and Islamic peoples were torn up psychologically when the dispute between Iraq and Iran surfaced. The Arab peoples support the Iranian revolution and its success, but they do not forget that they are Arabs before anything else, and they cannot give up their Arab nationalism. On the other hand, the Arab peoples feel that Khomeyni took revenge for them when he defied the United States and continued to do so irrespective of the consequences in terms of damage to the economy of his country and its future. The Arab citizen cannot ignore the stands of Khomeyni which few Arab leaders dared to take.

Contacts between the Arab countries, between the Palestinians and Iran, and between the Palestinians and Arab countries continued. This was followed by a statement by Iranian President Bani-Sadr to a Gulf newspaper, in which he said: "Iraq is a sister country. We respect Iraq. The Gulf area is an Islamic front. Iran does not covet any territories, especially not Arab territories." Bani-Sadr said, "Iran which is ready to fight Israel alongside the Arabs will not disagree with the Arabs on territories." It was the first time that the Iranian leader did not attack Arab nationalism. He said, "We are not against Arab nationalism which undoubtedly stands by Islam."

On the other hand, Iraq showed its good intentions toward Iran when Tariq 'Aziz, the deputy prime minister and member of the Iraqi Revolution Council wrote an editorial in the Iraqi newspaper AL-BA'TH, in which he said: "What political or economic gain would Iraq achieve from hurting Iran? Iraq will not get involved in conflict unless it is forced to defend its nationalism and identity." He added: "When Islamic people emphasize their Islamic identity they get closer to the Arab nation."

This is how the idea of a five-nation summit including Iraq, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the PLO developed.

It is certain that Iraq and Iran can or would inevitably agree on a least common denominator, namely their support for the Palestinian cause. But the questionis: "How far can Iran and Iraq agree on leadership of the area or on a unified policy? Iraq hopes to play the role of leader in the area, while Iran considers that it has the right to play that role.

It was noted that the conflicts between Iran and Iraq worried the Soviet Union, since it is a conflict between two neighboring countries that are rich in oil. And it is known that Iraq concluded an agreement of cooperation with Moscow in 1972 (which led to the Soviet Union supplying Iraq with arms) but relations between the two countries have been strained since 1978.

Although the Iranian ambassador to Moscow, Mohammed Baqry, informed the Soviet officials that his country wishes Moscow to stop supplying Iraq with arms, Iran as a state has not as yet really sought the assistance of Moscow. Nevertheless, the situation could draw the two countries closer together. Another issue between Iraq and Iran is Iraq's declared determination to recover the three Arab islands, while Iran has vowed to maintain their Persian identity.

Iraq claims that Iran is trying to create terror in Iraq and Iran accuses Iraq of becoming the main shelter of the Iranian opposition. Iran claims that there are 500 Iranian officers and soldiers in Iraq preparing for "the battle of Arabistan and Kurdistan."

The most difficult issue is what Iraq asks from Iran with regard to granting autonomy to the minorities in Iran, including the Arabs of Arabistan. What is serious about this concept, in the view of the Iranian leaders, is that the request means fragmenting the Persian State. Khomeyni will not accept granting autonomy to the minorities at any cost. We all remember the last statement of the ousted shah that Iran stood [the risk] in the future to become divided into small parts according to their nationalities and that these would reunite under the red flag. It is impossible for Khomeyni to accept the fulfillment of the shah's prophecies as long as he is alive.

On the other hand, we know that Iran's present economy entirely depends upon the oil revenues from the Arabistan (Khuzistan) region. Any revolution for the autonomy of this region would constitute a real economic danger to the success of the Iranian revolution as a whole, more soo than any armed revolution in Kurdistan, Baluchistan, Azerbaijan or Turkistan.

Finally, Iraq and Iran refuse to go to war and the whole area rejects the idea of a war between them as well. Will they meet to find a solution through the five-nation summit or will they settle for the existing situation of a continuous war of attrition similar to that of the Lebanese crisis in which the fires are checked so as not to spread to the neighboring countries.

A foreign commentator wrote that an Iraqi-Iranian war would be most dangerous if it should erupt, because it would inflame nationalist, religious, ethnic and regional feelings. Its fires would not be confined to the surface but would penetrate the ground to where the lakes of the "black blood" of the industrial world are situated. It is this which makes such a war impossible!

FACTORS OF SUCCESS, DIFFICULTY IN PLANNED DEVELOPMENT ANALYZED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 6 Jul 80 p 35

[Article: "Rapid Industrialization Combined With Political Equilibrium"]

[Text] A feeling of satisfaction is now prevalent in Jordanian ministerial circles. This is due to the expected realization of the objectives of the 1975-80 five-year development plan to attain an annual 12 percent increase in national income, and to double this income.

At the moment, all efforts are concentrated on preparing the next five-year development plan. The departments concerned are now totally engaged in studying what has been accomplished and determining the reasons for the problems which should be rectified in the upcoming development plan. However, this apparent optimism leaves the solution of some failures in the program of economic development contingent upon the success of the forthcoming plan in the sectors of phosphate, potassium and fertilizers. It is from these that the Jordanian Government has derived its present satisfaction with regard to what has already been accomplished.

The most important, of these failures is the fact that the trade balance deficit has doubled from $505 million in 1975 to $1,200 million in 1978. It is expected that this deficit will reach $2 billion at the end of 1980. Naturally, Jordan complains of high energy prices, as well as the lack of response from the Arab countries to Jordan's problems. In fact, the volume of oil imports has reached half of Jordan's exports. Thus, while oil prices have been rising, oil imports have also been rising, because the development plan, which seeks the achievement of high rates of growth, has increased the demand for oil.

The realization of the ambitious development plan has increased the volume of industrial imports whose prices have increased worldwide. Consequently, this has contributed an additional factor to the weakening of Jordan's financial resources. This, in turn, leads Jordan to borrow money. From a practical point of view, the trade deficit does not have a negative effect, except in those cases where efforts are not made to raise industrial and agricultural production. In the case of Jordan, official statistics indicate a 14 percent annual rate of growth in the industrial sector throughout the years of the plan, especially in the phosphate sector.

Industrialization Progresses, but Agriculture Suffers

According to reliable sources, one of the basic goals of the plan, which aims at changing the Jordanian basic economic structure, is cpmcemtration on industrialization. For example, the share of industrialization in the development program was more than 40 percent, and is expected to rise to 50 percent. The results give rise to some optimism that industry could absorb most of Jordan's borrowing through increased production. Thus, phosphate production has risen from 1.035 million tons in 1975 to 2.320 million tons in 1978. It is expected that this figure will reach 5 million tons by the end of 1980. It is expected that phosphates, potassium and fertilizer production in Aqaba will provide Jordan with $660 million [annually] by the beginning of the next development plan.

Therefore, the basic goal of intensive industrialization in these sectors is to achieve a larger measure of independence from outside aid. Nevertheless, the political goal is not absent, either. For example, these sectors put up $3.3 billion for investments, which is equivalent to twice the amount of Arab aid to Jordan.

Agriculture was the biggest victim of the course taken by Jordanian political and economic policy. Agricultural production declined [sic] by 10 percent and did not increase by more than 5 percent annually. In theory, this rate of growth exceeds the demographic rate of growth by 3.2 percent. In other words, Jordan is still better off than the majority of developing countries. However, in practice, such a rate of growth is not enough to meet Jordan's domestic demand, because 60 percent of all Jordanians will be living in cities. In the meantime, available land is limited. Consequently, any increase in production requires introducing intensive mechanization. This, in turn, would lead to higher costs and higher prices. The increase in the volume of imports and the vertical stimulation of the economy led to the increase in the rate of inflation. Actually, the annual budget deficit in itself has been sufficient to maintain inflationary pressures. Thus, the annual increase in the rate of inflation did not drop below 15 percent. Jordan hopes to be able to contain this rate of increase within the limits of 12 percent a year in the upcoming 5-year development plan. The question is: Will Jordan be able to do so?

Finance and a Balanced Policy

The rise in income of the Jordanian citizen, and the government's insistence on extending the broad outline of the current plan into the next 5-year plan, takes away from the departments concerned any possible means of fighting inflation. The money flowing in from Jordanian workers in the Gulf nations (who saved the equivalent of $500 million a year for Jordan, or an amount equal to the revenues from phosphates, potassium and the Jordan Valley combined) will continue to play its [major] role in financing the next development plan. However, this keeps away from Jordan the most important and specialized workforce the country possesses.

Recent Iraqi-Jordanian cooperation will play a very important role in the upcoming 5-year plan. In this respect, political harmony between the two countries does seem to be satisfactory. Thus, if Jordan manages to maintain its economic relations with Syria, it will have realized its dream of "political balance as a basis for the success of the Jordanian economy."

FIVE-YEAR PLAN FOCUSES ON INCREASING AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION

Amman AL-RA'Y in Arabic 20 Jun 80 p 15

[Text] Dr Jawad al-'Anani, minister of supplies, said that the construction of an automatic bakery in the al-Karak governorate has been approved. He added that this project is part of the five-year plan and that operational procedures and necessary studies will take place during the current year. He pointed out that the budget for the five-year plan is estimated at around 2 billion dinars and that the annual project expenditures are approximately 500 million dinars.

Dr al-'Anani also confirmed, in a meeting held at the cneter for vocational syndicates in al-Karak, that the main solution to supply problems is represented by increased production, and he emphasized the necessity of cooperation between the citizens and the state to achieve this goal. He said that agricultural production is considered one of the largest income-producing sectors, and that we must give more attention to agriculture and farming. He called for increased production of poultry and vegetables to cover the deficit in some other crops. He also said that Jordan has the most favorable climate for the poultry industry and that it must be taken advantage of in order to increase production and exports. Dr al'Anani emphasized the importance of food production, as it is a fundamental operation for agricultural development in Jordan.

Dr al'Anani pointed out that a complete feed plant will be constructed in al-Juwaydah region, including a mill and silos for grain. This plant will provide the necessary poultry feed.

During the meeting, there was an open discussion of the action sheets presented by the organization that supervises the syndicate center's branch, the al-Karak chamber of commerce and the cooperative committee for egg production and distribution. The supervising organization's action sheet included several topics related to poultry production and marketing, the consumers' market, the parallel market and food production.

Other participants in the discussions were National Advisory Council memebers, the assistant governor of al-Karak, the mayor, department managers and some residents of the governorate.

DATA ON GROWTH OF PHOSPHATE EXPORTS GIVEN

Amman AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 5 Jul 80 p 3

[Article by Taysir al-Majali: "Four Million Tons of Phosphate Exported During the Current Year"]

[Text] Phosphate is among our most important exports, which form one of the economic pillars in our country. Our phosphate exports are increasing year after year due to increased local production.

As export of this product takes place via the port of the phosphate company in al-'Aqabah, AL-DUSTUR had the chance to meet with Mr 'Adil al-Shara', the port's branch manager of the company. He said that the phosphate port is one of the most modern ports in the world with regard to its storage capacity.

The port has 6 large warehouses that can accommodate 410,000 tons. The port is also equipped with the most modern equipment to automatically transfer phosphate from these warehouses.

The port of al-'Aqaba daily receives 12,000 to 13,000 tons and transfers 1/3 of this amount by truck and another 1/3 by railroad. Railroads transport around 4,000 tons per day. This amount will increase next year to 6,000 tons, as the railroad will acquire more cars, although the railroad can only transport the phosphate from its mines to the al-Hasa area.

In discussing the phosphate exports in general, Mr al-Shara' said that our exports in 1979 were 2,700,000 tons, transported by 243 ships; i.e., at an average of 1 ship per day. It was exported to a number of Asian and European countries, including India, Turkey, Romania, Japan, China, Pakistan and Yugoslavia.

He added that exports are anticipated to reach 4 million tons during this year, due to increased phosphate production.

As for phosphate exports during the coming years, he said that the company expects to export 6 million tons during 1982, as the al-Shidyah mines, which are considered the richest Jordanian locations in phosphate, will be directly utilized during the coming years.

As for the characteristics of Jordanian phosphate, he said that this phosphate is considered among the best kinds in the world. The Jordanian phosphate company currently produces 3 kinds of phosphate: The first quality which contains 66 to 68 percent of triphosphate calcium; the second quality which contains 70 to 72 percent and the third and best quality which contains 73 to 75 percent.

Mr al-Shara' added that Jordanian phosphate has another characteristic, which is that it has a very low percentage of chlorine, which helps in further improving its quality in the future. He also said that the port has a technical laboratory to test phosphate samples before exporting them which also helps improve these qualities.

LOAN FOR COMMUNICATIONS NETWORK--The National Planning Council signed an agreement between Jordan and Japan yesterday, in relation to the Japanese loan which the government of Japan has decided to extend to Jordan. The loan amounts to 8,693 million Japanese yen, and will be used to finance expansion of the communications network and telephone services in Jordan. The agreeemnt was signed by the president of the National Planning Council, Dr Hanna 'Awdah, on behalf of the Jordanian Government, and by the Japanese Ambassador in Amman, Mr Homia Okada, on behalf of the Japanese Government. This took place in the presence of the general manager of the telephone and telegraph communications organization and the secretary general of the National Planning Council. The Japanese Government had previously extended two loans to Jordan totalling 10,500 million Japanese yen for the expansion of local telephone services and the Wadi al'Arab dam and irrigation projects. It has also participated in the establishment of electronic training and service centers for the Royal Science Society and in the study of a complete regional development project for northern Jordan (the Irbid region). INVESTMENT ENCOURAGEMENT PROGRAM--In a meeting held yesterday under the chairmanship of deputy minister Mr Muhammad Salih, the investment promotions committee of the ministry of trade and industry approved the classification of 9 industrial and tourism projects as economic projects. They will receive an exemption of 1,650,000 dinars in custom duties on their machinery and equipment. These projects employ 550 workers. The committee also approved the exemption from all custom duties of machinery and equipment for 13 ongoing industrial and hotel projects. The value of this machinery and equipment is 840,000 dinars. ALIA MAKES PURCHASES--The ALIA Foundation and a group of local financial institutions signed an agreement to issue ALIA promissory notes for 10 million Jordanian dinars to be used to cover part of the cost of the new airplanes it recently agreed to purchase. These will be delivered within the next 3 years. The notes will be issued in two installments of 5 million dinars each; the first to be issued on 6 August and the second at the beginning of May 1981. The government insured the capital and interests of these notes and exempted them from income tax. These notes earn an annual interest of 8 5/8 percent, paid in two equal installments. The agreement was signed by ALIA's general manager, Mr 'Ali Ghandur; Dr Khalil al-Salim of the Arab/Jordan Financial Institution; Mr Zuhayr Khuri of the Commercial Paper [Financing] Company; and Mr Jawad Hadid of the Jordanian Arab Investment Bank. PALESTINIAN AIRLINES RECOMMENDED--The 20th emergency session of the Civil Aviation Council of the Arab Nations, which began on 29 June, was concluded yesterday. The council approved civil aviation strategy and considered it the basis for joint civil aviation activity of the member nations. The council confirmed Palestine's right to form its own civil aviation organization in any Arab country, based on approval of this Palestinian organization by the host country. This organization will have the same privileges as other air transport organizations. It will also carry out all its obligations, in addition to running regular flights. The council decided to move the organization's regional headquarters from Cairo to Khartoum. It also reaffirmed the Jerusalem resolution taken at the 18th emergency session in 1979, related to the boycott of the Egyptians in various civil aviation and air transportation fields in the event there was evidence that the Egyptian aviation organizations were dealing with the Zionists. The council approved its 5-year plan for 1980-1985, and priorities and air fares defined in the report of the council's permanent committee. The council decided to freeze air transport fares among Arab nations until the beginning of next year. It also confirmed its previous decision to nominate Iraq, Lebanon and Algeria for positions in the international civil aviation council, and to try to deprive Egypt of its membership and replace it with an Arab country. The council praised Jordan's withdrawal of its nomination [at the forthcoming] session [of the international council] to serve Arab interests. Delegations representing 15 Arab nations and representatives of the Arab League participated in this session. [Text] [Amman AL-RA'Y in Arabic 3 Jul 80 p 3] 9455

SUBVERSIVE INCIDENTS MAY SIGNAL GULF TREND

Beirut THE ARAB WORLD WEEKLY in English 16 Aug 80 pp 7-9

[Excerpts] More than a year ago, US National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski spoke of the "crescent of crisis" that would spread over regions of the Middle East. He foretold of tragedies and internal disorders that would erupt across the Middle East and into the Gulf area.

Today, the first signs of the perils to come have apparently been registered in Kuwait where a series of bombing and fire incidents, of arrests and reshuffles have prompted observers to wonder whether it will not be long before we witness the "Lebanonization" of Kuwait first, then the rest of the Gulf. Kuwait would be in their opinion the first target of the same gusty winds that blew over Lebanon.

The problems which Kuwait has been facing for most of the past year came out in the open recently when Interior Minister Sheikh Nawwaf Ahmed Al Sabah decided, last month, to speed up the retirement of 36 high-ranking officers of the Kuwaiti internal security forces. He said the purpose behind the move was to reorganize the security apparatus and pointed out that the main problem lay in the poor services rendered in the last few months by the country's intelligence service. He did not elaborate more but he was understood to be accusing the 36 officers of neglect and his list of grievances was long.

At the time, informed sources in Beirut told THE ARAB WORLD that the move was tantamount to a purge moitvated by Kuwaiti official fears that members of the security forces belonged to a number of parties and organizations--Baathist, NSSP, Communist, Palestinian--and could take part in an anti-regime move. They added that the Kuwaiti officials were screening the files of all officers carefully.

The reason for the Kuwaiti concern is many-fold. In the past few months, the authorities have come across publications calling for rebellion against the existing rule. In the meantime, reports said, investigations have also revealed that the pamphlets distributed by the gunmen who occupied the Mecca Grand Mosque in Saudi Arabia were printed by activists operating in Kuwait.

Reports in the Arab press this week focused on the problem and said that, although the situation in Kuwait may resemble the situation that prevailed in Lebanon on the eve of the 1975 war, the Kuwaiti society does not have historical precedents, social problems and past divisions capable of generating more divisions inside the country. Their belief is that, with the help of neighbouring countries Kuwait can control the spread of corrosion.

Other observers, however contend that what is taking place in Kuwait points out to a foreign-inspired plan whose far-reaching purpose is to have an armed force deploy in the Gulf to protect the oil-fields and ensure safe transport of oil to the industrialized world in order to ward off the dangers of plans which allegedly call for either the destruction of the oil wells or the closing of the Hormuz Straits (which would paralyze 62 per cent of oil exports), or still the alleged Soviet "dream" of getting access to a warm seaport and, as US Defense Minister Harold Brown said it last week, "the Soviet objective is to be in control of Europe's vital sources."

RESTORATION OF PARLIAMENTARY LIFE PLANNED, DESPITE SECURITY PROBLEMS

Beirut AN-NAHAR ARAB REPORT & MEMO in English 1 Sep 80 pp 6-7

[Text] In spite of the current sense of insecurity created by, among other things, a wave of terrorist bombings, the Emir of Kuwait has decided to proceed with plans to restore the elected parliament which was dissolved five years ago. No date has yet been set for a general election, but it is expected that one will be held in January; the Emir, Sheikh Jaber al-Ahmad al-Sabah, last week issued a decree stating that a new, 50-member National Assembly would convene before the end of February 1981.

The Minister of State for Legal Affairs, Sheikh Salman al-Duaij al-Sabah, meanwhile said that discussions were still being held on whether or not to allow women to vote for the first time.

Sheikh Salman said that the new assembly would have the same powers as the one dissolved by the late Emir in August 1976; this, he added, meant that no law could be passed without the assembly's approval. "It won't be the government deciding alone, it will be the government and the assembly," he said in an interview with REUTERS; he added: "the final word really is with the National Assembly."

As this newsletter reported in its August 18 issue, fears had been expressed that the authorities would use the recent acts of sabotage and violence as a pretext to postpone indefinitely the elections which the late Emir specified should be held within four years. That deadline expired last week, and Sheikh Salman said that it would take at least two months to organise an election.

But, while the authorities have decided to go ahead with the restoration of the assembly, Prime Minister Sheikh Saad al-Abdullah al-Abah warned in an interview published last week that the body must avoid "the bickering and cheap deals which affected the course of our parliamentary life" until August 1976. The late Emir's decree ending 15 years of parliamentary participation in Kuwaiti politics, accused the assembly of that time of "exploiting democracy for private gain."

Interviewed by the newspaper AL-WATAN, the Prime Minister added: We must close the doors and windows against those elements whose only desire is to divide the country and upset security and stability." Earlier, the government had accused foreign powers and a local "fifth column" of perpetrating the bomb attacks and of distributing anti-government propaganda, but it gave no details.

It is in this light that the Interior Minister, Sheikh Nawaf al-Ahmad al-Sabah, announced last week that Kuwait is to propose a comprehensive plan for cooperation between Arab states on internal security, at a forthcoming meeting of Arab interior ministers in Saudi Arabia. Sheikh Nawaf told a local newspaper that the plan emphasises the non-interference of Arab states in each other's affairs, a clear indication of the Kuwaiti government's concern over the recent wave of terrorism and bomb attacks in the country. As this newsletter reported in its August 18 issue, the main target for suspicion is Kuwait's sizeable Iranian community, many of whom support Ayatollah Khomeini and his call for the overthrow of the regimes in other Gulf states.

Other Gulf governments have also recently expressed concern at increasing social tension and criminal activity, which are usually blamed on the huge influx of foreigners into their countries. Most Gulf economies are dangerously reliant on foreign workers, who in some states, such as the UAE, constitute the majority of the population.

Echoing this growing awareness of the fragility of the Gulf's social fabric, the Bahraini newspaper AKHBAR AL-KHALEEJ welcomed Kuwait's democratic stirrings last week, proclaiming that "true democracy is the shield which protects the nation both from internal and external dangers." Even though its own parliament was also dissolved in 1975, Bahrain is the only other Arab Gulf state with a tradition of parliamentary rule.

FAILURE OF AMAL, AL-MURABITUN, SOCIALIST ALLIANCE ANALYZED

Kuwait AL-HADAF in Arabic 19 Jun 80 p 15

[Article: "New Bloodbaths at Doors; Higher Political Sources Tell AL-HADAF Details of Recent Developments in Lebanese National Movement; Islamic Alliance's Mediation Foiled at Last Moment; Will Armed Conflict Between Communists and Amal Flare Anew?"]

[Text] Beirut--AL-QUDS PRESS--Some well-informed press sources in Beirut say that the next few months in Lebanon will be tantamount to a series of sudden and surprising events. If the resignation of the Lebanese prime minister and of his government and the possibilities involved in the formation of a new government constitute the number one event, then the second event in this regard is the installation of Walid Junblatt, the son of the late Lebanese leader Kamal Junblatt and the chairman of the Socialist Progressive Party (with the majority of its base formed of Druzes), as chairman of the Lebanese National Movement, i.e. chairman of the Central Political Council of the parties joined under the name of the National Movement. The most prominent of these parties are the Socialist Progressive Party itself, the Lebanese Communist Party, led by George Hawi; the Communist Action Organization, led by Muhsin Ibrahim; the Independent Nasirists (al-Murabitun) Movement, led by Ibrahim Qulaylat and the Syrian Social National Party led by 'Abdallah Sa'adah.

In addition to giving Walid Junblatt the position of chairman of the Central Political Council--a position which became vacant with the death of Walid Junblatt's father 3 years ago--the said council has also adopted a new resolution providing for the Socialist Arab Ba'th Party Organization (pro-Damascus) to join the council parties and naming 'Asim Qansu, the organization chairman, a member of the Executive Committee of the National Movement parties and a deputy chairman of the Central Political Council. This is in addition to accepting the Socialist Arab Union and its leader 'Abd-al-Rahim Murad in the Central Political Council and the election of Murad to the Executive Committee.

Step Backward

These resolutions have certainly bolstered the position of the Communist Party and of the Communist Action Organization, especially in Beirut, by way of the important political cover provided by Damacus through the Ba'th Party Organization and the cover provided by the Druze sect through the Socialist Progressive Party which is almost considered the sect's indisputable party. To understand all this, it is necessary for us to backtrack a little to the two months preceding the adoption of these resolutions to understand the direction that the events were threatening to take and to learn the reasons that caused the changes in the expectations that had actually been imminent. In this regard, higher partisan and political sources in Beirut have given AL-HADAF the following account of the story of the developments:

These sources say that it had been expected, even definite and certain, that announcement would be made of the formation of a political front comprised of the Socialist Progressive Party, al-Murabitun and Amal and that this front would become the sole spokesman and political and military representative of the Muslim sects in Lebanon. Just for the sake of information, al-Murabitun is a political and military organization with broad and evident influence in Western Beirut, especially where the traditional Islamic leaderships [fa'aliyat] are centered, while Amal is a political and military organization with a very broad influence among the Shi'ite Muslims. With the unification of these three organizations, unity, cohesion and solidarity would have been established among the three Muslim sects in Lebanon, namely: The Sunna, the Shi'ites and the Druzes.

Such a probability which had been certain and definite to materialize would have been capable of creating fundamental changes in the Lebanese relations and balances. Unification of the three Muslim sects under the leadership of three strong and effective parties with a generally good reputation among the Muslim masses would have meant forcing the other local and external political sides to reassess their concept of who is the true representative of the Muslims in Lebanon and would have brought into focus the following ever-present argument cited by Pierre al-Jumayyil, the leader of the isolationist rightist Phalanges Party which has strong relations with the Zionist entity at present: We don't know with whom to conduct the dialogue. Pierre al-Jumayyil meant this, of course, to be a reference to the disunity and multiplicity of the Muslim political axes and leaderships and to underline the impossibility of saying that there is a sufficiently strong and influential Muslim leadership with which to hold the dialogue and to contest, both with weapons and with words.

Position of Communists

This is a first consequence that could have resulted immediately [from the unification]. A second consequence which would have actually resulted from the first one would have put the communists--(both the party and the organization) in particular and, consequently, the leftist forces following a Marxist conviction and course--in a very tight corner and could have even made it possible to disregard them completely and deny them any weight in the actual calculation of the local forces. The truth is, say these sources, that the communists move and work in the Islamic street alone. In addition to being a [member of the] National Movement, the Central Political Council, the regional political councils and a military faction operating in the Islamic areas and in the south and in addition to having good relations with the Palestinian resistance leadership, the communists project themselves as the real representatives of the Lebanese people generally. But under the state of sectarian division, they believe firmly that they are the true representatives of the Muslims and of the Shi'ite Muslim man-in-the-street at least. Therefore, they view the other Muslim political forces operating in this street with suspicion and doubt and describe them as being sectarian, conventional, reactionary and so forth.

Strong Allies

The three aforementioned parties--al-Murabitun, the Socialist Progressive and Amal--could have actually produced a final solution to this problem, i.e. they could have brought to the Islamic street [sic] a harmony, unity and cohesion which it actually lacks. This being the case, the Palestinian resistance would, naturally, reassess its local alliances because, as we have already said, these three parties exercise evident control over the Islamic street. As for the communist parties and organization, they rely mainly on strong allies who have good relations with the Palestinian resistance primarily and then with Syria generally, with Iraq, the Soviet Union and Libya. All of these are influential, capable and strong forces. But with the emergence of a new, strong and effective alliance consisting of the Socialist Progressive Party, al-Murabitun and Amal, these strong and capable forces would be compelled to reexamine quickly their relations with the local forces, meaning that they would have to weave strong and clear relations of alliance with the leaders of this new alliance in the Islamic street.

Resistance and Unity

To make matters clear, these sources add, we must say that the Palestinian resistance wants, seeks and would be a thousand times more interested if the Islamic Street were more united and harmonious and if the divisions and axes present in it did not exist altogether. The resistance is paying in part the price of this disunity and division. While having good relations with the communists, the resistance also has good and firm relations with the Socialist Progressive Party, al-Murabitun and Amal. The resistance exerted efforts in 1976 to unite all these forces in a broad front. Then the broad national front slogan was projected in 1977 and 1978, but to no avail. The broad national front including, or supposed to include, all the effective political forces in the Islamic street has continued to be one degree or another a concern and, at the same time, a hope--a concern felt by the people in charge of this Islamic street and a hope that occurs to the minds of the ordinary people who pay an extremely exorbitant and indescribable price every day as a result of the multiplicity, division and conflicts existing in this street. Consequently, the resistance would not have been harmed by the rise of a new and strong alliance consisting of the three aforementioned parties, which have their credibility in the Islamic street, even though such an alliance would turn over--and it was hoped that this would be done quietly--the page of the communists in the street and would turn the Central Political Council into a link with no actual importance. This is what had been expected with certainty, the sources say. All this had been clear to the minds of those concerned, both at home and abroad.

In the face of all this, active efforts were exerted, as made evident recently by the dimensions of the surprise, to contain this probability and to prevent it from materializing. Naturally, what was required of the Central Political Council and of the communists was the following: First, seek to gain favors from Damacus by giving the Ba'th Party Organization a leadership position, perhaps the actual leadership position if necessary, in the Central Political Council. Second, give the Socialist Progressive Party chairman the position of chairman of the Central Political Council to prevent his rapprochement with Amal and al-Murabitun. This is what has actually happened after secret mediations, meetings and discussions that have led to the resolutions that we noted at the beginning of these words.

Frustration and Miscarriage

These resolutions have foiled finally, it seems, the creation of a tripartite alliance in the Islamic street comprised of the aforementioned forces. These resolutions have also thwarted finally the National Pan-Arab Front [al-jabhah al-qawmiyah al-wataniyah] which was led by the Socialist Ba'th Party Organization with the Union of the Working People's Forces (led by Kamal Shatila), thus abandoning yesterday's allies to fend for themselves. These resolutions have also put al-Murabitun, a party which is still participating in the National Movement but with many reservations, before two possibilities: Either bolster its presence and role in the Central Political Council or choose the path of a final breakaway. The resolutions have also caused Amal to be relatively exposed because it cannot claim that it has with Damascus and the PLO better relations than the Central Political Council parties have with Damacus and the PLO. Naturally, such difference in the level of the relations of alliance has a significant return insofar as the calculations pertaining to the past and the future are concerned. The first reaction to these resolutions that have paralyzed the efforts for an alliance between the Socialist Progressive Party, al-Murabitun and Amal has come from al-Murabitun which has issued a detailed political statement underlining its reservations toward the National Movement and the Central Political Council and pointing out that "our organization has expressed its reservation and continues to express its reservation on any internal organizational step taken by the National Movement on bases other than those demanded by al-Murabitun for years, but not taken into consideration." Thus, al-Murabitun Organization has stayed in the Central Political Council outwardly but is out of it practically. The resolutions [of Central Political Council] were issued on 11 December 1979. Yet, by 13 June 1980 no noteworthy reactions appeared. What draws attention is that silence has been the most prominent reaction to the resolutions, especially by Amal, the Syrian Social National Party and the Union of the People's Working Forces. In any case, these resolutions have cuaght by surprise all those who had been observing and who had expected other developments to which we referred at the outset of this article. The resolutions have also brought up anew the issue of the armed conflict that erupted recently between the communists and Amal in Beirut's southern suburb. After all that has happened, the question now is: Will the armed conflict erupt anew between these sides and how will Amal respond to these resolutions?

Finally, the scurce [sic] says: Expect interesting and sudden developments at a later time.

We say: God spare the Lebanese more bloodbaths and save all from this tribulation.

AMAL LEADER DISCUSSES RELATIONS WITH NATIONAL MOVEMENT, PALESTINIANS

Kuwait AL-WATAN in Arabic 20 Jun 80 p 11

[Interview With Nabih Barri, Chairman of Amal Movement Command Council, by Kazim 'Uwayd; Nabih Barri to AL-WATAN: "Amal and Palestinian Resistance in One Trench; Settlement Tune Is Factor for Unity and not Division; We Support Army's Entry into South to Bring Haddad's Mini-State to End; Damascus Agreement Is New Book That Protects Relations on National Arena; No Cooperation With Sectarian Entities or With Enemy Supporters; Iranian Leadership Doesn't Want Any Disagreement to Occur Between Us and Palestinian Resistance"]

[Text] Amal Movement, in the person of its founder Imam Musa al-Sadr, the chairman of the Supreme Islamic Shi'ite Council, participated with the Lebanese National Movement in formulating the political reform program. Amal was also a fundamental partner in founding the National Front. But it then disagreed with the National Movement when the latter came up with the civil administration plan at the time the Arab Deterrence Force entered Lebanon in 1976 because Amal viewed this plan as a partition threat.

Even though the civil administration page was turned over long ago, the disagreement between Amal Movement and the National Movement has grown and has been nurtured by numerous other factors. It recently developed into bloody clashes between Amal Movement members and elements of some parties of the National Movement in al-Nabatiyah, southern Lebanon, and then in the southern suburb of Beirut, the capital. Those clashes posed the threat of serious ramifications but the Syrian and Palestinian leaderships hastened to deal with the situation and to get the two sides together in Damascus where a statement was issued defining the means to contain the fires of the sedition and to deal with the development of the situation.

No Cooperation With Enemy

Lawyer Nabih Barri, chairman of the Fatah Movement Command Council, has dealt with the disagreement issue and has given an assessment of the outcome of the Damascus talks in an interview with AL-WATAN, saying: There has been no disagreement over the principles in which Amal Movement believes. Rather, the disagreement has centered on the faulty approach followed to deal with every situation in which differences, even if they are childish, erupt.

Regarding the agreement resulting from the quadrilateral meeting in Damascus, Barri has said: It is tantamount to a new book that protects the relations on the national arena and that contributes to a large degree toward realizing the Lebanese national detente and the Lebanese-Palestinian understanding which, we hope, will constitute a good access to moving the stubborn Lebanese crisis and saving the country from the talons of the plotters and of the Zionist enemy.

Lawyer Nabih Barri has refused to respond to the accusations leveled against Amal and has described them as fabrications, saying: "There is absolutely no cooperation with the advocates of sectarian entities and there is absolutely no cooperation with the Zionist enemy or his supporters. Cooperation with the Zionist enemy is proscribed, as Imam al-Sadr has taught us."

Following is the text of AL-WATAN's interview with Nabih Barri:

Army Between Two Roles

[Question] You demand the army's entry into the south and you call for its deployment in the other areas when the need arises whereas the National Movement objects to the army's present structure and does not feel reassured by its command. How do you comment on this issue?

[Answer] Our position toward this issue consists of two parts: The first concerns the army's deployment in southern Lebanon and the second concerns its deployment in the capital and its suburbs. Concerning the first part, we support the Lebanese army's entry into the entire south, beginning with the border strip, in order to put an end to Sa'd Haddad's mini-state and to all the direct and indirect extensions of the Zionist enemy and to rescue the southern inhabitants from the atrocities inflicted upon them every day, and even every hour. When the homeland's borders are exposed to aggression, when parts of its territories are faced with the threat of occupation while other parts are actually occupied and when the inhabitants of the south are divided into displaced and tormented, then there is no place for a discussion on the sex of the angels. Protecting the homeland, whose gate is the south, deserves greater attention than the sect of this or that officer and whether this position should belong to that officer and that position to this officer. Getting rid of Sa'd Haddad's mini-states and of the woes it brings the south and the southerners, such as the murder and kidnapping of innocent people, threatening the homeland's entity and the protection money that Haddad levies on the citizens, is a lot more important than the existing objections to the manner in which the army is structured. We have informed the resistance movement leadership frankly of this position and we have declared it openly. While aspiring for the Lebanese army to be a national and pan-Arab [qawmi] army capable of defending the homeland and of undertaking the requirements of the Arab causes, we still support the army's entry into the south even though it doesn't fully meet the qualities that we have mentioned. In the face of the greater danger the ambiguities over which there are objections take second place. I want to stress here that I have not heard from the resistance and the National Movement arguments that refute this argument.

As for the second part, i.e. the deployment of the army in the capital and its suburbs, we have another and opposite position for several considerations:

First, the army's real place is the country's borders and across the enemy. It is not its mission to perform the duty of traffic police in the capital and its suburbs. Second, if the need arises for the army to perform its duty in the city, then the army should be non-sectarian, balanced and acceptable to all. As long as the army is not balanced and is not acceptable to all, its entry into the capital will act as an explosion factor and not as a factor facilitating the Lebanese national detente for which the issue of deploying the army in the capital and the suburbs is brought up. Therefore, Amal Movement has supported the army's entry into the south and has not supported its deployment in the capital and its suburbs out of its national visualization of the issues and not for the considerations rumored, very regrettably, by many.

Abu-'Ammar Agrees

[Question] While adopting this position, have you taken into consideration the resistance fears that the army's entry into the south will not be in its interest and that the army command may have objectives other than those which you seek?

[Answer] I will answer this question with another question: Is it in the interest of the Palestinian resistance that Haddad's mini-state continue to exist? The answer: Of course not.

Another question: Is it in the interest of the Palestinian resistance that other parts of the Arab homeland, especially southern Lebanon, be occupied? The answer: No.

A third question: Is it in the interest of the Palestinian resistance that the Zionist enemy find a pretext through which to realize its expansionist goals, namely control of the water sources and termination points--especially since the enemy's ambitions in Lebanon in this regard are well known and certain? The answer is also no.

Moreover, is it in the interest of the resistance that the inhabitants of the south be displaced by Sa'd Haddad, and the Zionist enemy behind him, under the pretext of the uncontrollable situation there and the weakness of the U.N. Forces? The answer is no and no again.

On the contrary, Amal Movement views the stay of the southerner on his land, putting an end to Sa'd Haddad's mini-state, implementation of U.N. Security Council resolution No 425 and return of the evicted southerners to the border strip as a great service to the Palestinian cause itself. Moreover, safeguarding the south against occupation is no longer just a Lebanese demand but an Arab and a Palestinian demand. The southerner has shouldered the burden of the Palestinian cause since 1948 and has endured all its tragedies and pains and dreamt of its dreams throughout this period to the point where the words of Mr al-Bu'ayjan, the ambassador of Kuwait, that "the southerner is almost the sole Arab in this Arab nation" apply truly to this southerner. Therefore, there is no conflict between the Palestinian resistance's goals, which are the liberation of the land and of the people, and Amal Movement's goals which are liberation of the south from the yoke of the torture under which it writhes every day. I will be divulging no secret when I say that I discussed this issue with brother Abu-'Ammar during the recent Damacus meeting and that he agreed with our visualization.

New National Book

[Question] On the mention of the Damascus meeting, what is your assessment of the outcome of the meeting and how do you view your future relations with the resistance and the Lebanese national forces?

[Answer] As you know, the Damascus meeting took place as a result of a fraternal initiative and a national mediation on the part of the fraternal Syria in the wake of the violent battles that erupted in southern Lebanon and in the southern suburb of Beirut and which almost erupted among the brothers in Burj al-Barajinah and al-Burj Camp. The talks were complex and difficult and consumed 30 hours out of the total of 48 hours that the Amal delegation spent in Damascus. There was no disagreement over the principles in which Amal Movement believes or those on whose premise the Palestinian resistance movement acts. The disagreement centered over the faulty approach followed to deal with every case in which a difference, even a childish difference, erupts. As a result of bilateral, trilateral and quadrilateral meetings, a plenary meeting was held under the chairmanship of Syrian Foreign Minister 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam and was attended by nearly all the resistance factions and the National Movement, in addition to Amal Movement. The meeting ended with an agreement to form a quadrilateral (Amal, the resistance, the National Movement and the National Front) coordination committee to deal with any problem that may crop up, to exert efforts to confine and contain it within its basic dimensions and to prevent its spilling over or causing a comprehensive explosion. This came in the wake of an agreement on principles that were declared in a statement calling for safeguarding the resistance right and the Palestinian right, preserving Lebanon's sovereignty and independence and rejecting resettlement. In the wake of the conclusion of this agreement which was signed by all parties concerned, we have actually felt that it was tantamount to a new book that protects the relations on the national arena and contributes to a large degree toward realizing the Lebanese national detente and the Lebanese-Palestinian understanding which, we hope, will constitute a good access for moving the crisis and saving the country from the talons of the plotters and of the Zionist enemy. We also hope that this agreement will prevent the eruption of any harmful explosion, especially since we in Amal Movement are fully eager for tranquility so that we may have the opportunity to direct our total attention to the south that is threatened by the common enemy. The weapons are not for Beirut's alleys and suburbs and only those lacking thought resort to them. We are people with a creed and we try with amicable means. We only draw our weapons to defend our principles and ourselves.

Israel Is Absolute Evil

[Question] It is said that elements of the Liberal Party and others from the Duxieme Bureau took part in the southern suburb clashes on the side of Amal. What do you say to these accusations?

[Asnwer] There is no time to pause before these fabrications and trivialities. We need testimony of partiotism from nobody. The history of Amal Movement puts us in the ranks of those who give testimony of patriotism to others. There is absolutely no cooperation with the advocates of the sectarian entities and there is absolutely no cooperation with the enemy. Cooperation with the Zionist enemy is proscribed, as Imam al-Sadr has taught us. He who is underprivileged on his land should support him who is deprived of his land, as Imam Musa al-Sadr has taught us. Moreover, Israel is an absolute evil and whoever stands against it becomes in our view, in one way or another, an absolute good. The greatness of Amal Movement lies in the fact that it is not spared the allegations of the tendentious.

We Are Against Sectarianism

[Question] Each of the National Movement, the Palestinian resistance movement and Amal Movement has good relations with the Islamic revolution in Iran. Isn't this fact fit as an inlet to a national understanding?

[Answer] It is well-known that the Iranian revolution gives all its momentum and support to Palestine and the Palestinian revolutionaries. It also views southern Lebanon with concern and is eager for Lebanon's sovereignty and independence. It thus follows the same line on which Amal Movement had been built before the Islamic revolution triumphed. This intellectual agreement, in addition to the spiritual agreement, have made us view the Iranian revolution with pride and honor. But this position of ours is not based on the narrow sectarian aspect, as some people try to depict it. Amal Movement is against the sectarian aspect, as some people try to depict it. Amal Movement is against the sectarian entitles and against sectarian politics. It fights a despotic ruler even if he is a Shi'ite Muslim, as Imam al-Sadr has taught us. It is against a sectarian state, even if such a state were a Shi'ite Muslim state. We are Muslim Arabs who view our Arab-Islamic heritage as a path, a pioneer and an ethic. However, we reject the sectarian projections. There is an enormous and vast difference between piety and sectarianism. The first is ours, God willing. As for the second, we reject and renounce it for ourselves and for others.

[Answer] We know that the Iranian leadership does not want any disagreement to erupt between us and the Palestinian resistance. We know from our brothers in Iran, who notified us during Foreign Minister Sadegh Ghotbzadeh's visit to Lebanon, that they are eager for our principles to meet with the Palestinian revolution's principles because they emanate from the same source. Therefore, there was no Iranian leadership, contrary to what some people try to disseminate. The mediation was the result of conviction in Amal and in its cadres and principles, in addition to the good offices exerted by the Syrian leadership, without forgetting the Iranian direction in the first place.

We Don't Seek Explosion

[Question] What are the roots of the disagreement with the communists that made them take part in the clashes against you?

[Answer] The truth is that we have been surprised in the latest conflagration by the Lebanese Communist Party's involvement in the clashes in al-Nabatiyah area, particularly in Zifta, and then in the southern suburb, keeping in mind that the harbingers of this position were present in the speech that George Hawi, the Lebanese Communist Party secretary general, made at the Arab University of Beirut almost a month ago. We imagined at the time that what was said in the speech was something transient, especially after Hawi visited me and after we discussed this issue. There was no disagreement over what was discussed. However, the [communist party's] field position reaffirmed what had been said in the speech and what Hawi had denied during the visit. In the plenary meeting in Syria, there was a frank reproof and we discussed the situation in detail. George Hawi asserted anew that the communist party has no intention to confront Amal Movement or to take a hostile position toward it. He has signed the joint communique issued by the Damascus quadrilateral meeting. We hope that this position is final because, as I have already pointed out, we are not advocates of intensification and we do not want to be preoccupied with sidebattles that are of no benefit whatsoever to the fundamental national issue.

Amal and Resistance in Same Trench

[Question] How do you evaluate the relationship of Amal Movement with the Palestinian resistance in light of the recent developments?

[Answer] The relationship of Amal Movement with the Palestinian resistance dates back to the time when the Movement emerged. As for our relationship with the Palestinian people, it dates back to 17 years before the rise of the resistance movement itself. If others have shouldered the burden of the Palestinian cause since 1967 or 1975, we southerners have shouldered it since 1948, as I have already said. As for Amal as a movement, it was created on the basis of a charter drawn up by Imam Musa al-Sadr stating frankly the duty of a member of Amal Movement to protect and defend the Palestinian resistance and to believe in the Palestinian right. The charter also states that the liberation of Jerusalem is a duty that this member shoulders before anything else. This has been embodied in our defense of the resistance in al-Shiyah, al-Nab'ah, Tall al-Za'tar, Burj Hammud and in every other area where clashes have taken place on the Lebanese arena since the outbreak of the 1975 war and until this day. What is amazing is that the bomb that the enemy hurls on the south hits both the Palestinian and the southerner simultaneously and yet you find those who come and tell you: Amal wants to liquidate or confront the Palestinian resistance! The relations remained strong and firm until the tune of resettlement [of the Palestinians in the south] began to be heard recently and began to play havoc with the souls. This made it seem as if Amal's interest is in conflict with the Palestinian resistance's interest in southern Lebanon. Because the southerner is enduring what he is enduring for the Palestinian cause, it has become the duty of the Palestinian to reaffirm daily his concern for southern Lebanon and his strong eagerness that is not superceded by any consideration to cooperate with Amal in particular so that no opportunity may be given to the plot to infiltrate and to sow sedition among those who are in the same trench. If resettlement is accepted by the Palestinian, then this resettlement is a plot against him before it is against others. A Palestinian who accepts, God forbid, land other than his own land is one who has abandoned his land and his cause at the same time.

As long as the Palestinians refuse to be resettled in Lebanon or anywhere else and as long as the southerners do the same, then the right thing is for this refusal to unite rather than divide them. This is what Amal Movement seeks and aspires for. The plotters are actually trying to sow sedition between Amal Movement and the Palestinian resistance so that both sides may be exhausted because only then will the plotters realize their goals without any resistance.

BANKING ACTIVITY FOR 1979 REVIEWED

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 29 Jun 80 p 6

[Article: "Beirut Chamber (of Commerce and Industry) Report on Banking Activity in 1979; Increase of 32.6 Percent in Resources and 38.7 Percent in Compensations; Bank of Lebanon Measures Reduce Rise in Supply of Money in Circulation"]

[Text] The Studies Center of the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry has prepared a report on the 1979 banking activity, pointing out that the unified budget of the banks has recorded an increase of 31 percent over 1979, that the increase rate in the resources has amounted to 32.6 percent and that there has been a noticeable increase of 38.7 percent in investments.

The banking investments [in 1979] amounted to 23.473 billion Lebanese pounds, of which 40 percent was used in foreign investments. The commercial sector got 51.7 percent of the investments, the agricultural sector 2.2 percent and industry 17 percent.

The report points out that loans to the industrial sector were short- and medium-range loans used to finance foreign transactions. It asserts that this expansion in investments has led to a drop in liquidity, thus affecting the interest rate prices paid for the Lebanese pound.

The report also points out that the currency volume increased by 26.7 percent in 1979 and the currency in circulation increased by only 6.6 percent whereas this increase amounted to 20.4 percent in 1978. The report attributes the drop to the measures taken by the Bank of Lebanon.

Following are the most important contents of the report:

The banking statistics available from the unified budget of the banks show that this budget recorded an increase of 31 percent in 1979 over 1978 despite the slow improvement in the other economic sectors. (Chart No 1)

Chart No 1. Development of Unified Situation of Commercial Banks (In millions of Lebanese pounds)

Year	Value	Development
		In Figures	In Percentage
End of 1974	11,411	--	--
End of 1975	12,755	+ 1,344	+ 11.78
End of 1976	12,843	+ 88	+ 0.69
End of 1977	16,174	+ 3,331	+ 25.94
End of 1978	18,987	+ 2,803	+ 17.3
End of 1979	24,876	+ 5,889	+ 31.0

In 1977, the increase in resources (43 percent) exceeded the increase in investments (21.2 percent) and the 2 were parallel in 1978. This led to an enormous liquidity in the banks. But the revival of the economic activity in 1979 led to a noticeable increase of 38.7 percent in the investments compared to an increase of 32.6 percent in the resources.

Banking Resources

The relative improvement in the security situation in 1979 led to an increase in the foreign transfers as compared to 1978. The banking resources amounted to 18.334 billion Lebanese pounds in 1979, i.e. with an increase of 4.508 billion Lebanese pounds, compared to an increase of 2.207 billion Lebanese pounds in 1978. (Chart No 2)

Chart No 2. Banking Resources (In millions of Lebanese pounds)

	On-Demand Deposits		Set-Term Deposits		Foreign Currency Deposits		Total
	Value	Percent	Value	Percent	Value	Percent	Value	Percent
End of 1977	2,300	20	6,716	58	2,595	22.3	11,609	100
End of 1978	2,822	20.4	8,385	60	2,696	19.5	13,826	100
End of 1979	3,152	17	9,576	52	5,606	30.5	18,334	100
End of 1978 compared to End of 1977	+ 522	+22.6	+1,669	+24.8	+ 101	+3.8	+2,207	+19.0
End of 1979 compared to End of 1978	+ 330	11.6	+1,191	14.0	+2,910	108.0	+4,508	32.6

We notice the following trends in the distribution of resources:

A decline in the on-demand deposits in comparison to the total deposits from 20.4 percent in 1978 to 17 percent in 1979.

A decline in the set-term deposits from 60 percent in 1978 to 52 percent in 1979.

A large increase in the rate of deposits in foreign currencies from 19.5 percent in 1978 to 30.5 percent in 1979.

Contrary to 1978 when the foreign currency deposits amounted to only 3.8 percent, the increase rate in this case amounted to 108 percent in 1979.

This is due to the drop in the interest rate price paid for the Lebanese pound on the one hand and to the unprecedented enormous rise in the interest rate price paid for the dollar and the pound sterling.

Interest rate among the banks rose from 1 percent to 11 percent in the first quarter of 1980.

As a result, the Central Bank has adopted measures to curtail the transfer of Lebanese currency into foreign currencies.

Banking investments

The banking investments amounted to 23.473 billion Lebanese pounds in 1979, with an increase of 6.553 billion Lebanese pounds compared to an increase of 2.644 billion Lebanese pounds in 1978. (Chart No 3)

Chart No 3. Development of Banking Investments (In million Lebanese pounds)

	End of 1977	End of 1978	End of 1979	End of 1978 Compared to End of 1977		End of 1979 Compared to End of 1978
				Value	Percent	Value	Percent
Foreign Investments	5,770	6,052	9,379	+ 282	+ 4.8	+3,327	+55
Loans to Private Sector	7,919	9,792	12,894	+1,873	+23.6	+3,102	+31.6
Loans to Public Sector	475	949	1,066	+ 474	+99.7	+ 117	+12.3
Stocks	112	127	134	+ 15	+13.3	+ 7	+ 5.5
Total	14,276	16,920	23,473	+2,644	+18.5	+6,553	+38.7

A total of 40 percent of the capital was used in foreign investments compared to 35.7 percent in 1978, keeping in mind that most of the deposits come from residents.

The commercial sector--imports, exports and domestic trade--got a share of 51.7 percent whereas agriculture got only a 2.2 percent share and industry a 17 percent share, keeping in mind that most of the loans advanced to the industrial sector are short- and medium-range loans used to finance foreign transactions. Added to this is the fact that these capitals [loans] may have been used for nonindustrial purposes, such as construction.

This requires that more accurate banking statistics be made available on the utilization of loans in the industrial and agricultural sectors.

Loans to Private Sector

Loans to the private sector increased by 31.2 million Lebanese pounds in 1979, i.e. by 31.6 percent. It is to be noted that 63 percent of the loans were advanced in the first half of the year, rising by 9 percent in the first quarter of the year and by 10 percent in the second quarter, whereas the rate increase amounted to only 4 percent in the third quarter and to 5 percent in the fourth quarter.

The reason for the decline in loan-increase rate as of the beginning of the second half of 1979 is due to the measures taken by the Bank of Lebanon to freeze real estate speculation and to safeguard the soundness of the national currency.

Circulars [issued by Central Bank of Lebanon] restricting loans to private sector to Lebanese pounds:

Circular No 236, dated 8 June 1979.
Circular No 243, dated 27 July 1979.

Circulars on depositing compulsory reserves in Bank of Lebanon:

Circular No 220, dated 24 February 1979.
Circular No 225, dated 3 April 1979.
Circular No 228, dated 12 April 1979.
Circular No 243, dated 26 May 1979.
Circular No 240, dated 25 June 1979.

Foreign Investments

Foreign investments rose in 1979 by 3.327 billion Lebanese pounds or by 55 percent whereas this increase amounted to only 4.8 percent in 1978.

The fundamental reason for this increase in foreign investments is the enormous increase in the interest rate paid for the dollar and the pound sterling.

Thus, contrary to the 2 preceding years when the increase in resources exceeded the increase in investments in 1977 and when the 2 were equal in 1978, the increase in investments was bigger in 1979 than the increase in resources.

This expansion in investments led to a drop in liquidity and this drop brought about the developments concerning the interest rate paid for the Lebanese pound.

These developments show that the Lebanese banking system is no longer suffering from the enormous liquidity which characterized it in previous years.

Currency Volume

The total currency volume rose by 26.7 percent in 1979 compared to 19.8 percent in 1978 (chart No 4). This increase is reflected in a definite manner in the elements forming the currency situation, namely:

1. Currency Liquidity: The 8.7 percent growth in the currency volume in 1979 is a small growth when compared to the growth of 21.4 percent in 1978.

The currency in circulation in 1979 rose by 6.6 percent whereas this increase amounted to 20.4 percent in 1978.

The same applies to credit currency [al-naqd al-rasidi] which rose by 22.6 percent in 1978 and by no more than 11 percent in 1979.

Despite this, the elements forming the currency situation have not changed: The currency in circulation represents 52 percent whereas the on-demand deposits put in banks represent only 47.1 percent.

This phenomenon is in contrast to the transaction means used in the advanced countries which attach greater significance to bank accounts than to currency circulation.

2. Semi-Currency

The semi-currency [shibh al-naqd] volume grew by 37 percent in 1979 compared to 19 percent in 1978. This percentage is high when compared with the growth of the currency liquidity (8.7 percent).

The set-term deposits increased by 14 percent, compared to 25 percent in 1978. These deposits form 63 percent of the total semi-currency whereas they represented 75.7 percent in 1978.

Chart No 4. Comparative Increase in Currency Volume
(Changes in Liquidity)

	End of 1978		End of 1979
	Value	Percentage	Value	Percentage
Currency liquidity increase	1,086	21.4	536	8.7
Money in circulation	557	20.4	220	6.6
Money assets	529	22.6	316	11.0
Increase in semi-money	1,770	19.0	4,101	37.0
Set-term deposits	1,669	25.0	1,191	14.0
Foreign currency deposits	101	4.0	2,910	108.0
Increase in currency volume	2,856	19.8	4,601	26.7

Deposits in foreign currency recorded an enormous increase amounting to 108 percent whereas this increase amounted to only 4 percent in 1978. The total value of these deposits in the semi-currency rose from 24.3 percent in 1978 to 37 percent in 1979.

This phenomenon is due to two reasons:

First, the decline in private investment and its refrainment from embarking on the construction of new projects because of the high costs and the turbulent security.

Second, the rise in the interest rates paid for foreign currency.

This large increase in the foreign assets has led to curtailing the increase in the currency liquidity which has come to represent only 30.6 percent of the currency volume whereas it represented 35.7 percent of this volume in 1978.

FOREIGN TRADE ACTIVITY FOR 1979 REVIEWED

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 30 Jun 80 p 7

[Article: "Beirut Chamber (of Commerce and Industry) Report on Foreign Trade in 1979; Exports Total 2.698 Billion Lebanese Pounds, Reexports 940 Million and Imports 7.8 Billion; Lebanese Economy Missed Opportunity Worth Billions of Pounds Because of Security Crises"]

[Text] The Economic Studies and Documentation Center of the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry has issued a report on the 1979 foreign trade--a practice which the center established last year. It is learned from this report that the value of the 1979 Lebanese exports amounted to 2.698 billion Lebanese pounds and the value of reexported goods amounted to 940.4 million Lebanese pounds compared to imports amounting in value to 7.8 billion Lebanese pounds.

The report relies in its estimates on the fact that the goods exported in accordance with a certificate of origin issued by the Beirut Chamber of Commerce represent 65 percent of the value of the Lebanese exports and that the customs fees collected for imported goods range from 8 to 10 percent.

With the improved security conditions at the outset of 1977, the Lebanese exports experienced continuous monthly increases. The monthly export rate for the second half of 1977 amounted to 240 million Lebanese pounds. It had been expected that these exports would rise to much higher rates in 1978 as a result of the capital spending aimed at rebuilding the 25 percent of the production capacity destroyed during the 2-year war and at setting up new projects.

But the period of security did not last and the frequent, intensifying and longer security setbacks in 1978 had a direct negative impact on the export volume and on the immunity of the production structures. The average export rate in the second half of 1978 dropped to the level at which it had started at the beginning of 1977. It seems as if the Lebanese economy has become the captive of the initial maelstrom and that whenever it looks as if this economy is about to awaken, something develops to obstruct its march.

1/2 [sic], Drop in Industry To Rebuild Production:

It is evident from the monthly development of the 1979 Lebanese exports that these exports were not able to make up for the losses incurred as a result of the destruction of the installations in 1978 and of the bitter security gulps with which the economic activity is still choking. The highest monthly export rate in 1979 amounted to 221 million pounds, at the 1977 prices, whereas the comparative rate in 1977 amounted to 277 million Lebanese pounds. This shows that the immunity of the production structures dropped to levels below those of 1977 and this poses a threat to the future of production in Lebanon. It may be beneficial to estimate the volume of the direct export losses in 1978 and 1979 if the security situation had not deteriorated after 1977.

1/3, Estimate of Direct Losses in Export Volume as Result of Security Setbacks:

It is evident from the available figures that the Lebanese exports passed through four phases in the past 3 years:

First phase: January-July 1977 or the phase of a breather in the first 3 months and then of a rapid and solid upsurge at a rate of 210 million pounds monthly.

Second phase: July 1977-June 1978 phase which was characterized by stability when the exports remained unchanged despite some security setbacks, beginning with February 1978. The average monthly value of the exports in this phase amounted to 225 million pounds.

Third phase: The August 1978-October 1978 phase in which the average monthly exports dropped to 10 million pounds. This phase was characterized by a rapid drop in the value of the exports as a result of the total and partial destruction caused to the production installations and to stoppage of work in the Beirut Port which is the most important fundamental facility to the Lebanese economy because it constitutes a gate for the importation of the raw materials and equipment necessary to continue the production process. This situation led to a drop in the exports from 225 million pounds [monthly] in the preceding phase to 10 million pounds in this phase.

Fourth phase: November 1978-December 1979 or the new preparatory phase in which the exports rose constantly but at small rates and without reaching the 1977 levels.

The lesson we can conclude is that if the Lebanese economy had not been dealt constant blows as a result of the security setbacks, beginning with al-Fayyadiyah incident in February 1978, it would have been possible for the Lebanese producers to embark on capital spending in a period of stability and this would have realized a vast step in making up for the loss incurred by the economy as a result of the 2-year events. It is possible to make a report on the export profits lost in 1978 and 1979.

The average monthly value of the exports amounted to 161 million pounds in 1978 and 225 million pounds in 1979 whereas it could have risen to 237 million pounds at least--an average which the exports achieved in the last quarter of 1977 and the first quarter of 1978. Thus, it is possible that the 1978 and 1979 exports could have amounted to 5.7 billion pounds instead of 3.713 billion pounds.

The direct loss in exports thus amounts to 5.700-3.713 = 1.987 billion Lebanese pounds at the 1977 prices or 2.514 billion Lebanese pounds at the current prices. Considering that the volume of industrial exports represents 60 percent of the production volume (after the events), then the profit missed is 4.19 billion Lebanese pounds.

2. Most Important Types of Exports

2/1 Importance of Industrial Exports: Despite the enormous losses and damage incurred by the industrial installations and equipment. Lebanon is still distinguished from other developing countries by the diversity of its exports on the one hand and by the importance of its industrial exports in comparison to its total exports on the other hand.

Due to the lack of data on industrial production, it is beneficial to make these observations:

Domination of the four conventional sectors by nearly 70 percent, meaning the following by these sectors:

1. The food industries
2. The textile industry
3. Furniture and wood products
4. Construction materials.

The progress realized by the industry through the introduction of some nonconventional industries, such as chemical industries, aluminum and plastic products and transportation equipment, indicates a decline in the domination of the conventional industries.

A rise in the ratio of exports to production from 25 percent before the events to nearly 45 percent at present. (Exports of manufactured Lebanese goods were estimated at 45 percent in 1974 and at 60 [sic] percent after the events as a result of the competition from smuggled goods and the drop in production. This casts doubts on the percentages presented by the report.)

2/2 Types of Exported Goods:

It is evident from an analysis of the chamber statistics concerning Beirut and Mount Lebanon that the most important exports are:

Manufactured goods used in construction: 610 million Lebanese pounds representing 34.8 percent of the total exports with certificates of origin approved by the Chamber of Commerce, compared to 445 million Lebanese pounds in 1978.

Ordinary metals and their products: 267.8 million Lebanese pounds.

Stone, ceramic and glass products: 172.6 pounds.

Mineral products (cement) [sic]: 170.4 million pounds.

Chemical industry products: 287.5 million pounds, compared to 191 million pounds in 1978.

Textiles: 194 million pounds, compared to 152 million pounds in the preceding year.

Paper and paper products: 113 million pounds, compared to 110 million in 1978.

Alcohol and food industry products: 123 million pounds, compared to 74 million in 1978.

3. Markets of Lebanese Exports:

The tightness of the local market and the strong foreign competition against the Lebanese products have urged the Lebanese industries to turn toward exportation, especially to the Arab markets.

Despite the fierce competition facing the Lebanese products, these products still enjoy the ability to reach their traditional Arab markets, especially the markets of Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Iraq and the Gulf countries.

3/1 Exports by Beirut and Mount Lebanon:

The following chart concerning the exports with certificate of origin approved by the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry and representing nearly 65 percent of the total Lebanese exports shows that 91.4 percent of total exports flow to the Arab markets whereas this percentage was around 54 percent in 1974.

Through a comparison with similar exports in 1978, we notice the following:

A. Decline of 5.1 percent in the exports to Jordan, of 2.9 percent in the exports to Kuwait, 1.9 percent in the exports to the Gulf and a decline of 1 percent in the exports to Saudi Arabia.

A rise of 7.4 percent in the exports to Iraq and of 2.7 percent in the exports to Syria.

B. Re-exportation of Goods of Foreign Origin Approved by the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry

The reexportation figures with which this report deals are confined to Beirut and Mount Lebanon because the origin of their reexports is approved by the Beirut Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

1. Development of Exports of Foreign Origin:

Despite the 1978 events and their impact, the exportation of goods of foreign origin continued to rise in the past 3 years, increasing by 33 percent in 1978 and by 42 percent in 1979 and amounting in value to 940 million Lebanese pounds or the equivalent of 54 percent of the exports of Lebanese origin.

2. Most Important Reexported Commodities:

The most important reexported commodities are:

Animal kingdom products: 20 percent
Electrical machinery, equipment and appliances: 12 percent
Lumber: 11 percent
Ordinary metals: 9 percent
Textiles: 9 percent
Transportation equipment: 9 percent.

Geographical Distribution of Source and Destination of Exports of Foreign Origin:

The source of most of the reexported goods is the industrial countries:

The EEC: 41 percent
The Comecon [the Socialist Common Market]: 25 percent
The United States 17 percent.

The destination of 93 percent of the reexported goods is the Arab countries.

Second: Commodity Imports

In view of the delay in issuing foreign trade statistics based on customs data and in view of the increased smuggling in 1979, we have relied on various sources in assessing the Lebanese imports:

A. The foreign trade statistics of the most important countries exporting to Lebanon (such as France, United States, England, FRG and Japan).

A total of 45 to 55 percent of Lebanon's imports in past years relied on the markets of these countries. These imports rose in 1979 to 3.833 billion Lebanese pounds, compared to 2.344 billion pounds and 2.13 billion pounds in 1978 and 1977 respectively, i.e. with an increase of 63 percent over 1978.

B. Customs imports: The customs imports rose in 1979 to 682 million pounds, compared to 541 million pounds and 481 million pounds in 1978 and 1977 respectively, i.e. with an increase of 26 percent and 42 percent over the preceding 2 years.

The customs imports in preceding years represented 10 to 11 percent of the total goods imported. But increased importation through illegal ports is likely to reduce this percentage to 8-9 percent.

On the basis of the aforementioned, Lebanon's commodity imports in 1979 range from 7.3 billion pounds to 7.8 billion pounds, compared to 5.2 billion in 1978 and 4.5 billion in 1977.

Third: 1980 Expectations

A. At Level of Imports: Increased national production and rapid growth in this production are tied to a large degree to the volume of imports. Lebanon used to import 50 percent more than its production to meet its consumption, production and exportation needs.

The imports are distributed as follows:

Nearly 35 percent in intermediate goods (raw materials and semiprocessed goods).

Nearly 40 percent for consumption (goods ready for immediate consumption).

Nearly 12 percent for investment (capital goods).

Nearly 13 percent for reexportation.

In view of Lebanon's rising needs after the war, whether for consumption or investment, it is most likely that imports will rise in both quality and quantity:

1. Insofar as the first category imports (raw materials and semiprocessed goods) are concerned, the Lebanese industry used to rely on these imports by nearly 60 percent. It is most likely that this percentage will rise in the coming years to 70-75 percent as a result of the destruction of some of the local industries producing semiprocessed goods and of the stoppage of others.

2. Insofar as the second category of imports (consumer goods) are concerned, 60 percent of the local market's needs of consumer goods were secured through local production and 40 percent through imports. It is expected that the demand for foodstuffs and consumer goods generally will increase in future years.

3. Insofar as the third category (investment) is concerned, the Lebanese economy's needs for capital goods, whether for the purpose of setting up new plants or for modernizing existing installations, are large. Therefore, it is most likely that there will be a big increase in the importation of equipment, electrical machinery and means of transportation.

It is worth noting that machinery and equipment valued at 419 million Lebanese pounds was imported in 1979 and this shows that there is a broad opportunity for investment in the production sectors when the right atmosphere prevails. After implementation of the decree on the 400 million dollar loan, most of which is set aside for the industrial establishments, it is expected that the investment activity will forge ahead with greater momentum, especially if national detente is established.

All these indications show that the year 1980 is likely to witness an enormous rise in the volume of investments--a volume that may exceed 2.5 billion pounds--because there are repressed capabilities that are waiting for the right time to march forth.

Thus, the faster the Lebanese economic growth, the greater the imports will be.

B. At Level of Exports

As for exports, their volume is tied to increased imports and foreign markets on the one hand and to the dynamic character of the exporters on the other. It is evident that Lebanon's traditional markets in the Arab world are still open for Lebanon's exports in view of the rising needs of these markets.

C. At Level of Balance of Trade

In view of the aforementioned, the deficit in the balance of trade will increase in future years. This deserves a comment.

The surplus services constituted in the past nearly one-quarter of the national income. As a result of the events and of the successive security setbacks, the rate of the economic activity with foreign sources in the national economy's structure has risen to 45 percent. This means that a little less than one-half the income distributed and consumed in Lebanon is the outcome of production activities outside the borders

Added to this are the expenditures by foreigners, the transit activity and the remittances by expatriate Lebanese, all of which generate an increased consumer demand in the local market.

In view of the fact that the production of goods paralleling these incomes has been carried out abroad, these goods have to be imported to establish a balance. Therefore, the deficit in the Lebanese balance of trade does not constitute an unhealthy situation, contrary to what is rumored. The attempt to reduce this deficit is legitimate but the possibility of eliminating the deficit altogether is a pure illusion. As long as it is possible to remit these incomes to Lebanon--and these remittances constitute a fundamental element in Lebanon's economic prosperity--it is necessary to import a volume of goods equal to these incomes. In contrast, when these incomes drop, the deficit in the balance of payments will drop automatically.

It is worth noting here that the drop in the tourist and transit movement as a result of the Lebanese tragedy is largely made up for through the remittances from the Lebanese working in the Arab countries whose numbers, incomes and remittances to their families living in Lebanon--this country which currently has one-third its workforce outside the borders--have doubled during the events.

LIBYA ANTICIPATES EGYPTIAN ATTACK PLANNED BY U.S.

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 30 Jun 80 pp 1, 14

[Interview with Muhammad Mahmud Hijazi, Secretary of the Libyan General People's Committee for Information, by Ahmad Isfahani, in Damascus; date not given]

[Text] Libyan information officer tells AL-SAFIR:

"We expect an Egyptian military attack within a month.

"We will face Sadat with a united front until we bring him down.

"Al-Assad assures us that national boundaries will cease to exist if we are attacked."

The secretary of the Libyan General People's Committee for Information, Muhammad Mahmud Hijazi, denied that Libya has built any barriers, walls, or fortified military lines on its borders with Egypt. He invited observers and journalists to go to the border area to see the situation for themselves.

Hijazi said in an interview with AL-SAFIR in Damascus, during his participation in the emergency conference of Arab cultural ministers, that current Egyptian moves on the Egyptian-Libyan border represent the second phase of the Camp David agreements. A confrontation between the Libyan and Egyptian armies is a matter to be reckoned with, perhaps soon.

Hijazi pointed out that Libya will not start an attack against Egypt, because the Libyan people are committed to Arab unity. However, Libya will repel any act of aggression against its people in self-defense. He said that the issue is not at present purely Libyan, but rather a pan-Arab one, and that President Hafiz al-Assad has assured him that the entire Arab nation will come to Libya's aid if the latter is attacked.

The following is the text of the interview:

[Question] The Egyptian media continues to issue threats to Libya, and there has been an escalation in this media campaign. What is the nature of the current situation on the Egyptian-Libyan border in the light of these threats?

[Answer] Of course, you know well the nature of this issue and of the Egyptian build-up on the border with Libya. Going back to 1977, we find that, before Sadat's shameful visit and surrender to Israel, he waged a lightning war against Libya. Before this, there was a concentrated Egyptian media campaign alleging that Egyptians working in Libya were harassed and badly treated, and demanding that they be protected. At that time, Sadat was trying to find any excuse for a war with Libya. This was part of a plan concocted by American imperialism and world Zionism, and Sadat was the tool for its implementation.

The same programmed events of 1977, which were followed by Sadat's visit to the Zionist entity and his signing of the Camp David agreements, have started all over again. Not long ago, the Egyptian regime announced a one year state of emergency on the Egyptian-Libyan border. The purpose of this announcement was to mass the Egyptian armies, including the second army, on the border. The announcement was accompanied by an escalation in the statements of Egyptian authorities, from Sadat on down to the vice-president, the minister of defense, and senior commanders of the army. An Egyptian media campaign alleged that Col Mu'ammar Qadhdhafi said in his speech of 11 June 1980 that the Libyan army would henceforth point all its weapons toward Egypt and its army. The truth is that this was never said by Qadhdhafi in his speech. On the contrary, the Libyan position on this issue remains the same as in 1977, when we announced that the Egyptians on our border were our brothers and we would never fight them. We said that we were willing to provide them with provisions and food, and we actually did so at that time.

It is clear from Commander Qadhdhafi's speech of 11 June and a recent announcement of the Libyan foreign affairs office, that Libya has declared that Egyptian soldiers on our border are our kin, brothers, and relatives. Libya would not aim weapons against them, unless they commence fighting, in which case it would be a matter of self-defense. We will not fight Egypt, and we have total confidence that the Egyptian army is not completely an agent of Sadat and Zionism.

There are undoubtedly many Arab nationalists in the ranks of the Egyptian army, and they are working against Sadat within Egypt.

American Maneuvers

Our present belief is that the United States has prepared a program for an attack on Libya at this time. We expect direct military confrontation with Egypt, particularly next month when joint maneuvers of the American Air Force and Egyptian military forces take place. America has mobilized extensive resources for these maneuvers, in addition to the weapons which have started pouring into Egypt via an airlift recently established by the U.S.

These maneuvers at this particular time, particularly following the massing of Egyptian forces against Libya, are very meaningful as far as we are concerned. For this reason, our first action was to issue a statement to public opinion, in which we emphasized that we were not prepared to fight our brothers. However, Sadat's action in proclaiming a state of emergency is a unilateral declaration of war. Egyptian preparations are under way in this direction.

The political committee of the pan-Arab front for steadfastness and resistance met and took several positive decisions in keeping with the resolution of the front's recent summit conference that an attack on any country of the front would constitute an attack on all member countries. World public opinion was on Libya's side in the face of the Egyptian threats, as were our Arab brethern in Syria, Democratic Yemen, and Saudi Arabia. These countries showed their solidarity with the Libyan people and issued official communiques condemning the Egyptian threats against Libya.

Confrontation Probable

[Question] This being so, do you expect the next stage to result in an Egyptian-Libyan military clash similar to what happened in 1977?

[Answer] Experience assures us of that, particularly the 1977 experience, when Libyans awoke one morning to find that Egyptian forces had crossed the border, were waging a lightning war, and were attacking the Jamal 'Abd al-Nasir Air Base at Tobruq with military aircraft.

[Question] What preparations is Libya making against this expected Egyptian attack?

[Answer] I pointed to the political side of these in my thorough answer to the first question. In this regard, we are trying to explain to public opinion the nature of the wild Egyptian press campaign, and the meaning of the threats made by the Egyptian authorities. We have also clarified our position of not starting a war except in self-defense. As to the military side of these preparations, I can assure you that we possess sufficient resources to repel any military attack from any direction.

[Question] Do you think that this Egyptian position is the start of a new phase of the plan to implement the Camp David conspiracy?

[Answer] This is true. The Egyptian mobilization against Libya falls within the plans laid at Camp David, and violent Egyptian attacks on Libya represent the second phase of this conspiracy. The fact is that various other phases of this conspiracy may in the future affect member countries of the steadfastness front.

Oil

[Question] Do you think there are reasons which drive Egypt against Libya other than the Camp David conspiracy against steadfastness front countries? Perhaps an Egyptian desire to take over oil wells in border areas?

[Answer] Of course there is an Egyptian movement in this direction. This is also part of the Camp David program. Sadat and officials of his regime claim that Libyan petroleum exceeds the needs of the Libyan people, and that it is not right that the "small" Libyan population should enjoy such great wealth; instead, this wealth should go to the "large" Egyptian population. Indeed, some Egyptian officials claim that Libyan petroleum should go to the "superior people." They mean by this the Egyptian people.

[Question] To what extent did the decisions of the emergency conference of foreign ministers of the steadfastness front represent an appropriate answer to the threats to Libya?

[Answer] These decisions show that Libya is not alone. They also show that confrontation with the Egyptian regime is not solely a Libyan concern, but a comprehensive pan-Arab confrontation concerning the entire Arab nation.

[Question] That is political, but what about steps on the military front?

Al-Assad's Assurances

[Answer] Of course, steps have been taken by the political committee of the steadfastness front in the military field. Yesterday, during our meeting with Syrian President Hafiz al-Assad, the president assured us that national geographic boundaries would cease to exist in the event of an Egyptian attack on Libya, and that all Arabs would join the Libyans in battle with all their strength. Other steadfastness front countries have assured us of the same thing.

Everyone knows that Libya has friends and brothers all over the world. The Libyan people are naturally committted to Arab unity and have no intention of attacking Egypt. It is Sadat who has decided to fight us, and it is he who has decided to declare war. If Sadat actually ignites a war, he will face a united Arab front under which the Libyan and Egyptian peoples will unite to bring him down. We do not think our brothers and friends will fail us in this battle.

Detailed military plans regarding the Sadat regime and its threats against Libya await future developments.

[Question] Do you think that this new phase of Egyptian threats is part of the role assigned by American imperialism to the Egyptian regime in the African continent?

[Answer] The truth is that American and world Zionism have laid a new plan to control the wealth of this area and destroy all national forces and liberation movements in it. The Egyptian regime has been given the role of a policeman in Africa. Indeed, Sadat has done all he was asked to do, for he fought in Zaire and Chad in the name of, and as a representative of, imperialism. He has always said that "Egypt has a responsibility in Africa to protect the interests of imperialism, multinational corporations, and world monopolies."

Sadat asked the African countries to resume relations with the Zionists, after they severed them following the October 1973 war. However, the African nations refused. Sadat is playing a dangerous and destructive role in the Arab world; on the border with Libya; in the conspiracy against Lebanon and against the Iranian revolution, since American planes took off from Egyptian bases to attack Iran; and finally, in the conspiracy against third world nations, African countries, and the cause of freedom everywhere.

The "Libyan Wall"

[Question] The Egyptian media dwells on what it calls a "defensive line" or "big wall" which Libya is said to be building on the border with Egypt. What is the truth about this?

[Answer] This is totally untrue. The Libyan people are committed to Arab unity and would never agree to such artificial borders. During the previous Libyan regime, someone in the army named Abu Wishah wanted to build a big wall between Libya from Egypt. Our position at the time was to totally reject that project. We said that we were committed to Arab unity and could not build any "wall" or "defensive line" to separate Arab nations. Everything that the Egyptian media says about a "big wall" or "new Barlev line" in Libya is lies.

We invite all journalists seeking the truth to visit Libya and inspect border posts, so as to see that these claims are lies. A group of BBC newsmen recently visited the border area and saw for themselves that there is no wall there. The BBC group was accompanied by Abdallah al-Maqri, director for foreign information. They went as close as 15 kilometers from the Egyptian positions, and briefly crossed the international border to observe Egyptian military movements.

Finally, I wish to emphasize that Libyan forces have no aggressive intentions, and that Libya has not sent any additional forces to the border lately. Any journalist can check this fact with his own eyes. We will not attack Egyptian forces, but we will fiercely defend ourselves if attacked.

'LIBERATION' SUMS UP ASSEMBLY SESSION RESULTS

Casablanca LIBERATION in French 18 Jul 80 pp 2-3

[Article: "Parliament Reckoning: A Blocking 'Majority'"]

[Text] Following the closure of the April 1980 session of the House of Representatives, the deputies representing the Ittihadia opposition issued a communique (for the full text see EL MOUHARRIR No 1,922 of 17 July 1980), a summary of which follows:

The Ittihadia opposition reminds, first of all, of the content of its letter addressed to the president of the parliament on the eve of the opening of the spring session, which denounced the inability, carelessness and paralysis afflicting this representative institution of the nation in the face of the real problems experienced by the deprived masses, in general, and the vital questions such as the integration of the Saharian provinces, in particular.

The proceedings of the April session confirmed the fears of the opposition, namely that the "majority" has proven its total ignorance of the deep aspirations and real needs of the people's masses and of the most important national problems, supporting through its presence the policy of the exploiting class which has imposed an official democratic system represented by the existence of a parliament elected under conditions of the known desires of the people and which would like to perpetuate forever this vanished House.

The Ittihadia opposition then analyzes the results of the proceedings of the April session drawing the following conclusions:

1. The parliament totally failed to address itself to the crucial problems of the greatest interest in the struggle waged by the Moroccan nation against the enemies of territorial integrity and the future of the Moroccan people in the political, economic, social and culture domains. The solution of said problems would allow the country to come out of the crisis and lead to a true mobilization of all the vital forces of the nation in the face of the hegemonistic aspirations of Morocco's enemies.

2. The "majority" systematically opposed all draft bills, particularly those of a social nature which could somewhat alleviate the misery of the popular masses. Thus for example the opposition submitted a bill on rentals, hoping to reduce real estate speculation and provide tenants with some guarantees. The motion was fiercely opposed by the majority, which ended by imposing a text based on the principle of the freedom of contract. This means the legalizing of speculation and the continuous rise of rentals.

3. In order to fill the vacuum, three different draft bills were submitted to parliament:

A. Several draft laws favoring individuals or funded agencies without the prior resolution of the control problem. This proves the inability of the rulers to assume full and total responsibility. Let us cite within this framework texts governing the manufacturing, delivery and sales of pharmaceuticals by veterinarians, the creation of the Casablanca airport office, and the justice auxiliary corps.

B. "Theoretical" draft laws based on the fact that the government failed to consider both financial and material conditions for the necessary manpower for the implementation of such legislation. This is also the case of laws regarding the protection of historical monuments, works of art or the audit office.

C. The entirely formal amendments made to previous laws, not worth mentioning here.

Let us recall along this line, since it is a question of draft laws, the draft law on the organization of the referendum. In the course of the debates on the matter, the opposition deputies expressed most specific reservations as to stipulations which could facilitate fraud and falsification of the will of the people. The results of the 30 May 1980 referendum justified this fear. Nevertheless, while noting with satisfaction the participation in the referendum of the troops of the Royal Armed Forces, the members of the auxiliary forces, and police immigrant elements, the opposition demanded that this right be extended to legislative and local consultations; it also proposed that the voting age be lowered to 18.

4. Verbal interpolations, allowing the deputies to start a real dialog with the executive, based on control over governmental activities. The fact alone that the delay of answers, sometimes in excess of two years, and the required procedure which eliminates any debate, have resulted in the fact that the Thursday sessions are of no interest whatever. This resulted in motions submitted by the deputies. However, the growing number of such motions has made it impossible for parliament to debate them, whereas over the last two weeks of the session some resolutions were put on the agenda. This violated the stipulations of the rules of order, or else led to the pure and simple creation, even if considered in their broadest possible context, of new procedures having nothing in common with said rules.

5. Report on the consideration by the House of some draft bills passed by specialized committees. Let us cite the case of the draft bill on the exclusive economic zone: The government postponed sine die the study of the draft which was part of the agenda without citing any valid reason. Furthermore, we know that the government's plan replaced the opposition's motion which had remained blocked for two years! This system has been used in other situations, such as, for example, the draft bills on eminent domain expropriations or the real estate investments code.

6. The action of the opposition deputies, even though it is within the limits of its constitutional rights, seems considerably to bother the officials in charge, who, at the last session, resumed their policy of repression, threats and vague promises, instead of answering questions. That is what happened in the course of the debates on the development of the 30 May 1980 referendum, which was boycotted by the people's masses. The embarrassment of the "majority" leadership was exposed also through the repeated violations of the stipulations of the parliamentary rules, for the implementation of said stipulations would have proved the total failure of the government's antipeople's policy.

7. On the basis of the items on the agenda, in the course of the debate on oral questions and motions, the Ittihadia opposition was able to prove the antipeople's nature of the government's policy in the economic, social and cultural areas, a policy of dependence which led to the aggravation of the recession. Thus the deputies of the USFP [Socialist Union of People's Forces] opposed raising the prices of petroleum products. This indicates the absence of an overall strategy in the energy sector, particularly in the case of a nonpetroleum producing country, and the nature of the structures of revenues and taxes in the budget. This governmental decision equally ignored the nefarious consequences which could follow on the economic and social levels, particularly since Morocco is currently facing quite unfavorable circumstances. The opposition deputies took this opportunity to ask for a raise in salaries, since the purchasing power of the working class was affected by the government's decision.

Furthermore, the Ittihadia opposition denounced the government's policy toward Moroccan workers abroad who are exploited by both capitalist companies and the Moroccan administrative machinery.

In the course of the debates on relations between Morocco and the European Economic Community, the USFP deputies analyzed the real nature of trade between our country and the EEC members and all resulting difficulties, thus proving the dependence of the Moroccan economy. They called for a new strategy which would free the country economically.

Finally, in the final session, the USFP deputies submitted oral and written questions to the ministers, published in EL MOHARRIR, in the defense of the interests of the nation, in general, and of the working class, in particular, in all areas and, above all, in the areas of housing, agriculture and education.

8. Let us note a number of very important motions which were not entered in the agenda of the plenary sessions by the House of Representatives bureau or debates on which were avoided by the government:

A. A motion submitted by the Ittihadia opposition on the situation in our recovered provinces and on the policy of the government in the diplomatic, military and information areas. The opposition used several opportunities to recall the existence of said motion and demand a debate on the question so that parliament could play its natural role of supervising governmental policy in this area.

B. An opposition motion demanding of the government the implementation of the decision of the International Labor Office on the reintegration of education and health employees. On this matter, while noting that the government and "its majority" have systematically refused to assume their responsibilities and have avoided discussing the problem, the opposition noted the decision of His Majesty the King to compensate for the wrongs inflicted on trade union members for launching a legitimate strike, thus meeting the wishes of the democratic forces both inside and outside Morocco.

C. An opposition motion on a review of the practices used by the Moroccan Radio and Television in broadcasting parliamentary debates. However, the "majority" refused to grant priority to this motion, despite its importance.

D. A motion on the poor results of the first session of the baccalaureate examinations, a motion which was "buried," for its debate would have led to the formulation of a new education policy. However, this did not prevent the opposition from letting its viewpoint on this subject be publicly known through the AL MOUHARRIR daily.

E. A letter addressed by the Ittihadia opposition to the president of the House of Representatives, requesting him to set up an investigation commission to study the discrepancy between the official results of the 30 May 1980 referendum and the factual participation of the voters, both at home and abroad. The opposition based this request on the precedent of the formation of an investigation commission in 1979 following the scandal of baccalaureate "leaks." However, the negative answer of the president of the parliament prevented the latter to assume its expected role in a matter of such great vitality and interest affecting Moroccan democracy.

9. Despite the imposed political restrictions and the fact that parliament failed to discuss a single draft bill submitted by the Ittihadia opposition (rentals, lowering of the voting age to 18, public freedoms, civilian and military pensions, labor accidents and the exclusive zone) the USFP deputies insisted on submitting several bills including the following:

A. A draft bill amending the law on referendums, calling for the lowering of the voting age from 21 to 18. The "majority" voted against the motion.

B. A draft bill on the Moroccan Radio and Television status, thus preventing it from being monopolized by the executive power and putting it under democratic and national management.

C. A draft bill to nationalize cereal imports, thus enabling the National Cereals Office to play its full role and put an end to the harmful activities of some speculating middlemen.

D. A draft bill to nationalize steel and iron imports, which would enable the National Iron and Steel Company to assume its responsibilities and thus put an end to the monopoly exercised in this area by several foreign enterprises, partially, "Moroccanized."

10. The Ittihadia opposition continued its efforts of the last session to defend the rights and gains of political prisoners and allow the mixed commission in charge of their problems to assume its responsibilities with a view to demanding of the officials a revision of detention conditions in their material, medical, cultural and psychological aspects. However, the opposition remains convinced that the main objective is the release of all political detainees and the return of exiles to the home country.

In conclusion, the results of the last session--particularly on the qualitative level--were laughable. They were due to two factors:

1. The "sterility" and inability of the "majority" to be able to fully play its role within parliament. This is explained by the fact that the hetergeneous "majority" achieved in the familiar conditions of falsifying the people's will and electoral fraud, has a very weak structure.

2. The lack of control over the executive branch by the House of Representatives. In effect, the government is avoiding all discussions and does not take very seriously the work of parliament (several ministers were absent during the debates, including the prime minister, who failed to attend a single meeting of the last session, lack of initiative on the part of officials, and their inability to confront the problems facing the nation).

It is undeniable that the boycott (supported by the USFP) by the popular masses of the 30 May 1980 referendum may be explained by the steady failure of parliamentary work. Therefore, the Moroccan people have condemned the falsification of its will and the "false" official democracy, and are opposing all policy of impoverishment and governmental irresponsibility.

The opposition pledges to continue the struggle on the side of the popular forces and in favor of the working class in order to abolish exploitation and enable the people to intensify their struggle for the defense of Moroccan territorial integrity.

The inadequacies of the representative institution not withstanding, the USFP deputies pledge to denounce the domination of the exploiting class and to use the parliament as one of the fronts of the struggle in the political, economic and cultural areas for the triumph of the liberation, democracy and socialism.

QADHDHAFI-ITES HAVE EVEN CONTRADICTED KORAN

Rabat L'OPINION in French 20 Jul 80 p 1

[Article by Abou Bakr Ali Kadiri: "Rescuing Islam from the Threat of the 'Qadhafi-ites'"]

[Text] No month can pass without hearing the echo of yet another vagary perpetrated against the Libyan Moslem people by the sinister hero of the incredible "Qadhdhafi-ites." When Colonel Qadhafi launched his socialist revolution against the fighting Senussi, he said that it was drawing its essence from the precepts of Islam and that it would work with a view to promoting an authentic Islamic resurrection. Years have passed since then proving to us the monstrous reality of this "innovator" who, to begin with, irresponsibly opposed the "Sunna," thus fulfilling the famous prophecy of Sidna Mohammed (May he be saved!), who said: "The day will come when someone will appear who will contest everything coming from the Prophet under the pretext of obeying the Holy Script."

His second coup was his flagrant intrusion into religious precepts by modifying the calling of the 'Al Asr" [evening] prayer.

Thirdly, and most seriously, it was his abolition of the Koranic expression "Say" which the colonel ? Imam consider an anachronism, since the "speaker" (the Prophet Mohammed) is no longer alive.

In a word, today we read in the 24 March 1980 issue of the newspaper GREEN ASSAULT, published by the Libyan "Revolutionary Committees," an article which is a masterpiece of atheism and a challenge to the entire Islamic nation. The title of the article makes its content absurdly clear: "God Alone Is the Enemy of Socialism." I shall skip the horrible and perfidious expressions with which the article abounds.

Thus, this challenge has reached its peak, and Qadhdhafi socialist revolution exposes its destructive reality which threatens the faith of the Islamic Libyan people.

There is no longer even a shadow of a doubt that this "revolution" is a state of war declared on Islam. Its targets have never stopped being the hegemonism, expansionism and destruction of the Islamic entity. It is high time for Islamic governments and peoples to rise against this plot and take the necessary measures to safeguard Islam in this fraternal country.

MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON SOCIALIST PARTIES' CONFERENCE

Rabat L'OPINION in French 21 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Interview with Abdelhaq Tazi, member of the Executive Committee of the Istiklal Party and secretary of state for cadre training, conducted by Ahmed el-Fadili: "Political Pluralism and Democracy"]

[Text] Back from Tunis, where he was a member of the delegation of the Istiklal Party, headed by Mrs M'Hamed Boucetta, secretary general, and which included Hassan El Halcui, member of the Executive Committee, Abderrazak Afilal, secretary general of the UGTM [General Union of Moroccan Workers], and Mohamed Louafa, secretary general of the Istiklal Youth, who attended the constituent assembly of the Socialist Inter-African, Abdelhaq Tazi, member of the Executive Committee, was willing to grant us the following interview:

Question: Mr Minister, could you draw up a balance of the Tunis meeting?

Answer: The Tunis meeting, the fifth of its kind, since in 1975 the idea was born of setting up a body which would rally all socialist oriented parties and, above all, parties which believe in democracy and democratic socialism. Therefore, the idea was born in Tunis in the course of the 1975 meeting of African socialist parties. Since then other meetings have been held, either in the Tunisian capital or in Dakar to implement it.

In September 1978, in Dakar, we were on the point of announcing the establishment of the Socialist Inter-African, when certain events occurred, in particular the Jerusalem trip, which resulted in the fact that Egypt, which was one of the main partners in the creation of such an organization, defaulted.

Subsequently, we recently met to consider the conditions for the establishment of this Socialist Inter-African. Therefore, in addition to Tunisia, the meeting was attended by Senegal, Sudan, Mauritius and Morocco, which was represented by two parties, the Istiklal Party, naturally, included.

We decided to go forth this time and to establish contacts with some African countries which share our call, to invite them to participate in the constituent congress, either as full members, or as observers, in order to maintain contacts and see to it that our organization does not become a closed one but be open to any subsequent applicant.

Therefore, there is the will to succeed, which is a very positive element. The best proof is that we have decided on the date of the constituent congress, which will take place in Tunis, on 26, 27 and 28 February 1981, Tunisia having offered to host the congress.

In order to complete the preparations, on 3 and 4 December next we shall meet in Dakar to sum up the contacts with the other parties and draft the details of the Tunis congress.

Question: In addition to the parties which attended the Tunis meeting, which organizations could eventually join the Socialist Inter-African?

Answer: First, all the parties represented in Dakar in September 1978, which include, in addition to those I have already mentioned, the two Voltan organizations, since Upper Volta is currently a country with a pluralist system, and that the two main parties of that country have expressed the desire to join our organization and, therefore, will be automatically invited; this also includes the Mauritian Socialist Party, which has always attended our meetings, but was unable attend the one in Tunis, but will be present the next time.

Furthermore, we have considered 14 other organizations which will be approached by the Destourien Socialist Party (Tunisia), the Senegalese Socialist Party and Istiklal Party.

We shall be contacting Nigeria, which no longer has a military, but a civilian regime practicing party pluralism; we shall also see which of the Nigerian parties have a democratic and socialist orientation and could, therefore, join our organization. We shall equally contact Guinea, under President Sekou Toure, Somalia, and, finally, Kenya.

Question: Mr Tazi, what was the contribution of the Istiklal Party to the Tunis meeting?

Answer: As usual, and ever since the idea was formulated, the Istiklal Party has assiduously followed the preparatory meetings of the Socialist Inter-African. Thus we took active part in drafting the charter and the internal rules. We shall participate equally as in the past through the contacts which we intend to make with the fraternal parties in an effort to create this organization of democratic and socialist parties which believe in freedom and human rights and make it an organization which will serve the development of the African peoples and freedom.

Question: Could it be said, Mr Tazi, that the Socialist Inter-African will be used to counterbalance what has been accepted to describe as the bloc of "progressive" countries, for we note that all the parties which participated in the preparatory meetings, or which have been asked to join this organization afterwards, come from countries reputed to be "moderate"?

Answer: No, for from the very start we have insisted on eliminating any controversy and to stipulate that the Socialist Inter-African is not constituted by any specific group or aimed against any other party. At most, it is a family sharing a certain ethic and a certain view on life and, particularly, which supports the principles of freedom for all citizens (freedom of speech, freedom of opinion, freedom of affiliation, etc), and the defense of basic human rights, for we consider the defense and development of these rights of extreme importance.

We support human rights, political pluralism, freedom and democracy. These are the values and beliefs which unite us and which we would like to promote. However, we are not making an alliance against anyone. On the contrary, we leave the door open to anyone who shares such convictions and believes in these values and would wish to join us.

Question: In Tunis, Morocco was represented by two organizations: the Istiklal Party and the USFP [Socialist Union of People's Forces]; is there collaboration between these two organizations?

Answer: We have always attended jointly the preparatory meetings and, therefore, we have worked together and held discussions in the best possible atmosphere and, therefore, have worked for the same cause.

Question: The question faces, above all, the foreign observer who might be inclined to make the following remark: How is it that what unites the Istiklal Party and the USFP in meetings such as Tunis does not unite them on the domestic or national levels?

Answer: This situation may be traced by purely circumstantial reasons. We must not forget that we were united until the 1977 elections and it was at that point that we separately analyzed the situation and, consequently, selected our way with full awareness.

As far as we are concerned, we have decided to join the democratic process and to try to promote the democratic institutions. Conversely, our comrades have taken the opposite way. Naturally, they were free to choose the way they considered desirable.

Question: On the fringe of the Tunis meeting, the Istiklal delegation had contacts and talks with the leaders of the PSD [Destourien Socialist Party] . . . .

Answer: Yes, one may call such contacts almost traditional and natural, for very profound ties exist between the Destourien Socialist Party and the Istiklal Party, developed in the course of the struggle against foreign occupation and, furthermore, the ties which linked President Habib Bourguiba and deceased Allal el-Fassi are known. They struggle together and together created the Arab Maghreb Bureau in Cairo. They followed a virtually identical strategy in the struggle against the occupation power and the Moroccan victories were Tunisian victories, and vice versa.

Let us not forget that the assassination of Farhat Hachad, on 5 December 1952, had deep repercussions among the Moroccan people. The Tunisians will never forg. this.

Naturally, the French were expecting that the revolution would break out in Tunis. Instead, it took place in Casablanca and, therefore, it was Moroccan martyrs who were the first to fall after the death Farhat Hachad. Hence the very close links which linked us through the past and which continue to link us. These are indissoluble links which make the Istiklal Party in Morocco and the PSD in Tunisia branches of the same tree known as North African nationalism.

'L'OPINION' CONDEMNS 'STALINIST' CRITICISM OF SOCIALIST CONFERENCE

Rabat L'OPINION in French 23 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Article: "Socialist Inter-African: Rejection of Satellite Behavior and Emulation"]

[Text] A dogmatic Marxist voice has risen from the deep caverns of Stalinism, blaming some African parties for uniting in their goals and the method they have chosen with a view to insuring the development and establishing social equality in their countries, rallying within a continental organization able to concretize the true aspirations of the African peoples, and providing the proper mechanism for exchanging experience and utilizing their knowledge.

On the other hand, this system offers the African peoples a better framework for solidarity on the international scene, buffeted by currents which divide our societies, try to impose upon us models foreign to our realities and aspire to the solution of problems different from ours.

Such is the target which for the past several years has marked the patient progress of the African parties, all of which unanimously support the ideas of the rejection of the capitalist way and communist dogmatism, and are animated by the will to find, fully independently, African solutions to African problems.

It is with this desire and within such a frame of mind that the socialist-leaning African parties regrouped and undertook the creation of a continental organization.

For months contacts and studies have been underway with a view to intensifying and clarifying such concepts.

It is thus that the Socialist Inter-African is on the verge of being born as the result of the Tunis meeting of six parties which unanimously approved the constituent charter and bylaws of the organization.

We knew from the start that the Marxist charlatans were to oppose the idea, for they consider themselves the sole holders of socialism and as entrusted to monopolize it as though it were shares on the stock market.

Had this been done by a Muscovite clique, their attitude would have been quite different. For these "people" consider themselves the cousins of the parrot Kerekou, the bloodthirsty Mengistu Haile-Mariam, or Samora Machel, the tamer.

Had they been involved, the attitude of such "people" would be one of applause and blessings in accordance with their "scientific" and "objective" method, and also in accordance with their false logic according to which socialism is limited to learning how to recite from memory the milk output of each Soviet cow, transcribe PRAVDA in their bulletins, and open their umbrellas in Casablanca when it rains in Leningrad.

The forces opposing the Socialist Inter-African and all those who follow them have no concern other than to oppose those who are making their way toward independence and authenticity, and who throw their arms, however, in the face of the Socialist International, which rallies Simon Peres and his comrades, whose only concern is that of exercising their paternalism over the peoples of the third world.

No, gentlemen! Defending socialism and laying its foundations does not mean tailism or circulating in the various "internationals" headed by the European socialist parties, both of the East and the West.

Actually, it is a question of a struggle consistent with the specific objective conditions of each society with a view to following a specific way leading to development and the promotion of social justice.

This is the purpose for the rallying of a group of African parties who have no complex whatever toward those who claim to the keepers of socialism.

The latter have accounts to pay which we should publicize in order to put them in their true place and stand up, whenever necessary, against their dictatorial trends and distorted and falsified ideological affiliation.

STUDENTS UNION ISSUES PROTEST

Rabat L'OPINION in French 19 Jul 80 p 1

[UGEM [General Union of Moroccan Students] communique on students expelled from the ENS [Advanced Teacher-Training Schools]]

[Text] A general meeting of students expelled from the ENS took place at the seat of the UGEM in Rabat in the presence of the vice president of this student union and the members of the executive committee.

Having recalled the steady militant attitude of the UGEM, the vice president listed the problems afflicting higher training from the fact, he stated, of the predominance of a partisan spirit among some professors, the "Ifran doctors" in particular, who show their apprehension concerning the growing student generation.

In conclusion, the vice president informed those present of the date (25 July 1980) agreed upon with those in charge of the higher schools.

Following is the communique which was made public at the conclusion of this meeting:

Considering the deplorable situation under which ENS students live in Rabat, Casablanca and Fes as a result of the expulsion of over 200 students, the UGEM met with a view to studying the situation. Following a thorough overall discussion, it was decided that the present communique be issued, addressed to those in charge, which includes the following demands of this assembly:

Noncompetitivie admission of such students to first-year CPR [College Education], with monthly salaries;

Allowing them to practice as apprentice teachers and to take their graduation competitive examination over a three-year period;

Allowing expelled students and students who are nonrepeaters to repeat or be enrolled in the CPR with no restrictions;

Putting an end to the activities of some officials;

Need to open boarding houses which could house all the students of the corresponding establishment;

Need to take into consideration the choice of the student as to the pursuit of his studies in the area consistent with his scientific level;

Allowing the students access to their examination grades;

Need to allow the students to elect their representatives and the power to attend discussions in accordance with the current statute of such establishments.

The assembly notes the lack of equipment (laboratories, classrooms, libraries, etc . . .), the regular absenteeism of some professors and the incompetence of some professors, foreign professors in particular. Furthermore, the assistants demand that inspectors be appointed to watch over the normal work of such establishments.

SUPPORT FOR AFGHANISTAN IS ISLAMIC DUTY

Rabat L'OPINION in French 28 Jul 80 pp 1-2

[Article by Abou Bakr Al Kadiri: "Ramadan Topics: Solidarity With Fighting Afghan People Is Islamic Duty"]

[Text] The Casablanca daily newspaper, AL-BAYANE, considered as inopportune, subversive and pro-imperialist the formulation by certain states of a request envisaging the examination of the intensive attacks perpetrated against the Afghan people, with a view to the recording of this point on the agenda of the ordinary meeting of the UN General Assembly which will meet next September.

Also by subscribing to this request Morocco has placed itself, without a tradeoff, in that category of states practicing the imperialist me-tooism and has committed a great mistake which is added to its previous errors and this for having elected to defend causes which run counter to liberation and progress in the world.

At the very outset, I should like to reaffirm that I harbor no political animosity for any of the states, including the Soviet Union. On the contrary, the position of support for the Palestinian revolution on the part of the Soviet Union has my entire consideration.

However--and there is the rub--such a position could not in any way eclipse in my eyes other realities which have occurred here and there in the world in which the Soviet Union distinguishes itself by its flagrant contradiction of its pretensions vis-a-vis support of oppressed peoples and the defense of their freedom and self-determination.

Its positions concerning both the invasion of Czechoslovakia--a socialist state--years ago and the events in Somalia and Eritrea and most recently its monstrous military occupation of Afghanistan, all that arouses me and every person jealous of the principles of protest and indignation.

The massacre of tens of thousands of Afghan Moslems, whether on the holy field of battle or in concentration camps, the destruction and the incendiary razing of Afghan villages, the extermination of about 100,000 Afghan families, all that impels us to say that in our opinion it could not be a question of imposing theories, systems and regimes by force of iron and fire.

The daily newspaper, AL-BAYANE, unfortunately maintained that the intervention of these troops of death was the result of a request by the government of Afghanistan. AL-BAYANE knows perfectly well that the current president of the Afghan government could not have come to power without the force of the Soviet army's arsenal. It also is aware of the fate reserved for his predecessors, the last of whom was President Amin who, in spite of his fervent communism, did not venture to avail himself of foreign armies.

The fact of installing one of the agents of such a power in authority does not in any way invest him with legitimacy.

The "comrades" of AL-BAYANE, or some of them, at least experienced the decisive stage in the history of the national struggle when French colonialism perpetrated its hideous plot against the Moroccan throne and its august titulary, the late Mohammed V. At the time, all the Moroccan people were unanimously in favor of repudiating the figurehead presented by colonialism to replace the deported activist monarch.

Therefore, the question is not of small or large states which have made a request to examine the events in Afghanistan but quite simply it is a matter of a people whose dignity has been violated and whose territory has been occupied by a foreign army. This people has resisted as best it could with available resources and has been unable to obtain other than negligible aid from brother Moslem peoples and from those who claim to be in favor of peace.

The Afghan combatants who are fighting against the invader are not in any way unconditional supporters or agents of American imperialism. Formerly they had fought for the victory of the Palestinian revolution as well as for other liberation causes and this in addition to their attachment for an exemplary adherence to Islamic doctrine. And it is this potential of faith which unleashes in their soul the desire to combat any foreign invasion, whatever its doctrine and its political concepts, as was illustrated historically during their struggles against the British and czarist Russia and as is now illustrated in the face of the Soviet invader.

The Moroccan position of support for the Afghan struggle, if only by reasonable words, is a position which is completely in conformity with the concept of Islamic solidarity.

Therefore, we are surprised by the articles published by the newspaper AL-BAYANE which really amaze and astonish us. Besides, since when have we taken as our internal or external national positions criteria which are based upon what others say and do?

Of course, certain states concerned over the above-mentioned request concerning the Afghan affair do not effectively inspire respect for their positions. It is useless to cite them since the "comrades" know perfectly well what our positions are toward them and our stubborn struggles against their aggression plans; however, was this sufficient reason for our foregoing our solidarity with the cause of the Moslem people who have taken up arms to defend their territory and their doctrine? It is enough to say that if the "comrades" were to avail themselves of this logic they would often wind up finding themselves against their own country, since they are just as aware as all of us are that some pawns which are said to exist among the African states were only hostile to our national cause because they claim to be in the progressive camp, for example, the position of Mugabe (Mozambique) [as published] in Freetown. Therefore, it is important to know that the cause of liberation of peoples and solidarity with them in no way takes as criteria either the number of supporters in such and such bloc or the international weight or notability of states. This is so true that it is these very states which are responsible for the conflagration in various parts of the world.

We do not agree with the "comrades" who feel that the objective of the armed intervention of foreign armies consists in consolidating a progressive regime, knowing, do we not, that the choice and consolidation of regimes are the business of the people concerned. The regime we should support and cooperate with is the regime which the Afghan people would have chosen were it not for the foreign military invasion.

We not only refuse to accept the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan but also refuse to accept the honeyed words which American imperialism is pouring out for that region. We appeal to the Islamic peoples and governments and to the nonalined states as well as to every state which wants peace and justice to do their duty with respect to the combatant Afghan people's cause, and we also demand the withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Afghan territory with an eye toward free self-determination of the Afghan people.

ALGERIA, LIBYA STRIVE TO 'DESTABILIZE' MAGHREB

Casablanca MAROC SOIR in French 1 Aug 8. pp 1, 3

[Article by Dr Ramzi]

[Text] Rabat (MAP)--President Qadhdhafi, in a statement over French television, claimed that Libya had played no part in the Gafsa events and that he had not been informed of these events until after their announcement by the Tunisian government.

With regard to that affair, Moroccan authorized sources are surprised by the tone of this statement and are wondering whether Qadhdhafi was fully aware of the fact that he was addressing French public opinion or thought he was in Libya, talking to a group of muzzled citizens. Qadhdhafi's mistake they say is in thinking that European public opinion accepts his insane acts at their face value and remain silent in the fashion of Libyan citizens who are terrorized and oppressed. No one, moreover, can believe in the sincerity of Qadhdhafi's statement. In fact, the same sources recall, all the plotters against Tunisia have admitted that they were trained, equipped and financed by Libya whose military training camps were their point of departure. The whole world no longer doubts the subversive role played by Qadhdhafi through the assembling of mercenaries, outlaws in bases of subversion in Libya training them to stir up troubles in close and not-so-close neighboring countries for the purpose of realizing his leadership fantasies. The same sources emphasize that the fact Libyan public funds are being squandered to pay the mercenaries is no longer a secret to anyone and that the assassination of Libyan citizens inside the country and abroad, whose sold wrongdoing is their loyalty to their country and their rejection of Qadhdhafi's nonsense, has become a characteristic sign of the regime installed in Libya.

These same quarters say that Qadhdhafi is naive if he thinks that world public opinion believes him innocent of the Gafsa events and the arming of mercenaries to stir up troubles in the Arab Maghreb and in Africa, Tunisia, Morocco, Chad, Uganda and Senegal.

Moroccan sources also feel that if we accept Qadhdhafi's ravings on the subject of the Gafsa events, we might also accept the allegations of Algerian leaders who claim they are not involved in the arming, supplying and training of the mercenaries who are attacking the provinces of Moroccan Sahara. The Algerian government is in fact up to its ears in the plots hatched against the territorial integrity of Morocco and in the arming of mercenaries who are attacking Moroccan provinces from bases in Tindouf. This does not permit Algeria to deny its responsibility in the plot, a responsibility which is in defiance of international law and customs. It is the Algerian people who are paying the price of this plot through the squandering of their resources which have been made available to all the mercenaries, enemies of the unity of Arab Maghreb, the same sources add. Algeria will pay very dearly in the future for the tragedy which its government is in the process of writing, they emphasize.

What we have here is the same bell tolling in Algeria and Libya: the wish of these two countries to destabilize the Arab Maghreb and by this means to satisfy their instincts for domination and expansionism and to attain other objectives on the continent of Africa is obvious, the same sources conclude.

NIGERIA'S ROLE, POLICY IN AFRICA DISCUSSED

Rabat L'OPINION in French 28 Jul 80 pp 1-2

[Article by Mohamed Tamri: "Fluctuations Marked By Conjecture"]

[Text] The current diplomatic offensive was foreseeable, therefore, necessary since Moroccan experiences at the last OAU summit demonstrated the existence of a broad African front opposed to certain deviations of the Organization of African Unity.

Therefore, it is now not only a question of thanking all those who forthrightly supported the just Moroccan position but also and above all of drawing advantage from the hesitations and the profound distrust formulated by other delegations vis-a-vis Libyan maneuvers, an attitude which led them to confine themselves to an uncomfortable neutrality and at times to formulate a point of view which, without being favorable to the Moroccan position, put the OAU on guard against the schisms which are threatening its unity.

The Nigerian attitude in this regard is significant and merits thought: not only did the motion introduced by Lagos succeed in giving the OAU a new stay of execution but also the position occupied by Nigeria on the continental level results in all of its position-taking having considerable impact, which often changes the attitude of many other African states. Also, Moroccan diplomacy is induced to concern itself particularly with that country which draws from its economic weight the authority which distinguishes its diplomatic voice.

At this level in foreign policy, Nigeria is influenced by two concerns: the playing of an important role in the OAU in keeping with its size and succeeding in assuring a zone of economic expansion for itself, in which it can sell its industrial surpluses, by causing the countries of Black Africa to become aware that they are the center of gravity of the continent and organizing them to make them capable of resisting outside influences coming in particular from certain countries in Northern Africa and South Africa.

The two premises of this policy are complementary: Lagos intends to play a determinant role in the OAU to stop regroupings based on particularities and to be in a position to encourage only viable groups, those determined by geography. Obviously these groups would have the advantage of placing under Nigeria's authority countries whose association is considered a threat by Lagos.

A third characteristic of Nigerian foreign policy is designed to obtain investments from a Western world called upon for its survival to develop the Third World; and Lagos--to distinguish itself from the former French colonies which in general adopt Euro-African positions--wishes to become a world power, a position which countries such as Japan, Canada and the United States appreciate, and with reason.

Also, is Nigeria considered by African public opinion to be an instrument of American policy. In reality, the Nigerian attitude corresponds to the country, which was established to spread the power of British companies over part of the African continent. United States' interest in Nigeria is due in particular to the very special ties which affinities of mind have succeeded in establishing. It remains nonetheless true that the long-range objectives of Nigerian diplomacy correspond to American aims: to restructure Black Africa to give it a preeminent role in the OAU. To do this, to favor the emergence of Lagos and to induce it to exercise its growing influence on its neighbors.

This plan has seen the start of implementation since the accession of a civilian government whose behavior confirms this desire to assemble the countries of the Nigerian geographic area and to reach a settlement of African disputes by taking initiatives, a desire which materialized during the last OAU summit through the introduction of the motion on the tension in northwest Africa. This same desire, moreover, was confirmed well before this summit, when there was a question of a decolonization problem, that of Zimbabwe and the pressures exerted on Great Britain and when a strictly political problem illustrated by the Chad affair resulted in several efforts at solution sponsored by Nigeria.

In the Sahara affair, the last OAU summit showed that Nigeria has reached the point of a certain degree of neutrality, in any event the point of more discretion than during the Monrovia summit. "The passing of the country from a military regime to a civilian government obviously illustrates a desire to confine itself to a strict neutrality dictated by Nigeria's membership on the Council of the Wise Men." This notwithstanding the fact remains that certain positions taken by Nigerian officials have been the subject of disconcerting comments by the mass media and still seem to be the subject of "fluctuations marked by the events and situation of the moment, with, however, a perceptible attenuation of the virulence against our country."

That unquestionably is the result of the efforts exerted by our diplomacy to make Nigeria sensitive to the fairness of the Moroccan cause. And this is only the beginning, for the Nigerian position is being called upon to further develop in favor of Morocco: President Sehu Shagari accepted in principle an invitation to travel to Rabat; during the last OAU summit, he avoided taking part in the strongest debates. And it was not until the end of the summit that he spoke to provide a solution a la Nigerian, "one of the most moderate adopted on the question by an African organization, seeing that its goal was to place in suspense the request for admission by the shadowy [Saharan Arab Democratic Republic] and to reactivate the mission of the Committee of Wise Men."

FRANCE ADOPTS MEASURES TO BLOCK MOROCCAN STUDENTS

Casablanca AL-BAYANE in French 8 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by R.C.]

[Excerpts] The crisis situation being experienced by higher education in our country is impelling a great number of our students to seek enrollment, which they have been unable to obtain in the Moroccan university, in foreign colleges and institutions. France has always had a massive influx of our young people into its universities; and, up to the time of the economic crisis which that country is experiencing, it did not call upon its officials to considerably limit the admission of foreigners to their colleges. It is within this framework that the latest decisions, laws and decrees were adopted in France. Thus, the French government decided to establish a national commission with responsibility for the selection of foreign students, verification of their knowledge of the French language, their enrollment and orientation. The measure, better known as the "Imbert Decree," named after the man who wrote the decision and president of this commission, has the basic purpose of closing the doors of French universities to students from developing countries and in particular from African countries, for whom the securing of an enrollment in Paris or Dijon is like running a combat obstacle course.

Thus, a recent Moroccan student who has passed the "baccalaureat" and who wishes to continue his studies in France first must file a pre-enrollment request with the French diplomatic authorities in Morocco. It is pointless to say that, in view of the reduced number of spaces granted Morocco, very few of our fellow countrymen from the popular social strata will have the opportunity of obtaining an enrollment approval. After this initial and delicate step, the candidate must take an examination to verify his knowledge of the French language. The French university authorities themselves admit that this involves "a third level dictation" (that is, the 4th year of secondary school). Therefore, it would seem that for Mr Imbert our "bacheliers" have barely attained the level of French of the 4th year of secondary school. When we know that Morocco was a French protectorate for 44 years and that our education is still bilingual, we are induced to ask questions about the propriety of such a measure. It is a fact that Mr Imbert has exempted secondary school graduates holding a French diploma from this examination. This is a new way of perpetuating and developing French cultural domination in our country. "The spread" of Victor Hugo's language depends upon this, it seems.

Having completed this second step, the candidate is confronted by a multitude of administrative harassments when he has to "regularize his situation" vis-a-vis the French prefectural authorities. Thus, in order to obtain a residence permit, he will have to present his enrollment certification, his scholarship certificate or a bank statement showing a balance of 8,000 French francs, nothing more than that! Once this obstacle is overcome--and very rare are those who overcome it--new problems present themselves, which are just as difficult to resolve as those already cited.

It is unacceptable that racist acts against our nationals are perpetuated without the Moroccan authorities reacting.

The satisfaction of the material and moral demands of Moroccan students in France, which have been expressed on many occasions by their union, the UNEM [National Union of Moroccan Students], is an urgent measure to be adopted. Just as it is an urgent matter that all decisions harmful to the development of Morocco and restrictive measures be annulled in favor of a new university policy in the service of the people for a Moroccanized, scientific, democratic and Arabized education system.

The Morocco of tomorrow is being built today.

MINISTER REBUFFS 'LE MONDE' ARTICLE ON ECONOMY

Casablanca MAROC SOIR in French 21 Jul 80 pp 1-2

[Rebutal of LE MONDE article]

[Text] In an article carried by LE MONDE, in its 8 July issue, the Rabat correspondent of this Parisian daily paints a very dark picture of the Moroccan economic situation, specifically in the area of foreign balances.

Questioned on this subject by the economics department of MAP [Maghreb-Arab Press Agency], circles close to the Ministry of Finance consider that "it is understandable for the author to formulate pessimistic views. This is his right." However, for such views to be based on false information is not acceptable when it is a question of a newspaper whose main slogan is that of providing objective information.

Furthermore, at some points, the author of the article simply makes claims without bothering to cite even the least bit of simple proof.

Roland Delcour, the author of the article, it is further said, brings forth three elements in support of his judgment. First, the current 1980 foreign deficit of payments could reach, if not surpass, last year's figure.

This claim is exactly the opposite of reality.

Actually, at present it is virtually certain, taking into consideration the excellent situation of the export sectors, a fact mentioned by the author of the article himself, that the current foreign deficit will be substantially reduced in 1980. The predictable figure for this year would be only slightly over 5 billion dirhams, or a 20 percent drop compared with the previous year. This is the best result achieved in this area over the past 5 years.

Secondly, the same source added, the author of the article claims that servicing the Moroccan foreign debt will total this year 5 billion dirhams. Roland Delcour could have been considered more seriously by providing the source of this figure, which exceeds by 30 percent the factual figure, which totals no more than 3.7 billion dirhams.

Thirdly, the article claims that the Moroccan finance minister went to Washington at the beginning of June to borrow $250 million and found it hard to obtain it. Such an allegation contradicts the various official communiques and statements which were issued on the occasion of this trip whose purpose was to learn from the American Administration the methods used for levying taxes and in the struggle against fiscal fraud in the United States.

Actually, let us point out to Mr Delcour, for his information, that no single big international bank has its headquarters in Washington. The loan mentioned by the article is currently being floated on the international financial market at the stage of syndication. It was subscribed in full in the course of a few weeks by toplevel Arab, American, French, British and German banks. The signing of the contract on this loan will take place in the next few weeks, the same sources specified.

Was it necessary to falsify facts and figures for the sole purpose of substantiating the idea according to which Moroccan indebtedness has allegedly reached the bearable limit, those same circles ask themselves?

Something even more serious, the author of the article has not even bothered to tell us what were, in his view, the criteria traditionally used in determining the indebtedness of a country, such as the amount of indebtedness and the indebtedness rates. Curiously enough, no indication has been provided as to such data. Does the author fear that any reference to objective data would be unable to justify his prejudices?--conclude the same circles.

FISCAL REFORM PROPOSALS REVIEWED

Casablanca LA VIE ECONOMIQUE in French 1 Aug 80 pp 1, 4

[Article by Jean Celeste, Accounting Specialist]

[Text] Recently Jean Celeste, an accounting expert, made an analysis for the CFCIM [French Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Morocco] bulletin of what may be the next fiscal reform, which was approved by the council of ministers and will be submitted to parliament with the outlines of a bill.

The principle which inspired the draft reform is equality vis-a-vis the tax laws: equal taxes for equal income and social justice.

The basic characteristic of the reform is the abolition of the present income tax schedule (IBP [tax on professional income], PTS [deduction from allowances and wages], TU ["single tax"], and an agricultural tax) and of the supplementary tax now in force and the institution of a general tax on income based on the size of the taxable income of an individual.

The term "person" means "natural person" as well as "artificial person."

That said, the reform is broken down into three segments:

1. The establishment of the general tax on income.

2. The development of tax schedules reflecting methods of assessment and the determination of taxable income.

3. Institution of the TVA [value-added tax].

I. The general tax on income

This involves putting an end to the multiple disparities existing in the following specific tax procedures: regressiveness of certain split [fractionnes] incomes, tax tables, exemption threshholds, deductions for family dependants, etc.

The unification of the tax table will affect both taxpayers who have only one source of income and those who have multiple incomes.

For this second category of taxpayers, the same tax table is applied but in accordance with different application procedures.

The draft reform provides that the present tax rate will be maintained up to the 70,000-dirham level. Above that amount, the rate of increase will be 2.24 percent up to 120,000 dirhams and 1.21 percent for an annual income of 240,000 dirhams.

As for recipients of income applicable to different tax schedules (rental incomes, agricultural income, wage earners, etc.) the various incomes will be taxed separately, except for the correction of the regressiveness due to splitting. The incomes will then be regrouped to determine the amount of the tax payable which will be subject to collection after deduction of original costs [cotes], with the proviso that a merchant who experienced a loss in his professional activities determined in accordance with the real profits schedule will be able to charge this loss against total income.

II. Changes in tax schedules

For the purposes of this general tax on income (IGR) allowances are made at each level of the schedule.

A). Urban tax and usage [edilite] tax

1). Urban tax:

a). Taxes on rental incomes of natural persons

The general tax schedule will be applied.

However, it is proposed to give gross incomes a standard allowance to cover the costs of maintenance, repairs, janitorial service, etc.

b). Usage tax applicable to urban real property

When buildings are occupied by their owners, it is proposed that the present schedule of the urban tax be applied.

On the other hand, when it is a matter of income-producing buildings, these will be subjected to the same percentage of annual rental income (13.5 percent).

2). Usage tax

This will become a land tax and the determination of the taxable base will be a function of the rental income of buildings as determined for the calculation of the urban tax.

B). Tax on professional income (IBP)

Provision is made for dividing the IBP into two schedules:

--on the one hand, a tax on the income of natural persons

--on the other hand, a tax on companies.

This distinction will permit application of the general tax on income to the income of natural persons.

1). Tax on the income of natural persons

Four tax categories are proposed:

1. Net real tax. Mandatory for transit agents [transitaires], insurance offices, accounting offices and those liable for taxes whose turnover reaches a certain threshhold.

2. Simplified accounting. This category will be for merchants of taxed products (sugar, cement, tea), professional persons, etc.

3. Turnover and minimum income. In this category, which is now in force moreover, the taxable income is determined by application of a set coefficient for each branch of activity or profession, after updating of the present rates; however, the tax determined in this manner is not collected by the tax administration unless it is higher than the minimum income as defined by the regulation.

4. Conventional flat rate. The flat rate for the taxpayer is established in the event of an agreement between the administration and the taxpayer, for a period of 2 years.

2). Tax on companies (IS).

This tax will be applied at a proportional rate to the income of all companies no matter what their organization and their purpose, including agricultural companies and real estate companies, excluding de facto companies and civil, closely-held real estate companies assimilable to groups of owners.

3). Tax on dividends and tax credit

In view of the fact that the profits upon which dividends are determined on behalf of the stockholder have already been subjected to the tax on companies, it is proposed to institute a tax credit at the level of the IGR. (General income tax)

4). Loss carryover

Within the framework of the reform, it is proposed to limit the length of the loss carryover period to 3 years instead of the 5 years now in force. What is more, companies with losses must pay a minimum tax in the third year of the deficit. This minimum will be increased every year until the company reports a profit.

5). Reevaluation of financial statements

The reform provides for the reevaluation of financial statements. The following solutions are proposed in this connection:

--Either authorize unrestricted reevaluation with a reduced assessment at the rate of the company tax (IS) on the reevaluation reserve which thus becomes an ordinary available reserve;

--Or improve the present reevaluation rates (coefficient 1 for 1958) and thus maintain the system in force, with one more accentuated restriction, however, with respect to tax-liable [passible] incorporation of the reserve with capital, an operation for which the 3-year grace period will be extended to 5 years (Article 18 of the organic dahir on the IBP).

C). Deduction from salaries and wages (PTS)

It is proposed to apply a 17.5 percent "deduction" to gross income determined with account taken of the two present allowances: professional expenses (10 percent), a decrease in the taxable base at the level of the 25 percent supplementary tax. For high-income taxpayers, this allowance will be limited. Finally, the deduction at the source of this tax may be retained.

D). Supplementary tax (CC)

In the proposed fiscal reform, this tax will be eliminated and replaced by the general tax on the income of natural persons.

E). The agricultural tax

The proposed measures are as follows:

--to subject legally constituted agricultural companies to the company tax;

--to optionally permit farmers who wish to be taxed on their net real income (3-year option);

--to reevaluate estimated income;

--to subject estimated income to the unified tax schedule of the general tax on incomes;

--to extend the deductions for dependents to farm income as well as the exemptions for other income;

--to institute a land tax payable by the owner which will be a function of the rental value of agricultural properties by the hectare.

F). Tax on income from stock dividends (TPA)

You know that present regulations call for a 25 percent withholding tax at the source, creditable to the CC (Expansion unknown) assessment payable by natural persons.

This withholding tax will be maintained with one difference: anonymous holders of stock portfolios may have a deduction applied to them at the maximum tax rate of the general tax on income.

G). Tax on real estate profits (TPI)

The regulations now in force would be maintained (1978 Tax Law and 1980 changes).

H). Tax on urban lands

The draft tax reform gives no information on this subject.

III. The value-added tax (TVA)

Finally, the third segment of the tax reform provides for the institution of the TVA. This tax would be substituted for taxes on turnover (TCA). However, this measure would be applied in stages.

EXPORT, IMPORT FIGURES FOR 1979 REVIEWED

Rabat L'OPINION in French 5 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] The bimonthly report of the BMCE [Moroccan Foreign Trade Bank] published an article in its last issue (56) on the subject of Moroccan trade with the other continents in 1979.

Here is a brief summary of that trade:

In 1979, Moroccan imports totaled 14,327,700 M DH [million dirhams] compared to 12.361 M DH in 1978, an increase of 15.9 percent, while Moroccan exports totaled 7,622,400 M DH compared to 6.261 M DH a year earlier, an increase of 21.7 percent.

Therefore, our trade balance had a deficit of 6,705,300 M DH in 1979 compared to 6.1 M DH in 1978, a coverage rate of 53.2 percent compared to 50.6 percent in 1978.

Moroccan purchases on the EEC totaled 6.942 M DH (compared to 6.072 M DH in 1978) while Moroccan sales to Europe in 1979 were 4.447 M DH (compared to 3,565,100 M DH in 1978). The relatively greater increase in exports resulted in an improvement in the rate of coverage which was 64.1 percent compared to 58.7 percent the previous year.

Countries of the EEC supplied 48.5 percent of our total imports and absorbed 58.3 percent of our total sales. Within this group of countries, France continues to be our principal trade partner and by itself provides 27.4 percent of our purchases and absorbs 28 percent of our sales abroad.

Our trade with countries of the EFTA [European Free-Trade Association] represented 4.5 percent of our purchases abroad and 3.9 percent of our total sales, with 652 M DH on the import side and 295.4 M DH on the export side.

Eastern Europe grouped within the CAEM [Council for Mutual Economic Assistance] supplied 5.1 percent of our total imports (compared to 6 percent in 1978) and absorbed 10.8 percent of our total exports (compared to 11.4 percent in 1978).

Our trade with these countries resulted in an excess of 91.8 M DH compared to a deficit of 37 M DH in 1978.

For the rest of Europe, our imports continued to remain at the same level (1.463 M DH compared to 1.440 in 1978) constituting 10.2 percent of our total imports. As for our sales to this group of countries, these totaled 708 M DH, an increase of 28.8 percent compared to 1978, representing 9.3 percent of our total exports.

Our trade with Africa continued to be characterized by a certain amount of balance since the rate of coverage improved again, increasing from 93.7 percent in 1978 to 95.7 percent in 1979. Our purchases from African countries represented 2 percent of our total imports, and our sales to them totaled 3.9 percent of our overall exports.

The American continent supplied 9.8 percent of our foreign purchases and absorbed 6.3 percent of our total sales. The weakness at the export level (478 M DH) compared to that of imports (1.403 M DH) was reflected in the rate of coverage which did not exceed 34.1 percent compared, however, to only 25.7 percent in 1978.

The United States, Canada and Brazil continue to be our principal partners on that continent.

With the Asian continent, our sales, despite an increase of 33.5 percent, remained at a low level (587 M DH) compared to imports which increased again by 77.4 percent, going from 1.591 M DH to 2.823 M DH. Because of this, the coverage rate decreased to 20.8 percent compared to 27.6 percent one year earlier.

The increase in the oil bill in large part explains this situation.

Our trade with Oceania continued to be characterized by weakness: 19.6 M DH on the import side; i.e., 0.1 percent of our total imports, and 1.8 M DH on the export side, less than 0.1 percent of our total sales.

CANDIDATES FOR MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 10 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] During the official ceremonies organized yesterday in the Sidi El Bechir (Tunis), Jebel Jeloud and Hamman-Lif delegations, the party candidates for municipal by-elections in the Sidi El Bechir, Ez-Zahra municipal districts and the Ben Arous 2d and 3d districts announced their candidacy for these elections to the regions' local authorities in the presence of Mr Abdel-krim Azaiez, secretary general of the Tunis-Sud Party's coordinating committee and of other officers of the party and administration.

On Sunday, 17 August, the electors from these municipal districts will again elect the municipal councils in conformity with the grievance committee's decision to render void the results of the municipal elections held last 25 May in these districts because of irregularities in conducting them. In fact, many citizens have challenged last 25 May election results and called them into question for the following reasons:

Some citizens who were not of legal age took part in the last 25 May elections. Pressure was resorted to in conducting the elections at some balloting polls. There were some irregularities in calculating the votes.

Let us point out that immediately after the decision to render void the 25 May election results, the Tunis ruling party initiated the examination of the register of voters to make sure that all the citizens inscribed in it had fulfilled all the required conditions.

Here, on the other hand, is the number of registered voters, their distribution, the number of advisers and the persons at the voting polls for each one of the municipal districts in question:

1) The Sidi El Bechir district:
Number of men registered: 27,825
Number of women registered: 250,051
Number of advisers: 14
Number of voting polls: 187

2) Ez-Zahra district
Number registered (men and women): 7,000
Number of advisers: 16
Number of voting polls: 29

3) Ben Arous Municipality: 2d district (Ibn Sina)
Number of registered (men): 1,891
Number of registered (women): 1,726
Total number of registered voters: 3,617
Number of advisers: 7
Number of voting polls: 16

4) Ben Arous municipality: 3d district (Mohamed Ali):
Number of registered (men): 1,158
Number of registered (women): 1,099
Total number of registered voters: 2,251
Number of advisers: 6
Number of voting polls: 16

Sidi El Bechir municipal district:

The following, from another source, is the register of Party candidates to these elections for the districts in question:

COMMITTEE TO IMPLEMENT ORDER ABOLISHING ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 10 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Yesterday the Ministry of Justice released the following statement: In pursuance of the president of the republic's order on 8 August 1980 related to the abolishing of the attorney general of the republic's office, the minister of justice this morning appointed an ad hoc committee to adopt urgent measures and establish the necessary procedures for the immediate execution of the presidential order.

The committee is composed of the following magistrates:

Messr: Hedi Said, attorney general, director of judicial affairs;
Bechir Zahra, inspector general to the Ministry of Justice;
Mohamed Salah Ayari, first chairman of the Tunis Court of Appeals;
Abdesselam Mahjoub, chairman of the realty tribunal.

During its morning session, the committee arrived at a series of decisions likely to make it possible for the attorney general to pursue his duty in a normal and satisfactory manner.

The Ministry of Justice has instructed the committee to study the readjustments necessary to be introduced into the legal texts in court in order that they be in accordance with the presidential order relative to the suppression of the attorney general of the republic's office.

On the other hand, the minister of justice has instructed the district attorney of judicial affairs to see to the transfer of powers.

Moreover, a meeting has been scheduled for Thursday, 14 August, at 1100 at the Ministry of Justice headquarters at which will be present the assistant public prosecutors and the district attorneys from the various courts of justice.

COMMUNISTS REACT FAVORABLY TO 'OPEN DOOR' POLICY

Paris LE MONDE in French 28 Aug 80 p 7

[Article by Michel Deure]

[Text] In a communique circulated on Monday, 25 August, Tunisian Communists assert that they "deeply believe in the likelihood of a democratic phase as a possible step in the direction of socio-economic changes." Thus they appear to be reacting favorably, initially, to the "open door" policy the government has been implementing since the start of summer.

"At present," they state, "Communists are convinced of the possibility of reaching a national compromise on crucial issues calling for immediate solutions, provided meaningful political changes are made and workers' and young people's interests and demands are respected, the plurality of prevailing political forces is taken into account, and all public freedoms are guaranteed."

French Language Weekly Is Suspended

If the latest action by the authorities to ease the tense political climate "is to become irreversible," the Communists are of the opinion that it will be necessary to solve "on a sound democratic basis" the problems of trade union and student representation, to declare a general amnesty, and to guarantee all political forces the right to express and organize themselves. Their chief demands are removal of the 18-year old ban on their party, and the right to publish their own newspapers.

LA PHARE, a French language weekly, was suspended for three months on 23 August for "publishing false news." It was accused last week of reporting an appeal to Bourguiba by the secretary general of the African Trade Unity Organization. Such an appeal apparently was not made. The issue of the weekly that was to blame was nevertheless put on the market as usual. LE PHASE had been coming out since 6 January. It presented itself as a newspaper that was free of any political connection. But for some time it had been devoting more and more space to the labor union crisis and it did not conceal its partiality towards the former leadership of the UGTT (Tunisian General Federation of Labor). A month ago it ran into trouble when the printshop which was affiliated with the labor union refused to continue running it off. Since that time it was forced to cut back on the number of pages and curtail its press run which, according to the editors, was up to 5000 copies.

HABIB CHATTY COMMENTS ON JERUSALEM AS ISRAELI CAPITAL

[Text] Habib Chatty, secretary general of the Islamic Conference, left Tunis yesterday at noon for Rabat, where he will head up the Islamic Conference's delegation at the Jerusalem Committee's meeting, which will be held on the 16th and 17th of this month.

Habib Chatty said in a statement that during its session in Rabat, the Jerusalem Committee will consider the practical steps to be taken to meet the Israeli challenge to the Arabs and Palestine--a challenge that has just been renewed through Israel's decision to transfer its capital from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Chatty observed in this connection that the Islamic Conference was the first organization to launch an appeal for practical measures in behalf of the Palestinian people, among them political pressure on Israel and intensified resistance within the occupied territories.

Habib Chatty also said that by establishing settlement centers, Israel aims to create a de facto situation and is making every effort to subject the West Bank to the same fate as the Arab lands it has annexed. Chatty added that because of this, the duty of the Arabs commands that they stand in the way of Israel's schemes and use every means at their disposal to prevent the accomplishment of Zionist aims.

Questioned as to the chances of the resolution submitted to the Security Council by the Islamic Conference, Habib Chatty explained that the resolution will be debated by all the members of the Security Council in various ways. Most of the countries support the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and the establishment of an independent state, whereas all the European countries are hesitating because, while they actually support the rights of the Palestinian people, they are bound to the United States, which is preparing for a presidential election and cannot, in such circumstances, escape Zionist influence.

Habib Chatty concluded by emphasizing that the decision by the Security Council will depend on the position adopted by the United States and the Western camp. He noted that if the United States abstains, the resolution will pass, but if the United States uses its veto power, the Security Council will make no decision.

PROBLEMS PERTAINING TO EMIGRANT WORKERS DISCUSSED

Return of Workers a Priority

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 16 Aug 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] Mr Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and secretary general of the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party], will preside at the 14th congress of Tunisian workers abroad, to be held today at the El Omrane Lycee. As they do each year, the representatives of our emigrant workers will discuss a number of problems pertaining to their living and working conditions abroad, their social and economic concerns and the prospects available to them if they return definitively to the country with representatives of the various ministries, national organizations and enterprises.

As of 31 December 1978, the Tunisian community living abroad included 356,387 citizens distributed as follows: 202,931 in France, 19,180 in Germany, 13,500 in Belgium, 1,304 in Holland, 2,200 in Switzerland, 81,067 in Libya, 25,406 in Algeria, 1,564 in Morocco, and 9,235 in other countries.

This figure, representing almost a third of the active Tunisian population, represents a very substantial productive and social mass the gradual re-integration of which in the national job system has become increasingly necessary because of the protectionist measures adopted by many of the host countries due to the effects of rather acute economic crises.

However as the capacity of the domestic job market to absorb them is not under current conditions such as to allow all Tunisian workers abroad to return to the country and immediately obtain jobs here, solutions must be found so that the interests of all parties (host country, country of origin and workers) can be safeguarded.

If it is true that a good number of the countries using foreign manpower are currently faced with recession problems forcing them to give priority in their concern to their own citizens, it is equally true that in periods of economic prosperity, these same foreign workers they would like to get rid of now have played a very active role in the rapid advance of the economies of these countries, and it would therefore be unjust to make them alone suffer the consequences of a crisis for which they are not responsible.

When one benefits from cheap manpower, for the training of which one has spent nothing, and enjoys this advantage for long years, it is no longer acceptable to "wash one's hands"as soon as one no longer needs them. This is why it is the duty of the host countries to take the interests of their foreign workers into account, to grant them the rights to which they have become entitled after long years of labor, and to allow them to benefit from all social advantages (decent housing, adequate education for their children, the right to sociocultural differences, etc) until such time as their return to their countries of origin becomes possible and can be effected honorably and with dignity.

Among the major points which will be discussed during the 14th congress of Tunisian workers abroad, the means of dealing with the current situation in the host countries and the urgent solutions required to safeguard the interests of our workers abroad will thus be given priority.

Prime Minister Speaks

[Text] Tunisian workers abroad meeting in Tunis for their 14th national seminar yesterday made overwhelmingly clear their confidence in and support of the government working under the leadership of President Bourguiba and the direction of Mr Mohamed Mzali to carry out a policy of renewal in all sectors of national life.

It was in an atmosphere of warm support and enthusiasm recalling the great days of the struggle that the opening session of the seminar developed, with Mr Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and secretary general of the party, presiding, and a number of government and Political Bureau officials participating.

Mr Mzali's entry into the assembly hall at the El Omrane Lycee won him a prolonged ovation. Those present stood to sing the revolutionary anthem and to chant the name of the chief of state at length.

An immediate rapport was established between the prime minister and his audience. Our foreign workers, educated in the school of endurance and courage, reacted to Mr Mohamed Mzali throughout his speech, which they interrupted on a number of occasions to applaud and cheer. In particular, they appreciated the profound sincerity evident in the words of the prime minister and the patriotic and moral motivations underlying his thought. Brilliantly adapting the magic of words to daily problems and happily marrying lyricism and objectivity, Mr Mohamed Mzali spoke to the Tunisian workers abroad in direct and open language which went straight to their hearts. He praised their love of their native country and reasserted the desire of the Bourguiba regime to pursue a policy such that Tunisians abroad, wherever they may be, will benefit from secure conditions of life and work.

"Dear Brothers:

I am happy to inaugurate this 14th national seminar of our workers abroad, with a large number of my colleagues in the government and Political Bureau, our ambassadors and consuls and numerous officials in charge of affairs involving you abroad attending.

This seminar, which is a happy tradition we are determined to continue, is in fact one link in a chain of meetings and direct talks among officials in all sectors.

I would like first of all, while bidding you welcome, to inform you of the great concern the supreme combatant, President Habib Bourguiba, has for you. He has instructed me to convey to you his greetings and to tell you once again of the affection he has for you and his determination to continue his actions to maintain the links which bind you to Tunisia and which are a part of the organic bonds between you and the nation to which you belong. This attachment must remain powerful and encourage the efforts which will allow you to continue to play a positive role in the national development and to contribute to the gradual achievement of prosperity in our country.

This substantial contingent of emigrant compatriots, totaling 350,000 workers, students and businessmen--nearly 210,000 in France, i.e. more than half, and about 80,000 in Libya--while the whole population of certain independent countries does not exceed or even reach this figure--must be regarded as an integral part of our Tunisian nation, and we must regard the emigration of this part of our sons as a basically temporary situation.

I must in truth stress that our compatriots living abroad have at all times expressed their devotion to their country and given evidence of a patriotic spirit. I myself had the experience of this truth when, more than 30 years ago, I pursued my higher studies in France. This was in the era of the struggle for national liberation and we students were in constant contact with the Tunisian workers who had emigrated to France. They, serving as secret soldiers, provided a mailing drop for the Destourian cells and militants. Still today, the overwhelming majority of the Tunisian workers abroad are playing, as in the past, an important role in the defense of the interests of their country, safeguarding its outstanding image.

However, in recent years we have seen a new phenomenon which did not exist at the time of the national struggle. It has to do with the conduct of certain organizations and certain regimes which, profiting from the difficulties encountered by some of our compatriots abroad, difficulties most often due to irregular situations, are subjecting them to vile slander and turning them little by little against their country.

Maneuvers Victimizing These Workers

The maneuvers are sometimes underhanded, but they may also be flagrant and scandalous as was the case in the Gafsa affair. Other minds with evil intent have recourse to more "subtle" methods taking the form of indoctrination or brainwashing, methods designed to make the foreign worker, whether he be Tunisian, Arab or African--for this does not involve Tunisians alone--that the policy being pursued by his country is not a good one and that the choices made are not satisfactory.

This undertaking derives from an overall strategy designed to weaken the stability of the existing regimes. The worker begins to feel defensive, and with a great flood of ideological argument and depending on the case, he becomes a revolutionary, a leftist, a rightist extremist or joins organizations whose names or labels are not unknown to you.

Distributed in autonomous cells with no more than five or six members and with no communication between them, their heads are stuffed with slogans, a dab of progressivism here, a bit of socialism there, like a dish one seasons with various ingredients, so that the worker, who has left his homeland to earn a living and come to the aid of his family, becomes a subversive element, ready to overturn the regime in his country.

The authors of these maneuvers--and their writings provide proof of this--are seeking to sow confusion among the workers in order to turn them against their country. Tunisia is not the sole target for such undertakings: all African nations have suffered from it. But this has not succeeded and will not succeed with Tunisia for a number of reasons. Our Bourguiba regime is in fact one with a popular essence, and it is Bourguiba himself who has educated his people and forged the nation.

All Tunisians, whether they work in their country or in foreign lands, know perfectly well what Tunisia was like before independence, what it has become and what it is called upon to be thanks to the Bourguiba policies. They know that this regime is basically founded upon the people and that there is no hiatus between the masses and the officials for the simple reason that the latter, beginning with President Bourguiba himself, come from the people and are fervently dedicated to serving them. Whereas some of those who try to poison minds themselves belong to the bourgeoisie. How can such people, who have always lived in the greatest of comfort, dare claim to know the people? Is it the right of the sons of the well-to-do to give us lessons in progressivism and socialism? Wouldn't they have been better off to examine their own situation first? It is true that the camel does not see his own hump! We have known these people since we attended the Sadiki College. Although they belong to families of rich landowners, they have such overweening arrogance as to take pride in progressivism and to assume for themselves labels which hardly fit. We whose parents lived in the most total deprivation, we who had no weapon with which to face life except determination and faith in the future, are today accused by these pseudo-progressives of serving the bourgeoisie! A strange inversion of roles! The Tunisian workers, who are familiar with all of this, do not lend their ears to this song which does not ring true to reality. Some of them who, for one reason or another, have been led into error, have as soon as they realized the truth rejoined the ranks of the majority and made common cause with the people. This is what we have been able to note in recent times. The reason for it is that the Bourguiba regime is a regime with a popular essence and, as such, it is safe from intrigues--whatever their source--designed to deceive the workers and make them believe that the regime does not care at all about their situation. The other explanation for the devotion of the emigrant Tunisian workers to their country lies in the particular concern the Bourguiba regime has devoted to them. In this connection, the organization we have established is perfect.

Ambassadors, consuls, social attachés, mutual interest associations, Destourian cells--all are pursuing consistent action to the benefit of our compatriots abroad. Without citing figures with which most of you are entirely familiar, I would remind you of the outstanding activities such as the establishment of sports and cultural associations, the organization of seminars and discussions similar to this one.

Breaking the Vicious Circles

If problems exist, we must examine them and provide them with the proper solutions without further delay. It is important to break out of the vicious circle. The workers should no longer be content to submit their complaints or the competent authorities to make a note of them, while awaiting a better tomorrow.

The time has come to put a stop to this situation. Let us try to examine the pending problems together and focus our efforts on finding together the solutions required. We have nothing to hide and nothing can embarrass us. If certain measures prove outdated, it will perhaps be possible to revoke or amend them.

If there have been errors, it is important to correct them. Nothing forces us to be slaves to routine or to confine ourselves to futile discussion.

We have addressed ourselves to the task. Day and night, we are pursuing the study of our problems. For example only yesterday our ambassador, Mr Hedi Mabrouk, told me that plans call for the establishment of an advance unit at each consulate, a cell which will have the task of facilitating, for each Tunisian worker desiring to establish a business, the completion of the necessary formalities before he returns to Tunisia, so that he will not be required, once he is back in the country, to go from one office to another indefinitely. Some officials, it must be admitted, not all, happily, but a minority, sit back at ease in their armchairs and are content to ask you to present this or that document or to put you off indefinitely. This is the damnable routine from which I do not want you to suffer. Routine takes root in people's minds. We must amend this state of affairs so that the administration will perfectly and speedily carry out its duty to the citizens. I myself have seen some problems in this connection. In a village in the Sahel, a citizen told me a very discouraging tale. For more than a year his machinery has been halted while he has been sent from one office to another. He had purchased premises from his own funds, but his business did not succeed. He had lost all taste for eating and drinking and spent most of his time going from one department to another while the municipal or administrative official seemed not to care, at peace with himself. This red tape must be banished from our thinking by an effort of conscious will. Our difficulties come 70 to 80 percent from this situation. It must be noted that our budget, our policy and our plans have been clearly established. Thus red tape must be held responsible. This term, which is not to be found in the Arab language, should be incorporated within it, like many foreign words which were welcomed by our scholars at the time of the upsurge of Arab civilization or in the modern era, such as philosophic terms, those pertaining to sophism, recycling, etc.

If it is possible to help the worker complete the necessary formalities by cooperating with the country to which he has chosen to emigrate it will be possible for him to return to his native land and establish himself there without further procedures. Mr Mongl Kooli, director of the party, has told me that he established the Economic and Social Department of the party, entrusted to Comrade Noureddine Hached, and representing a department designed to spare Tunisians working abroad the inconvenience of interminable administrative procedures. Specialized agents are assigned to help and advise the emigrant worker. This helps to explain why our workers are devoted to our regime, which is concerned about their interests and makes an effort every year to resolve certain of their problems. A third reason for their devotion to the regime is what we might call genuine patriotism.

Each Tunisian a Patriot

Each Tunisian in fact, whether he is a worker, farmer, businessman, industrialist or government employee, is a patriot, loves his country, and by the grace of God, understands perfectly that the foreigner who comes to stuff his head intends nothing else but to make him a slave of a foreign country by enrolling him in opposition movements. One must understand the ins and outs of the matter. If this gentleman encourages you to weaken your country and to sow disorder, it is to bring it to its knees before what the regime preached by the opposition represents. I do not wish to mention any particular country. These people want to weaken us and to sow intrigue among us to favor our absorption by their countries in the name of this or that progressive, rightist, unionist or other doctrine. In the name of friendship and brotherhood they embrace you in order to smother you and weaken your country, so that Tunisia will no longer be anything but a market and will lose its independence. This is the real truth. Tunisians understand only too well what this or that party represents. Do not force me to dot the i's. Slogans should not deceive us. Some countries--God forgive or damn them--would like to plunge us into anarchy and establish their parties in Tunisia, so that we would lose our independence and become dependent on them. Whatever their opinions may be, Tunisian workers would prefer famine, even if they were incapable of feeding their children, rather than agree to be the slaves of a foreign country and to sell out their own.

It is for these reasons that some foreign leaders err where we are concerned. In their view the fact that Tunisians, when they meet, whether it be in a cafe or the premises of a Destourian cell or in some other place, undertake to criticize this or that action by the administration and urge the improvement of certain things, leads them to believe with disconcerting naivete that Tunisians are ready to sell out their country. No, gentlemen, you are in serious error! You should know that when a Tunisian criticizes this or that aspect of national life, he is acting like a son who expresses his discontent with regard to some action by his parents. Between criticism and betrayal, however, the distance is enormous. Tunisians, whatever complaints they may have about the actions of the government or the administration, are not prepared to betray and will never betray their country. For the fact of owing allegiance to a foreign party or power represents, whatever the excuse or pretext, betrayal. And there can be no cooperation between Tunisia and a country of the East or the West if the cooperation relations are not based on mutual respect for independence and non-intervention in the domestic affairs of each state. No cooperation, unity or privileged bilateral relations can be tolerated if they derive from the will of the stronger or if they tend to impose de facto hegemony. The modern concept of international relations excludes the concept of the weak and the strong. Each state, whatever its size, must legitimately safeguard its independence, on which no compromise is justified. It is acceptable that a powerful nation may unite with one less strong than it is, but on condition that the former nurture no intent at all to crush the other and then assimilate it. Unity through violence and force is something universally rejected. Our happiness, our dignity, are not for sale, and we will never be willing to see them besmirched in any way whatsoever. To live modestly but in respect and with our honor intact, never stooping to beg from anyone--this is the motto of all Tunisians, wherever they may be. It happens that some of our fellow-citizens express their discontent from time to time about this or that administrative action, but those who --and here I am speaking to foreigners--believe that they can attack

Tunisia, lead Tunisians into error, corrupt them or win them over for their designs are seriously mistaken. This country was not born yesterday. It is the fatherland of a people who have recovered their identity and their dignity, who have been struggling for nearly half a century and who have won their independence at the cost of thousands of martyrs. Today, all Tunisians are working tirelessly in order to bequeath to their children and the children of their children a free, sovereign and respected Tunisia. Thus those who believe that they can plunder this country or trifle with its independence should not waste their effort. This we state forcefully and proclaim to heaven and earth.

I have made a point of paying homage to the healthy patriotic spirit which you have evidenced or are evidencing and your courageous attitude in the defense of the territorial integrity of your country and in safeguarding the prestige of Tunisia. When you state your nationality, there is no reason to blush or to bow to anyone. Our honor is intact and our situation is enviable. Thanks to Bourguiba and the party of Bourguiba, the Tunisian star glitters in the firmament. This is what I had to say to you at the beginning of this address.

Now I would like to discuss with you what has come to be called the problem of return. But before doing that, I would like to remind you that emigration itself has historic causes. Our country inherited an unenviable situation from the colonial era. The present regime, the men who are in power today, had nothing to do with it, quite the contrary. Our ancestors offered our country to the colonials as a preserve. A protectorate was imposed on us. To regain our sovereignty, we had to fight for more than 20 years.

Full Flowering for Each Tunisian

Today, 24 years after winning independence, we have not for all that ceased to wage the battle. But what progress we have made since then! This is the statement of a reality which, you will doubtless agree, is not motivated by any propaganda purpose. We do not however claim to have achieved our goal. Some of our achievements have in fact been the cause of new difficulties. For example, the popularization of education--which in the past was almost nonexistent, because our grandfathers did not even conceive of this possibility, and also because the colonial authorities did not find it in their interests--has not failed to give rise to new problems of which we are fully aware. It is a question of guaranteeing jobs for the graduates, providing work for those who do not graduate, and beyond these questions, waging a battle against a certain attitude of mind, once very widespread, involving fatalism and submission to fate. President Bourguiba has transformed this way of thinking. A well-known verse in the Koran says that God does not change the situation of the people until they have changed what lies in themselves. Remember that Tunisians were resigned to colonialism.

After innumerable visits to the cities and the countryside, President Bourguiba succeeded in drastically altering this mode of thinking. Since then, Tunisians have been ready to sacrifice for their fatherland.

Once independence was won and education widespread, a healthy ambition developed in the people. This eminently positive ambition, which we would like to see shared by all, did not fail to give rise to new needs and to arouse new aspirations.

Today, it is our concern to find a solution to all these problems, for it is our ardent desire that no Tunisian be trapped in routine, and that the love of life be the main stimulus. We nurture the desire to see every Tunisian achieve his full flowering, both for him and for his children. But this requires the development of wealth, of jobs and an increase in the income of the country so that each Tunisian can achieve his aspirations. This is our constant concern. Tunisians, generally speaking, and the workers in particular, should not be unaware of all we have done toward this end, of the path it remains for us to cover and of the contribution they must make to the success of this advance.

The present plan is coming to an end. The sixth plan is being drafted. It is an ambitious plan. Its choices, its goals and the means it will mobilize will be specified in the months to come. I will content myself with outlining some of its characteristics. We will work tirelessly to provide every condition for its success. We are determined first of all to reabsorb the unemployed, which will require the creation of 600,000 new jobs in the next 5 or 6 years. This is not an easy task, particularly since we are firmly determined to create profitable jobs in the full sense of the word.

The problem of unemployment exists in Tunisia. I say this and confirm it although some are reluctant to speak of it. What harm is there in speaking of it? It is an obvious fact and it is the reason that numerous Tunisians have had to emigrate. The Tunisians who have recently returned to the country encounter difficulties on the level of finding jobs in general or, more particularly, work which meets their requirements. Problems exist on this level and require suitable solutions. One of the great choices made in this connection is the launching of major projects in inland Tunisia, which has not benefited from the same rate of growth as the coastal regions. There is an imbalance of an historical nature to be corrected here. Major projects are under study or in the process of implementation. It is not a question of creating work sites or establishing small enterprises of minor dimensions to be surrounded by a great publicity effort. It is a question on the contrary of establishing major farm or industrial projects capable of absorbing unemployment in the regions located between Jendouba and Medenine.

The problem of unemployment, it must be remembered, is not specific to Tunisia. The countries in which you work suffer from the same evil. Thus to admit the existence of unemployment in our country in no way diminishes us. Unemployment is a fate shared by all. In France, in the FRG, in the United States, there are millions unemployed. And if you are encountering difficulties, it is because the French, the Germans or the Belgians have not found job opportunities. In other words the problem of unemployment is a general one, the list of reasons for which would be tedious.

In addition, it is a question of promoting the agricultural sector. In this connection I would like to draw your attention to the priority importance of agriculture.

Far from coming down to mere plowing, agriculture today is an industry which creates jobs and covers activities as diverse as livestock breeding, fishing, early fruits and vegetables, greenhouse crops and industries such as canning and processing. This is our goal. Already we have begun to try to educate the banks to this end. Measures have already been announced. Others will be announced soon, in the month of November, as soon as they have been perfected. These measures are designed to settle Tunisians on their land so that they can develop it and derive from it the means of assuring a decent and worthy life.

Eliminating Backward Thinking

The success of such an undertaking also presumes a reduction in administrative formalities. This is one of the reasons we have been led to contemplate administrative decentralization. It involves bringing the administration closer to the citizen. It is abnormal for a resident of Medenine or Kasserine to be forced to make a trip to the capital in order to obtain an administrative document. It is necessary for the administration to be decentralized and to have autonomous branch units on the regional level. It is also important to limit the number of documents required in order to obtain an authorization. Why, for example, must 10 or 12 documents be presented to obtain a passport? Shouldn't a national identity card suffice to obtain this document from the capital of the governorate? I might inform you in passing that this is now an accomplished fact. The minister of interior has already made a decision in this regard. The same is the case with authorizations and permits of all sorts. A petitioner, if no response is obtained within a period of 15 days, is entitled to presume that he has been given a green light to undertake the action for which he solicited authorization from the government authorities. It is intolerable for citizens to have to waste their time in trips back and forth as tedious as they are unnecessary. It is through measures of this sort that we will put an end to backward ways of thinking and will succeed in bringing the administration closer to the citizen. We propose to undertake this task without delay and the coming months will show you that we are determined to effect an administrative reform consistent with the desires of the citizens. In this way we will put an end to the reasons for emigration. For we believe that Tunisia is capable of feeding its sons, just as we believe that it has and always will have need of all its sons.

There is another question I would like to bring up and which has to do with your contribution to the development of the country. This seminar gives me an opportunity to pay ringing homage to the active role you have paid in the past 4 or 5 years in the national development effort. During this period, nearly 750 projects have been developed by Tunisians returning to their native land after having worked abroad. I hope that this major effort will continue and will be expanded. The government and the party have taken every step to encourage and support this effort. Measures will be adopted to facilitate the formalities required and to encourage this goodwill.

Developing Socio-Political Activities

With modest capital and subsidies allocated by the funds already established, it is possible to establish small enterprises, if only of the family type. The worker returning to his country need not necessarily build a great factory. A small shop adjacent to his home can enable him to pursue his activity with the help of his family. Such enterprises exist in Italy and Switzerland, for example, and provide a living for a certain number of citizens.

Moreover, it would be desirable to develop socio-political activities for the benefit of workers continuing to live abroad, by creating Destourian cells and organizing conferences, in particular for those living in France and especially those living in Paris. The number of these workers as well as the funds available allow undertakings in this direction. In this connection, it is my pleasure to inform you of a decision Mr Hedi Mabrouk, our ambassador in Paris, and I have just made. With regard to the level of maturity achieved by our workers abroad, and in order to allow their mutual interest associations to achieve wider influence and to carry out their activities under better conditions, we have decided to make available to them the premises situated on Fortuny Street, which are at present vacant. These premises, owned by the Tunisian government, will in the future be yours. They will serve to house your activities and can be administered by a committee including, in addition to the Tunisian consul, members of the mutual interest association and the Destourian cell.

If we have been able to make these premises available, it is because we have been able, since 1 July of this year, to effect savings equivalent to a third of the budget allocated to our embassy in France. The personnel assigned to the offices in Fortuny Street have been transferred to the consulate and the embassy. Thus we have sought to reduce administrative costs and allocate the funds saved to projects benefiting the workers. As to the premises now available, they will as I have said be made available to you. In my capacity as secretary general of the PSD and in the presence of the director of the party, I would like to inform you that we are prepared to help you carry out whatever you deem it possible to do to strengthen the activity and the influence of the party and to allow ou thus to develop the awareness of certain of our young workers. This action should, naturally, be carried out within the framework of respect for the laws in effect in the host country. As President Bourguiba stressed in the message he delivered to us last 1 June, the Tunisian worker and all Tunisians in general, whether they be workers, students or businessmen, should adhere to exemplary conduct. In the course of my talks with the French, German and other ministers, I have learned of the feelings the host countries have concerning us. They believe that Tunisians are industrious and competent. Minister of Social Affairs Mohamed Ennaceur has confirmed to me that more than half of the Tunisian workers are skilled workers. This is an unusual fact and is worth noting. Tunisians thus enjoy an excellent fund of esteem and consideration. It is a question of consolidating it and avoiding anything which could strike a blow at the reputation of our country. If some young people--very few, indeed--engage in reprehensible actions, it is for the mutual aid association, the Destourian cell or the sports association to call them to account. To my knowledge, there are some 80 sports associations for our workers abroad, including 49 in France, as well as numerous dramatic groups. Our workers also have libraries.

Safeguarding the Workers' Interests

We are prepared to increase this social and cultural activity, in cooperation with the departments involved, in order to provide our workers, in particular the young ones, with an alternative to bars and other places of ill repute and to involve them in educational and leisure activities within the framework of the mutual interest associations and Destourian cells. This can only contribute to Tunisia's prestige.

A last point: Some of you want to know whether you are protected by the Tunisian state or not. It should not be necessary to assure you that you are, and that this is one of our major concerns. But as I have just stressed, your host countries have since 1974-75 been adopting measures designed to limit foreign contingents.

We are working, discreetly but effectively, whether it be with the French authorities or those of other countries, to safeguard the interests of Tunisian workers, to ensure that they will benefit from certain favorable measures and to avoid their abusive or arbitrary expulsion.

It is our desire that the return of our workers should be organized in a rational and carefully-thought-out manner. Our position in this regard is clear. We say to the friendly and neighboring countries that the state of our relations with them reflects the treatment they give our nationals. We tell them quite frankly that the level of our cooperation with them and the degree of our friendship remain a function of their behavior toward our workers. Today or tomorrow, our position remains the same. This is a constant in our policy, whether it is a question of organizing the sojourn of our workers abroad or their return to Tunisia.

In conclusion, I would like you to bear witness with me to the atmosphere of optimism and fraternity prevailing in Tunisia today. In the course of your stay, be it 1 month or 15 days, you have certainly seen that Tunisia is a land of dialog. But as I stressed in my speech in Mahdia, dialog does not mean laxity or carelessness. Dialog obeys the laws, within the context of rights and duties.

Tunisia, as President Bourguiba said on 3 August, is perhaps the only country in the Third World in which the chief of state can solemnly assert that there are no more political prisoners in his country.

The most curious thing, and this is a mere remark, is that some parties and circles are trying to make contact with you. Wouldn't it have been better for them to sweep their own doorsteps first? Whether they come from the West or the East, by what right do they assume the right to teach us lessons in progressiveness? It would be interesting to know how many political prisoners are rotting in their prisons, how many have been shot and how many are being persecuted!

The Tunisia of Bourguiba is determined to persevere in the path of dialog and an open approach to all Tunisians.

Tunisia is not the monopoly of any individual or category to the exclusion of all the others. It belongs to all Tunisians, from whatever region they may come, and we are not afraid of stating, whatever opinions they endorse. We do not fear plurality of views. On the contrary, we believe that this provides enrichment. Is there not a diversity of opinions, tastes and inclinations within any given family?

Tunisians constitute a single family and each of them has the right to express his opinions freely within the framework of the law, respect for others and harmony.

I believe that there is no hindrance to this. But if a Tunisian wants to dominate or head a gang to attempt intimidating maneuvers, that cannot be. Just yesterday Bourguiba recalled that he had sacrificed his youth and will continue to devote all his energies to ensure that all Tunisians are equal before the law.

In the presence of Mr Mongi Kooli and other colleagues, I told the president in Monastir the other day that I wanted to effect a housecleaning, beginning at the top, for we should set the example. I would not want, when I am addressing citizens from a rostrum, to be forced to speak about someone and to denounce his actions while he is sitting beside me.

Tunisia belongs to honest, upright Tunisians who are working in the service of God and the fatherland.

It is not a question of the party who talks the loudest and pounds on the table having the last word. Dialog must develop in respect for the basic rules of courtesy. The supreme combatant told me that his entire battle has been designed to raise Tunisia to this level. I told him that he can count on its sons.

I am here with you sharing the same love of the fatherland and of Bourguiba. What we ask of you is to help us to serve our country with self-sacrifice and devotion.

Organized Repatriation

[Text] Minister of Social Affairs Mohamed Ennaceur delivered the concluding address last evening at the 14th seminar of Tunisian workers abroad.

In his address, Mr Mohamed Ennaceur said that this seminar, unlike the preceding ones, brought to the fore the concern of Tunisian workers abroad about their definitive return to their country. "It is natural and legitimate for each Tunisian worker abroad," he said, "to be concerned about his definitive return to the country. This is also a major concern of the government. However, this return, as was the case with emigration, must be organized and prepared for within the framework of a tripartite arrangement involving the host country, Tunisia and the emigrant himself."

And Mr Ennaceur added:

"In our view, return to the country means above all reintegration in the domestic socioeconomic circuit and not a return to unemployment.

"As a result, it is important for the emigrant workers to derive profit from their stay abroad by perfecting themselves on the professional level and obtaining continuing training, setting to work in such a way as to create the conditions for a decent life in their country. For the Tunisian worker abroad must constantly keep in mind that he only chose emigration in order to improve his standard of living.

"Therefore, the return he must deliberately choose, like his choice to emigrate, should assure him of a better future."

Further on the subject of reintegration in active national life, Mr Mohamed Ennaceur suggested the establishment of a national savings-employment fund.

Its purpose would be to encourage the Tunisian worker to prepare for his definitive return to his country.

Mr Ennaceur made it clear that the host countries which employ young emigrants whose training costs their country of origin dear should play a positive role in organizing their return, in particular by providing these workers with proper training and capital sufficient to prevent their unemployment.

Mr Ennaceur announced moreover that during the course of the next plan, Tunisia plans to halt emigration and will work to create jobs for the emigrant workers who have chosen to return for good. In order for this to be achieved, he said, Tunisian workers abroad must help us in preparing statistics pertaining to this return, by contacting the bodies in charge of emigration and informing them about their definitive return and their specialties.

Where jobs are concerned, the minister of social affairs noted that the government is making a vast effort with a view to creating jobs, while encouraging private persons to undertake industrial projects. However, he said, the state and industry cannot alone meet all of the demand for jobs, and this is why it is imperative for other sectors (agriculture, crafts) to participate in this effort by launching small projects capable of ensuring a number of citizens of a decent income.

Earlier, the general conference motion was read. In it the participants reiterated their unalterable devotion to the supreme combatant and to national unity.

They noted with satisfaction the social achievements benefiting them and recommended the strengthening of the administrative structures and the party in the host countries.

They also recommended additional aid for the children and families of Tunisians working abroad.

From the political point of view, they urged the strengthening of party action in the host countries, to provide, among other things, better coordination of the efforts undertaken by the party structures.

On the social level, they recommended the drafting of social security agreements between Tunisia and the host countries, and the strengthening of education in the Arab language.

From the economic viewpoint, they recommended the simplification of administrative procedures and pointed to the needed to help emigrant workers to launch productive enterprises by supplying them with the necessary information for this purpose. Finally, the participants addressed two telegrams of support to President Bourguiba and Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali.

FARMERS GAMBLE ON OLIVES, PISTACHIOS, ALMONDS

Lusaka SUNDAY TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 24 Aug 80 p 5

[Article by John Madeley]

[Text] THE United Nations World Food Programme has persuaded more than 80,000 small farmers in Tunisia to abandon wheat and maize production and plant their land with olive trees.

For up to 20 years — until the olives bear fruit — the farmers will be totally dependent on WFP food aid, from outside sources over which they have no control.

The Tunisian project is part of a WFP plan to "modernise" agriculture in arid and semi-arid regions.

A similar scheme has just begun in Syria. Such projects raise serious questions about the direction of Third World agricultural development.

The Tunisian project was launched some 10 years ago to improve the income and standard of living of small farmers in the north of the country.

Plot

The farmers, each working about two hectares of land, grew wheat and maize, both for their own use and to sell locally.

Yearly earnings from a two hectare plot were only about K500, and some of the farmers were giving up their land and drifting to the towns.

The WFP reckons that growing olive, almond and pistachio trees instead of wheat and maize will eventually enable a farmer to treble his income. The snag is that olives do not bear fruit until 15 to 20 years after planting, pistachios until 11 years and almonds until 10.

During that time, the WFP has promised to supply food to farmers who make the change-over. Farmers and their families receive a weekly package of semolina, oil, beans, milk powder, cheese and sugar, giving each person the equivalent of 1,600 calories a day.

A farmer who planted olive trees in 1978 must expect to receive such aid until at least 1993.

Farmers were tempted to join the scheme by the offer of free food and the promise of higher incomes later on.

They qualified only if they joined a farmer "grouping". There are now 733 of these groupings, and the land converted covers an area of over 200,00 hectares.

A farmer who joins a grouping reaps his last harvest of grain, digs up his field and receives a loan to plant trees, mainly olives. The loan will be paid off eventually from the proceeds of the fruit.

But the trees need maintenance if they are to yield fruit, so the farmer is obliged to stay on the land and look after them.

As the maintenance of the trees only occupies a few hours a week, some farmers also work as hired labour for larger landowners.

So the smallholder, who once grew his own wheat and maize and was able to control his own livelihood, however modest, is now dependent on a weekly food package and will be so for up to 20 years. He is in debt for his trees and has perhaps become a hired hand for a larger landowner.

The rewards, the farmer is assured, will come later. But how certain is this, either for the farmer or for the country as a whole?

Tunisia's current five year plan aims at self-sufficiency in food. But that goal is still a long way off. This year, Tunisia will produce about 600,000 tons of grain and import a million tons. The WFP olive project is steadily reducing the amount of land under grain, and means a lower overall food output for Tunisia for the next 15 to 20 years.

At the same time, the switch to cash crops — some of which will be exported — means increasing dependence on the vagaries of world market forces.

At present, there is a surplus of olives in Europe and the Middle East and this may well continue for the next decade.

The WFP projects represents the longest-ever period for which Third World farmers have been expected to depend on food donations.

The Tunisian farmers will in effect be dependent on foreign governments, and subject to any shifts of aid policy in donor countries.

Exciting policies on food aid may, in fact, be drastically revised in the next few years. There are signs that a "food aid rethink", spearheaded by the field staff of development agencies, is now spreading to donor governments.

It is beginning to be acknowledged that while food aid is valuable in emergencies, it is not a good tool for development.

It creates a dependence on outside sources which can undermine the process of development.

The WFP project in Tunisia represents a major gamble.

If it pays off, it will mean higher incomes and a better standard of living for the small farmers. If it does not, it means that Tunisia's food production capacity drops, and 80,000 families lose their livelihood. — EARTHSCAN.

FEDERAL COUNCIL APPROVES MILITARY SERVICE BILL

Council Debates Bill

Abu Dhabi AL-ITTIHAD in Arabic 28 May 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Sadiq 'Aziz and Muhammad 'Amir: "National Military Service Bill Approved; Disbursement of Salaries to Drafted Civil Servants To Continue Throughout the Period of Their Service"]

[Text] At the meeting it held yesterday, attended by His Excellency Muhammad ibn Rashid, the minister of defense, the Federal National Council [FNC] approved the National Military Service Bill in the light of amendments that were introduced into it by the council's Committee on Domestic Affairs and Defense. The bill was turned over to the Council of Ministers for approval; it is then to be turned over to the Supreme Council so that it would be put into effect as soon as it is endorsed.

The council had amended Article 17 of the bill as follows: "The civilian position of an enlisted man and all the salaries and promotions that derive therefrom are to be held for him while he is performing his national military service. Government agencies and public organizations are to continue disbursing the salaries of enlisted men they employ. But those who work in private sector companies or agencies, receive their salaries from the Ministry of Defense. The length of their military service is to be calculated in their civilian service and treated as double emergency service when compensations or pensions are computed." The committee had introduced several amendments to the bill, and these were approved by the council. These amendments are:

Article 2 made military service mandatory for all male citizens between the ages of 16 and 35. It was the opinion of the committee that the age of 16 was not quite suitable. This is because a young man at this early age is not capable of joining the army corps. Such a step would require bearing arms and pursuing an arduous military life. Therefore, the article was amended to make it apply to those between the ages of 18 and 35.

Article 6 gave peremptory exemption from service to all the sons of officers or enlisted men who lost their lives in the service or who were 60 percent or more disabled during military operations. It was the opinion of the committee that only the two oldest sons were to be exempted from military service so that the rest of the sons would still have the honor of performing their national duty.

Article 7 gave a temporary exemption from service to a man who was supporting his brother if that brother was disabled because of a physical impairment or disease. It also gave a temporary exemption to students and to people who were undergoing a course of therapy. An addition was made granting a temporary exemption to men supporting a brother or brothers who were not 18 years old.

It was evident when the Federal National Council [FNC] began its session yesterday that there were few members [present]. Had only two or three [more] members not come, the session would not have been held, and the meeting would have been postponed for lack of a quorom. But God protected the council, [and the meeting did take place]. It was also evident from the outset that the discussion would be calm, regardless of how long the session would last, because of the small number of members.

What is important is that at 10 o'clock Hilal Lawtah chaired the session because His Excellency Tarim 'Umran Tarim had expressed his regrets and His Excellency Hamad Bu Shihab was absent because he was heading a delegation of the council that was visiting Taiwan. The meeting was attended by His Excellency Muhammad ibn Rashid, the minister of defense; His Excellency Sa'id al-Ghayth, the minister of state for the affairs of the Council of Ministers; and the chairman of the Civil Service Council. The meeting was also attended by 'Abd-al-Majid al-Sayyid, adviser to His Highness al-Shaykh Maktum ibn Rashid; by the adviser on civil service affairs; and by Staff Maj 'Abdallah Muhammad al-Mazahimi, the director of operations and training in the Ministry of Defense. They all attended the meeting since it had been determined that the council would discuss, besides the Military Service Bill, the policy of the government in the area of civil service as well as evident signs of the increasing cost of living and other "new business."

The Council's Letters

In less than 5 minutes, statements of regret were read; the council approved the minutes of its meeting on 22 April; and two letters from his excellency the minister of state for the affairs of the Council of Ministers were read.

The first letter pertained to a Council of Ministers' resolution on foreign corporations and domestic spending. The text of that letter follows:

"Please be advised that the Council of Ministers decided when it met on 31/3/1980 to charge the Ministry of Finance with settling the bids for projects and provisions on national companies and ascertaining that no sp spurious companies are participating [in those endeavors]. The Ministry of Finance is to lay down rules and regulations [for these matters] and it is to take the steps that are necessary to implement this decision."

The second letter pertained to the recommendation that was made by the National Council regarding the matter of federal projects and popular housing. The text of that letter follows:

"Please be advised that the council reviewed the recommendation when it met on 5/5/1980 and expressed its interest in the matter. It has charged the Ministry of Public Works and Housing with presenting a study of the new designs to the Council of Ministers so that a suitable design for a popular home may be selected."

At the same time the council turned over to the Legislative Committee a federal bill that would amend some provisions of Law No 1 for 1972 regarding the mandatory powers of the ministries and the jurisdictions of the ministers.

The Military Service Law

The discussion of the National Military Service Bill in the light of amendments that were introduced by the Committee on Domestic Affairs and Defense began immediately. Salih al-Shal, the secretary to the committee stood up and read the articles of the law and the amendments that were introduced by the committee. It became evident that although the law had 35 articles, the committee had introduced only four amendments to it.

The first article that was amended was Article 2 which had stipulated conscription for males between the ages of 16 and 35. The committee amended that to males between the ages of 18 and 35.

The discussion began with Muhammad ibn Badawah who asked if the law applied to the armed forces only or also to the police force. He also asked if it applied to males only or also to females.

Muhammad ibn Rashid: "It applies to males only; we did not think of females."

Faraj ibn Hammudah: "The government's bill set the age at 16. Our young men at this age are intellectually mature and are ready to assume responsibility. Why was the age changed from 16 to 18?"

'Abdallah Amin: "I think the article should stay as it was without amendment so that when the student leaves school at this age, he is [in a sense] adopted by the Ministry of Defense. In fact, I suggest that we reduce this age to 14 if possible."

Khalifah Muhammad: "Young men should not be eligible [for military service] before they are 18. If a student fails in school, he may volunteer in the armed forces whose institutions are open to everyone. Compulsory conscription, however, is a responsibility."

Khalifah Hamid: "The question now is this: why was the age changed from 16 to 18?"

Muhammad ibn Rashid: "Frankly, the age of 18, on the one hand, is the age that is used in most of our neighboring countries. On the other hand, our armed forces are now equipped with the most modern scientific weapons which must be understood through learning, awareness and knowledge."

There were discussions in which Salih al-Shal, 'Ali al-Marzuq, Ahmad al-Mazru'i and 'Abdallah Rashid participated. The majority almost came to an agreement that the age of 18 was a more suitable age, but an explosive question was suddenly placed on the floor.

Muhammad al-'Amiri: "It is my opinion that this law will open the door to students to leave school and join the armed forces. There are many places in government which need qualified citizens. What will these places do if we took our young people into the military and the other stages of education remain vacant?"

We Want an Army of Educated Men

Muhammad ibn Rashid: "Military service is a national and a pan-Arab duty. We prepared this bill after looking into all the laws and after considering our efforts and our own circumstances in the Emirates. This law does not mean that every individual will be compelled to join the military corps or that students will be encouraged to leave their studies. On the contrary, all the gulf countries are now turning to this law since it is unavoidable. It will benefit our citizens by giving them a strong incentive and a strong motive in civilian life. Military training gives young people the self-confidence that is necessary for them to become involved in the aspects of practical life. This law then is almost a voluntary law. We have taken all the circumstances into consideration. Young people will not continue to defend [their country] unless they desire to do so."

His excellency the minister of defense added, "There is in fact some danger that a student who gets used to military discipline and likes it will remain in the military. But he is in fact free to continue or discontinue his service after he completes it. As far as educated people are concerned--those who have reached the highest rung on the educational ladder--we do in fact need them because we want 'a strong, educated army in this country.'"

There was another round of discussion about whether the age [of eligibility] should be 16 or 18. Then the matter was put to a vote by a showing of hands and the article was kept as amended by the committee so that the age of conscription is from 18 to 35. This was approved by the majority.

The Sons of a Man Killed in Action

Articles 3, 4 and 5 were passed quickly. When it came to Article 6, Faraj Hammudah asked, "Why did the committee change the exemption for 'the sons of an officer or an enlisted man who was killed in action or who was more than 60 percent disabled during military operations' to the oldest two of the officer's or enlisted man's sons who are eligible for the draft, etc. to the end of that section?"

Salih al-Shal: "What was intended is that if a man who was killed in action or was disabled had 10 male children, would they all be exempted from the draft? It was the opinion of the committee that only the oldest two be exempted."

Faraj ibn Hammudah: "Why the oldest two? Maybe they are basically not suitable for supporting the family of the [officer] who was killed in action. Who would support the family if the rest were drafted?"

Al-Shaykh 'Abd-al-Jabbar: "The law as amended is fair. It stipulated that anyone who is supporting a family is to be exempted."

Muhammad al-'Amiri: "It is honorable to die in action. To honor the man who died in action it is enough to exempt two of the sons from the draft, even though they will be deprived of the honor of losing their lives in action."

The members approved the article as it was amended by the committee.

In discussing Article 7 the members asked that the term "the one and only son" be changed to that of "the only son" because the term, "one and only" was pretentious.

The council then moved to the following articles which were approved without discussion until they came to Article 17. It stipulated that "The civilian position of an enlisted man and all the salaries and promotions that derive therefrom are to be held for him while he is performing his national military service. This period is to be calculated with the period of his civilian service, and it is to be treated as double emergency duty when compensation or pension is computed."

The Law Almost Fell Apart

This article came close to being passed by a significant margin had it not been for al-Shaykh 'Abd-al-Jabbar Bashir who made a point about a flaw in the article. "The article held the enlisted man's position, but it did not hold his salary for him." He asked, "What will become of a family whose breadwinner is drafted and his salary drops to that of a soldier? Does the law assume that all those who are drafted will be students who do not have jobs or families?"

Muhammad ibn Rashid: "A person who is in the reserves receives his salary, but an enlisted man receives a soldier's salary from the army. Military service is everyone's duty, and everyone must perform this duty. All countries pay enlisted men nominal amounts of money. Sometimes it is two dinars or two and a half dinars. How can we come out with something different? If an enlisted man is working some place for a salary that is greater than that of a soldier, and if he were to join the military service at his same salary, what would be the position of the soldier who is training with him and is affiliated with the armed forces service?"

Jabr Sayf agreed with the minister's statements, and Faraj Hammudah asked if the committee had studied and investigated this subject. Salih al-Shal replied and conceded that the committee was negligent in investigating this point.

Muhammad al-'Amiri asked that the bill be returned to the committee for reconsideration.

Faraj ibn Hammudah proposed that the enlisted man's employer pay 30 or 50 percent of the salary of the enlisted worker.

Sultan Khalifah: "No company will pay the salary of a worker who has enlisted. Furthermore, it may not even appoint him in the first place so it would not pay him a salary when he enlists."

Nasir Lawtah denounced the material negotiations that preceded military service as a tax that was required of every citizen in this homeland.

Al-Shaykh 'Abd-al-Jabbar proposed that [the Ministry of] Social Affairs pay the salary difference to the family of the enlisted man. Then, as usual, he became involved in a heated discussion with Counselor Dr Sayyid Ibrahim.

The minister almost settled the matter when he declared, "Those who are employed may be affected by the draft. But I personally cannot approve now. The council is to amend this article and to send the amended text to the Council of Ministers where it would be discussed in a broader fashion. It is known that at the outset the law will actually be applied to some of the workers who have not yet reached 35 years of age. Afterwards, in the future no citizen will work anywhere until he performs his military duty."

Two proposals remained: that the state pay the difference in salary or that the article remain as it is and the period of service be considered a citizen's duty and the sacrifice he makes. There were discussions that went on for more than 2 hours; they ended with [an agreement] to amend the article so that "the government agency or the public organization where the enlisted man was employed was to continue paying his salary, and the Ministry of Defense would pay the salaries of those employed in the private sector." This [amendment] was made in accordance with a suggestion made by Counselor Dr Sayyid Ibrahim.

The remaining articles of the law (18 articles) were passed in less than 10 minutes, and the meeting was adjourned for half an hour.

When the meeting was reconvened, a large number of the members had left and the rest did not constitute a quorum. After a discussion that lasted 10 minutes, it was decided that the meeting be postponed till 10 June.

Text of Amended Bill

Abu Dhabi AL-ITTIHAD in Arabic 28 May 80 pp 3-4

[Article: "Text of the National Military Service Bill as Amended by the Federal National Council"]

[Text] The text of the federal bill which pertains to national military service as it was approved by the Federal National Council [FNC] yesterday follows. This is the text of the bill as amended by the Committee on Domestic Affairs and Defense and by the council.

Section One: Definitions

Article 1: In enforcing the provisions of this law the following words and expressions are to be construed in accordance with the definitions provided for each one unless the text indicates otherwise.

A. National military service is the mandatory period spent by those who are subject to this law in the armed forces either in active duty or in reserve service.

B. Active military duty is the period during which a citizen is drafted and his status changed from civilian to military. This period includes a military training period and the actual practice of military life in the units of the armed forces in accordance with that citizen's military specialization.

C. Reserve military service is the period during which an enlisted man would have left the armed forces after having fulfilled his active military duty when he would be ready to meet the request of the armed forces and join the army either for training or mobilization.

D. An enlisted man is a young man who enlists for national military service and works in the armed forces for the duration of the period determined by law.

E. The volunteer is the young man who volunteers for service in the armed forces and who chooses military life as his way of life, whether he is an officer or a solider.

F. Military schools are educational units affiliated with the armed forces where military studies are undertaken in accordance with "the general training policy. Graduates obtain military titles at those schools."

Section Two: General [Conditions]

Article 2: National military service is mandatory for all male citizens of the United Arab Emirates and for all males who acquire citizenship and who are between the ages of 18 and 35 and are suitable for military service.

Article 3: The duration of national military service for all enlisted men is to be 9 years of good service, not including periods of absence, absences without leave or prison sentences. This period begins on the date the enlisted man enlists in military service, and it includes two basic terms:

A. A term for active military service; this is to be determined as follows and in accordance with the individual's educational level.

1. For those who do not have educational qualifications, 18 months.

2. For those who have intermediate qualifications, 12 months.

3. For those who have higher scientific degrees, 9 months.

B. A term for reserve military service is to be determined as follows:

1. For those who do not have educational qualifications, 7.5 years.

2. For those who have intermediate educational qualifications, 8 years.

3. For those who have higher educational qualifications, 8 years and 3 months.

Article 4: The minister of defense is to issue organizational instructions that determine the method and the duration of military training, the system of calling up the reserves and the method of their distribution to the various branches of the armed forces in accordance with the needs of those branches.

Article 5: The following groups [of people] are to be exempted from mandatory national military service:

A. Those who are employed as state guards for the chairman and the members of the Supreme Council of the Federation. They are also to be exempted by government decree.

B. Those who volunteer to work as military men--officers or other ranks--in the armed forces or in the police, provided that they volunteer for not less than 3 years.

C. Students at military colleges, institutes and academies. In case for any reason they do not continue their course of study until they graduate, the period of time they spent in these colleges is to be counted in their term for national military service, provided that such a period is not less than 6 continuous months with no [interruptions] for sick leave or imprisonment. The remainder of the period is to be considered reserve military service in case the 9 years determined in Article 3 were not completed.

Article 6: The following groups [of people] are to be exempted peremptorily from national military service.

A. Anyone who does not meet the medical suitability requirements for military service as determined by resolution of the minister of defense made in accordance with the recommendation of the Department of Medical Services.

B. The oldest two eligible for the draft who are sons of an officer or an enlisted man who was killed in action or who has more than a 60 percent disability acquired during war operations.

C. The oldest brother or the one following him of an officer or an enlisted man who was killed in action or who has a 60 percent disability acquired in the course of military operations.

D. The eldest eligible for the draft among the sons of an officer or an enlisted man who died or was discharged from military service because of an illness, an injury or an infirmity acquired during or because of service.

E. Paragraphs B, C and D are to be applied to everyone concerning whom a federal law has been issued requiring that he be treated as a citizen who had lost his life in action.

Article 7: The following groups [of people] are to be exempted temporarily from national military service.

A. A father's or a mother's only son as long as he remains an only son.

B. The son who is the only provided for his father provided that the father is unable to earn a living because of a disability or an illness or because he is 60 years old.

C. The son who is the only provider for his mother provided that the mother is a widow or irrevocably divorced or that her husband is unable to earn a living because of a disability or a sickness or because he is 60 years of age.

D. The man who is the only provider for his brother, provided that the brother be unable to earn a living because of a disability or a disease or because he is not yet 18 years old or his draft had been deferred because he was studying or undergoing therapy.

E. The man who is the only provider for his sister provided that the sister is a widow, or irrevocably divorced or had never been married in the first place.

F. Those who have been sentenced to lengthy incarcerations and those who are detained pending investigation [are temporarily exempted from military service] for the duration of the term of their punishment.

G. Anyone who reaches the age of 35 during the period of a temporary exemption is peremptorily exempted.

H. An exemption is revoked when the reasons for it are no longer extant. Anyone who has no more reasons for exemption is to notify the branches of the Civilian Military Service Administration by registered letter within 60 days. He is [also] to present himself to the authorized agencies.

Article 8: National military service is to be deferred for the following groups:

A. School students until the age of 24.

B. Students in colleges, institutes of higher learning or similar [establishments] until the age of 31.

C. People who are studying in the country or abroad to obtain higher academic degrees--a masters degree or a doctorate--until the age of 34.

D. A brother who follows the one who enlisted or was drafted until [the term of] his enlistment or his draft is completed.

E. Those who were commissioned by one of the ministries because there was an urgent need for them at their places of work, provided that this be done by decree from the Council of Ministers and until the age of 34 in times of peace.

The draft may be deferred for other groups not mentioned in the previous articles by decree of the minister of defense. The maximum age stated in paragraphs A, B and C may be overlooked by no more than 2 years in the case of illness during the various stages of education, provided that this be documented by a certificate endorsed by the Ministry of Health. Those whose draft had been deferred are to present themselves voluntarily to a branch of the National Military Service Administration when the reasons for the deferment are no longer extant. They are to present themselves at the times determined by the Ministry of Defense or by the General Command of the Armed Forces so that their names can be registered or they can be drafted.

Article 9: Every young man who is subject to the provisions of this law is to present himself to the concerned agencies determined [by this law] within 60 days of reaching the legal age for the draft.

All authorized state agencies that are related to the subject of the draft are to notify the National Military Service Administration in the Ministry of Defense of those who reach the draft age every year.

Article 10: The minister of defense, in accordance with the state's public interest as far as the armed forces are concerned, is to declare the number of individuals who are required for the draft every year. He is to declare the number of those whose [military service] is to be deferred and those who will be exempted from the draft.

Article 11: The duration of active military service may be prolonged upon the recommendation of the minister of defense and the endorsement of the Council of Ministers because of war, mobilization or emergencies.

Section Three: Rights and Duties

Article 12: An enlisted man is to be granted the salary of a soldier as of the day he presents himself to the draft offices of the Ministry of Defense. This is in accordance with the financial regulations that are in effect in the armed forces. An enlisted man is eligible for the promotions and the periodic pay increases that derive therefrom.

Article 13: An enlisted man is entitled to all the rights granted to the members of the armed forces with regard to therapy and social service. He and the members of his family who are supported by him are to receive therapy paid for by the armed forces in military hospitals for the duration of his active military service and when he is on call during his military service in the reserves.

Article 14: A man who is called from the reserves [to active duty] is to be granted a salary at a rank that follows the rank he had reached when he left active duty, provided that that maximum salary be that of a sergeant. In addition, [he is to receive] an allowance in accordance with what is determined by the Council of Ministers on the basis of a recommendation from the minister of defense.

Article 15: A person who is called from the reserves is to continue receiving his salary from the governmental agency where he was employed if he was employed in one of the ministries, governmental organizations or agencies or public corporations. He is to receive the difference in salary and the reserve allowance from the armed forces.

Article 16: An enlisted man is to be granted 3,000 dirhams as a bonus when his term of active military service is completed, provided that his conduct [during the period of service] was not less than good.

Article 17: The civilian position of an enlisted man and all the salaries and promotions that derive therefrom are to be held for him while he is performing his national military service. Government agencies and public corporations are to continue disbursing the salaries of enlisted men they employ. Those who are employed in the private sector are to receive their salaries from the Ministry of Defense.

This period is to be considered part of an enlisted man's civilian service, and it is to be treated as double emergency duty when a bonus or a pension is being computed.

Article 18: In case an enlisted man is partially or totally disabled or loses his life during the period of his enlistment or when he is called up from the reserves, he becomes eligible for the Pensions and Retirement Compensation Law for Military Men No 8 for 1976 A.D., which is in effect in the armed forces. The 2 percent salary deduction is not to be made throughout this period.

Article 19: If circumstances permit, an enlisted man is entitled to all the vacations stipulated in the armed forces except the vacation for pilgrimage during his period of active military service. In case he cannot take annual leave because of work conditions, he is to receive a monetary allowance in accordance with instructions and orders regulating disbursement of such an allowance, which are in effect in the armed forces.

Article 20: An enlisted man is entitled to a 15 days vacation to mark the end of his national military service before he is placed in the reserves.

Article 21: An enlisted man is entitled to being promoted to the rank of an enlisted sergeant during his period of service in the armed forces. He is to be granted all the privileges of the new titles provided that the period between a promotion from one rank to another be not less than 6 months.

Article 22: An enlisted man may volunteer in the armed forces during or after his active military service.

Article 23: The minister of defense is to issue instructions, orders and rules regulating the process and the conditions of promotions; the authorities [who grant] promotions and also the method of changing [the classification] of an enlisted man to that of a volunteer.

Article 24: An enlisted man may enroll in evening schools to learn if the circumstances of military service permit and provided that this be done with the approval of his commander.

Section Four: Controls

Article 25: Every citizen who is 18 years old and not more than 35 years old and who meets the conditions for national military service but has not performed this service may not be appointed in any government agency unless he has special permission from the Ministry of Defense.

Article 26: Every citizen for whom national military service is mandatory is subject to military orders as of the date that citizen was to have joined the armed forces. He is to conform to the Law of Military Regulations.

Article 27: Anyone who fails to present himself to the armed forces 3 months from the date he was to have joined the armed forces is to be drafted for 6 additional months after serving his term of active national military service.

The penalty is to be reduced by half if the citizen joins the armed forces voluntarily within 6 months of the date of his failure to present himself. This term [of punishment] may be revoked if the citizen renders good service and if his commander so recommends.

Article 28: Anyone who fails to present himself to the armed forces 6 months after the date he was supposed to have joined the armed forces is to be drafted for one additional year. The penalty is to be reduced by half if the person voluntarily joins the armed forces within 1 year of his failure to do so [originally]. This period may be revoked if that citizen renders good service and if his commander so recommends.

Article 29: Anyone who fails to render national military service and passes the age of 35 is to be punished by imprisonment for no more than 2 years, and he is to pay a monetary fine of 10,000 dirhams.

The prison penalty may be revoked and the financial penalty may be doubled by the minister of defense if there is justification for doing so.

Article 30: Every person for whom national military service is mandatory who evades that service or tries to evade it by cheating or by hurting himself; and also every person who helps or tries to help another avoid military service or unrightly defer it; or anyone who turns another person against performing his national military service is to be punished by imprisonment for a term that is no more than 3 years, or he is to pay a monetary fine of 15,000 dirhams, or both.

Article 31: Anyone who commits the crimes mentioned in the previous article in a state of war is to be punished by imprisonment for no less than 10 years and no more than 15 years.

Section Five: General Provisions

Article 32: No one who is required to sign up for national military service may leave the country before performing this service, except in the following cases and with the endorsement of the Ministry of Defense or whomever the ministry empowers:

A. Those who have temporary exemptions as mentioned in Section Two, Article 7, provided that the permission to leave is issued annually and that it be tied to an administrative certificate from the authorized agencies that the reason for the temporary exemption continues to exist.

B. Those whose draft has been deferred as was mentioned in Section Two, Article 8 and until the age determined for that deferment, provided that the reason for travel is the pursuit of learning.

C. For therapeutic reasons provided that the decision to travel be made by a medical committee from the Ministry of Health and endorsed by a military medical committee.

Article 33: The minister of defense is to issue regulatory instructions to regulate the method according to which he will issue those permits mentioned in Article 32 and to regulate the agents that will issue these permits and endorse them.

Article 34: An administration is to be established in the Ministry of Defense to regulate and execute this law. It is to be called the National Military Service Administration. The minister of defense is to issue regulatory instructions and orders for this administration.

Article 35: The ministers, each within his jurisdiction, are to execute this law. This law is to be published in the Official Gazette; it goes into effect upon publication.

EFFORTS TO ACHIEVE FOOD SECURITY DETAILED

Abu Dhabi AL-WAHDAH in Arabic 27 May 80 p 5

[Article: "Efforts Towards Achievement of Food Security"]

[Text] The importance of food as a strategic weapon is increasing day by day, and food is becoming a weapon whose strategic importance is no less than that of any other weapon used in its areas of utilization. This importance stems from the growing demand for food and the increase in the world's population. Because of this growing importance of food, the state has spared no efforts in achieving food security for the citizen. This is because the state believes that food security for the citizen is of no less importance than his security and stability in any other location. Where do we stand [on this matter], now that we have all heard of operations threatening the use of food as a weapon whose danger would be no less than that of any other weapon?

This danger will increase in the future. We have all begun to hear about the threats the United States is making against other countries that do not go along with it [in helping it] achieve its colonialist goals.

To free ourselves from these threats which we are hearing now and which will inevitably be used against us one day either by the United States or by another country, state officials have been concerned with this matter in a manner that seeks the establishment of more cultivated areas and, accordingly, the production of more of our food needs. Besides, locally produced goods acquire a special significance since people are beginning to have bitter feelings when they see that everything they eat and use is imported. Interest in agriculture, therefore, would bring a person closer to the national soil and would increase his interest and his love for that land. A statement made by one of the citizens when he saw the farms of al-'Awhah which had been planted with wheat is sufficient [to illustrate this feeling]. The citizen said at the time, "This green is enough for us at this stage. In the future we must cultivate more of this land for the purpose of production."

Data and Statistics

In order to formulate a true picture of this interest in agriculture, we must make a quick review of the statistical data that were issued by the Department of Agriculture and Animal Production in al-'Ayn. These data show the magnitude of the expansion in agricultural land.

In the area of preparing and leveling farms, the number of farms that were established until 1979 exceeded 98; their area amounted to 23,089 donums. In 1970, 290 farms had been prepared, and their area was 11,299 donums. These farms are distributed among al-Qattarah, Seyh ibn 'Ammar, al-'Ayn, al-Wajan, Madisis, the afforestation division, al-'Awhah and others. It is worth noting here that 44 of these farms, whose area amounts to 1,419 donums, utilize a sprinkler irrigation method which is considered to be one of the most modern and the least costly methods of irrigation. It is [also] the least wasteful of water. In addition, returns yielded by the plants [as a result] of this method [are good].

Services for Farmers

The department offers farmers its numerous services. In the area of leveling, plowing and fertilizing the soil, the department's services have covered 50,000 donums. In addition, the department furnished seeds, fertilizers and seedlings in large quantities. The quantities of seeds that were distributed free of charge to farmers in 1979 amounted to 160,068 kilograms. In the area of preventive services and services for fighting plant diseases, the [total] area which received protective services from the department amounted to 14,764 donums; the [total] areas that were sprayed amounted to 118,805 donums; and the quantities of insecticides, pesticides and other materials used in 1979 amounted to approximately 38,394 kilograms.

Machine Maintenance

The department carried out all maintenance operations on drilling machines, digging machines and plowing and harvesting equipment. The department utilizes 289 agricultural machines [that represent] various kinds of agricultural machinery.

In the area of material aid whose objective is to encourage farmers to work on these farms, the department offered loans in 1979 that totaled 2,483,113 dirhams. [A total of] 1,344 farmers benefited from these loans. These funds were used to purchase agricultural machines and plows and to lay down irrigation systems.

The Green Cover

In the area of afforestation, horticulture and the cultivation of vegetables and fruits, the department furnished large numbers of these seedlings and plants in addition to seedlings of all kinds of vegetables in the area of al-'Ayn. The department cultivated 1,979 donums with different kinds of vegetables and fruits for testing purposes so that their cultivation can be expanded and distributed among the farms of al-Qattarah, Suwayhan and the rest of the farms.

Vegetable production was abundant and met a good percentage of local market consumption. Locally produced vegetables were distinguished from imported vegetables by a large difference in price and also by quality. In 1979 the total tomato crop exceeded 3,540,842 kilograms, and the cucumber crop amounted to 791,596 kilograms.

The department's activities were not confined to vegetables only; the department was clearly interested in fruit trees. Farms in al-'Ayn are now producing good quantities of lemons, dates and guavas.

The department has also been interested for a number of years in raising bees. There are now more than 250 beehives in al-'Ayn; last year they yielded 258,025 dirhams [in revenues].

Wheat is foremost among the plants receiving attention with regard to expanding its cultivation and production. This expansion began several years ago; and it was in al-'Awhah that this expansion began. The results that were achieved by the department showed that it was possible to obtain a good return of wheat per donum, compared with the returns in other places famous for the cultivation of wheat. During the 1979-1980 season the department began cultivating 3,760 donums; it is expected that wheat production from this land will be 800 tons.

This area, which is cultivated with wheat, [is located] in al-'Awhah region. The department will grow wheat in Umm Ghafah after soil test results have shown that growing wheat there was possible because the necessary materials for cultivating wheat were found in the soil in good quantities.

The department's activities are not confined to land and agriculture. The department does give much attention to animals and to the development of animal resources. There is a veterinary hospital in al-'Ayn whose services last year were delivered to 4,884 camels; 1,281 cows; and 30,261 sheep. In addition, it offered poultry services as well as other services.

Veterinary professionals treated 54,107 cases in al-'Ayn free of charge. There are six outpatient clinics affiliated with the department. These are scattered among Madisis, al-Khaznah and other locations. Besides treatment, the department offers financial assistance to the owners of these animals. The total aid that was offered by the department to the owners of these animals exceeded 11 million dirhams; these were distributed among 2,902 cattle owners.

STEADY, SLOW DEVELOPMENT IN RURAL COMMUNITY EXPECTED

Abu Dhabi AL-ITTIHAD in Arabic 26 May 80 p 3

[Article by Fu'ad Ayyub: "Gallantry of Bedouins in al-Taybah Valley: 10 Young Men From Village Support Their Families Along with Their Fathers To Provide Good Life for Family Members; Khamis Shares His Modest Salary With His Father To Help Him Raise His Six Brothers; Village Mosque Built by Citizen Living in Qatar and Furnished by Village Residents"]

[Text] There are many negative factors in the lives of Bedouins who have been living for many years in the village of al-Taybah inside al-Fahid Mountain. There are also many positive factors, which are primarily humanitarian, in that life. The Bedouins of al-Taybah--that village which is located on both sides of al-Taybah Valley with half of its 45 houses to the east and the other half to the west--are still dreaming about having electricity. They see the power lines that are stretched across the roads in the valley every day. They also have their own water problems: some days they have water; other days they don't. In addition, their palm trees are diseased and the (al-hambu) and (bean) crops are weak. In addition to these negative factors, there are the positive factors which are exclusive to the Bedouins. These are positive factors that were established by the nature of life in mountainous regions where cooperation and mutual responsibility are requirements dictated by the circumstances of that life. In that region people live as one family all of whose members love and care for each other. It is within this family that notions of manhood, gallantry, sacrifice and redemption flourish. It is in al-Taybah that we find a son who had denied himself the mere thought of marriage so he can stand by his father, his mother and his brothers and sisters to relieve them of some of the suffering that is caused by the inability of their material resources to meet their needs and realize their wishes. We also find a gallant man who saw people traveling scores of miles to perform the duty of group prayer, so he volunteered to build a mosque for them.

Before we begin with the negative factors that are considered the common denominator in most of the areas of the eastern region where there are concentrations of Bedouins, we [would like] to present an honorable picture of the positive factors [of Bedouin life]. This picture is exemplified in one of the young village residents whose relationship with his original community was not severed despite the fact that he had joined an urban society and obtained a reasonable position. This young man is Khamis Ahmad Muhammad Khamis. He is about 20 years old, and he is a civil servant in Dubai with the armed forces. Circumstances had helped him to enroll in the primary school in Masafi when he was a boy, but only 5 years later these circumstances had declined, and he was unable to complete his education. He took advantage of the first opportunity he had, and he joined the army.

Regarding his reason for joining the army and leaving school Khamis says, I had no choice in doing this. The stages of education are lengthy, and my father is becoming an old man. The orchard he has does not provide him with an income to speak of, but he has the responsibility of supporting me and supporting my three brothers and three sisters."

Between the Pipe Smoker and Local Tobacco

While Khamis was talking to me very calmly, his father, Ahmad Khamis was preoccupied with smoking his modest pipe and watching us intently. His looks were significant: he would sometimes look at his son, and other times his eyes would shine with pride and affection for him or for his present position. His son had become a government civil servant, and he was receiving a salary from the government that made him not need a government pension. I sensed that he wanted to join in the conversation and to say something. But before I listened to him, I asked him about the pipe he was smoking; it was a contraption that looked very much like a pipe. To describe it more accurately, it was a miniature pipe. I found out from him that that pipe was the pipe most Bedouins use because it was very economical and its tobacco was cultivated locally, in most cases between the trunks of the palm trees in some of the mountainous regions. One mann [two pounds] of this tobacco sold for 200 dirhams, and sometimes [one could buy it for as little as] 50 dirhams. One gram of this tobacco lasted for a long time, 15 or 20 [hours of smoking]."

After putting his pipe aside beside him Ahmad Khamis said, "Life was difficult: the palm trees that we cultivate became diseased, and the (al-hambu) and (al-lumi) trees no longer gave us the good fruits that we used to harvest in days gone by. Therefore, my son's position was important for him and for us too."

I Am Not a Hero

Let me go back to Khamis, the young son, to ask him, "What did you give your father and your family after you went to work?"

He says, "I have stood by their side ever since I took that job. At the beginning when my salary was small, I gave my father 200 dirhams every month. Then the sum increased to 500 dirhams. But now that I have a big pension of approximately 2,600 riyals, I give my father 1,000 dirhams a month. Along with his monthly pension, this sum meets his needs and the needs of my brothers and sisters for a month. I am therefore, quite satisfied. Every week I come here with my modest car to visit them and spend the weekend with them."

I told him, "Have you saved any money for marriage?" He replied, "This is a real problem, but I do not feel it, nor am I concerned with it now. Naturally, I did not save anything. I am only interested now in providing happiness to my brothers and my sisters and also to my mother who has had a hard time bringing us up and looking after our comfort."

When I shook Khamis' hand and expressed my admiration for what he was doing for his father, his mother and his brothers and sisters, he said, "Don't think of me as a hero who is making sacrifices for his family. I am not the only one who is doing this. There are 10 other young men in al-Taybah village who are working in the government and helping their families. Some of them live where they work and come to al-Rub' like me every week. Others live [illegible], and still others are married and are living in the modest dwellings of their parents, which you see here, so they can provide a comfortable life for their fathers and their mothers and toil for them."

Will There Be Electricity Before Ramadan?

I found another positive model in the village; its features were outlined carefully by the chief of al-Taybah region, the chief of al-'Abadlah, Muhammad 'Ali ibn Dawud al-'Abduli. It was that of a man who was not in the village. His name is Khamis ibn Ahmad al-'Abduli, and he is presently residing in the fraternal state of Qatar. The village, which has 45 homes and about 250 persons, did not have a mosque where people could pray; no one had been able to build that mosque. While he was on a visit to the valley, the man found out about this and offered to build the mosque that is here now, where people assemble to pray at all times. Chief Muhammad 'Ali says, "When the mosque became a reality in front of all of us, we collected contributions among ourselves, and we furnished it. We also purchased a microphone so that the muezzin [the man who calls the faithful to prayer] could be heard in every house in the area. We purchased the microphone after his highness the ruler of al-Fujayrah sent us a generator to light the mosque."

I found myself moved to inquire, "Is there electricity in the village, then?" And here the chief replied, "No. There is electricity in the mosque, but [the generator] cannot supply any other place with electricity. However, we hope to have electricity in our homes soon. The ministry has installed the cables and the poles along the hills of the valley and has told us that we will have electricity soon. We are asking the Ministry of Electricity and Water to provide us with electricity to light our homes before the month of Ramadan."

Among the negative factors [in the village] was the fact that water, which comes to the village by truck, does not come regularly. This truck has been transporting water non-stop for 6 years. Now, however, it does get idle: it works one day and is idle for days. What can people do when they do not get water?

'Ali ibn 'Abdallah ibn Husayn says, "The ministry denies that there is discomfort as a result of the fact that water is delivered one day and not the other. When the tanker that carries the water is idle, we are forced to take water from the wells that irrigate the plants and the palm trees. This naturally causes a problem, since we deprive the palm trees of the water when we take it from the well [for our own use]. This hurts the palm trees; but what are we to do?

Death Is Inescapable if a Car Is Not Found

There is another negative factor that pertains to medical treatment. There is not a single medical facility in the entire area. According to the Bedouins, it is easy to send children to school if there is no school in the valley because there are special cars that come to take them to school. But what would be the situation in case there are cases of emergency illnesses at night?

This matter is explained at length by the chief of al-'Abadlah. He says, "It very often happens that a woman would get sick, and especially with one of those emergency diseases. The illness [usually] gets worse at night when everything is dark and the valley is still. If the husband has a car, there is no problem, but if he doesn't, there is a major problem. It is known that most of us do not have cars. In this case the worried husband would run around the valley, knocking on the homes of the Bedouins who own cars and asking them for help. There have been many cases when a man was not able to save his wife because there was no car, and his wife [later] died in his arms. This is a real problem that we have always been facing. We had been hoping that the state would build a medical facility in our area."

'Abdallah Muhammad Sa'id adds, "We lack a medical facility and wells to irrigate our orchards. The old wells have dried up and are in need of repair. None of us can repair them, and we are still waiting for electricity. Most of the houses, as you can see, are built of palm leaves and (al-shinku). Very few of them have been built with brick. Don't think that [those who built their homes with brick] are wealthy; quite the contrary, all the people borrowed from the bank to improve their standard of living."

Despite all the problems that I heard about and despite the barren life which the Bedouins are living in al-Taybah, the village is one of the rare villages in the state where natural wells abound and where palm trees, mango trees, lemon trees and other vegetables are flourishing. If the ministries that deliver services were to focus their attention on this area to provide the Bedouins with everything they need, and if the Ministry of Agriculture and Fish Resources were to give this area its attention, al-Taybah Valley will become a source of benefits for its people. By nature the area is one of the most beautiful areas of the country. In fact, it would be a first class tourist area if it were utilized in the best fashion. But the Bedouins are not looking now for tourism, because their first hope, whose realization they are still awaiting, is the arrival of electricity. [They are also hoping] that the obvious lack of services they have been receiving will be amply met in all the principal cities of the state.

VILLAGES IN NORTHERN EMIRATES TO RECEIVE ELECTRICITY

Abu Dhabi AL-WAHDAH in Arabic 27 May 80 p 1

[Article: "All Villages in Northern Emirates To Receive Electricity"]

[Text] At the meeting which was chaired yesterday by His Highness al-Shaykh Rashid ibn Sa'id al-Maktum, the vice president and prime minister, the Council of Ministers approved a short-term plan for the Ministry of Electricity and Water. This plan is to be implemented in the next 2 years, 1981-1982, and its costs amount to 200 million dirhams.

The plan includes providing electricity to all the villages in the northern emirates and hooking up electricity and water services to all the remote areas in the country.

The plan also includes tying the power stations of Umm al-Qayawayn and Falaj al-Ma'la with an overhead line to strengthen the electricity of Falaj al-Ma'la and to supply neighboring areas with power services.

According to recommendations from High Highness al-Shaykh Zayid bin Sultan Al Nahayyan, the president of the emirates, the council approved the sum of 5 million dirhams for the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs to shore up women's handicrafts in the country.

Two million dirhams of this sum were earmarked for strengthening the centers for environmental industries and handicrafts, and 1.5 million dirhams were earmarked for strengthening women's associations. This sum represents an increase that amounts to 70 percent of current financial allocations for strengthening women's associations. The sum of 1.5 million dirhams has also been earmarked for bonuses [to be granted] to female workers in the field of environmental and popular industries who took part in the Handicrafts Fair that was recently wound up by his highness, the president.

The Council of Ministers reviewed a report from His Excellency Sa'id Ghubash, minister of planning. The report included the implementation of the projects of the 1979 Investment Program as well as the status of spending and implementation for first quarter projects in the 1980 Investment Program.

BRIEFS

LARGEST POWER PLANT CONTEMPLATED--It is estimated that the huge power plant, whose construction has been decided on for the area of Zabarah, 30 kilometers from Umm al-Nar Island in Abu Dhabi, the capital of the United Arab Emirates, will cost more than 25 billion dirhams or more than 7 billion dollars. The power plant is still an idea, but it will be implemented now that the Department of Electricity in Abu Dhabi has completed preparations for a comprehensive study of the future electricity and water needs of the country. The study was given to a number of international consulting firms who will look into the economic and technical aspects of the project which the state wants to complete before the end of 1990. The preliminary study of the project that has been made considers the establishment of a power generating plant and a water desalinization plant so that the country's needs of water and electricity may be provided; so that the northern emirates may be provided with the electricity they need; and the emirates who are members of the federation are hooked up to a standard electricity system. The date for beginning implementation of the project has not yet been determined, but the study that has been made bears in mind that construction and the operation of the first unit, which will operate at a capacity of 130 megawatts, is to occur in 1985 and that construction of all the other units is to be completed gradually before 1990. PALESTINIANS BEGIN BIG PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN IN EUROPE

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 24 Jun 80 p 18

/Article by 'Adnan Nasrawin: "Abu 'Ammar Has Started To Invade Europe from the South and Will Soon Reach the North"/

/Text/ AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM met with the Palestine Liberation Organization's representative in Brussels and the European Council, Mr Na'im al-Farra, during his recent visit to Paris.

Mr al-Farra said that the organization's Brussels office enjoys a quasi-diplomatic status, working as an embassador, although Belgium has not yet officially recognized the Palestine Liberation Organization as a sole representative of the Palestinian people.

To his statement he added that the Belgian position is characterized by positive and negative aspects at the same time. He said that Abu al-Lutf's recent talks in Brussels showed progress in the Belgian and European position regarding the Palestine Liberation Organization.

The director of the organization's office in Belgium pointed out that Abu 'Ammar's visit to Brussels has become a possibility for the near future. Herewith follows the text of the discussion:

/Question/ What is the status of the Palestine Liberation Organization in Brussels?

/Answer/ The Liberation Organization office in Brussels enjoys a quasi-diplomatic status. The Belgain government does not consider that it is diplomatic in nature because it has not yet recognized the Palestine Liberation Organization as a sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. The Belgian foreign minister's excuse for this is that when the Palestine Liberation Organization gives itself a legal framework then Brussels will recognize the organization, which means that Belgium is now asking us for the establishment of a Palestinian state in exile before officially recognizing the organization. In spite of all this, we have constant contacts with the Belgian Foreign Ministry on all official levels and deal with the Belgian Foreign Ministry like any Arab ambassador to Brussels. Relations between us and officials in the Foreign Ministry are positive, although we do not agree with them on all points related to the Palestinian cause and the developments of events in the Middle East region. Belgian diplomacy supports the Camp David agreements as a positive first step toward peace and we reject that totally.

However, from another standpoint, the positive points in the Belgian government's position are that it demands that Israel withdraw from all Arab territories occupied since 1967, including the Arab city of Jerusalem, and it recognizes the right of the Palestinian people to determine their destiny in total freedom. It states that the Palestinian people have the right to choose their representatives as they wish, but they implicitly recognize, and this was frankly stated during our brother Faruq al-Qaddumi's visit to Brussels recently, that the Palestine Liberation Organization currently is the channel through which the Palestinian people express their will to establish their independent state.

In another area, Belgium, and Europe as a whole, although condemning Israeli policy, in particular the policy of establishing settlements in occupied Arab territories, have not yet adopted practical measures to put pressure on Israel to desist from establishing new settlements or eliminate the old ones existing on occupied Arab territories.

The Belgian Foreign Minister and His Talks with Abu al-Lutf

/Question/ What is the effect of the visit Mr al-Qaddumi made recently to Brussels on Palestinian-Belgian relations?

/Answer/ Abu al-Lutf's visit in itself was very important, since it was the first official visit to be made by the chief of the Political Department of the Palestine Liberation Organization to Brussels, by invitation of the Belgian Foreign Ministry, with the agreement of the Belgian government and under the sponsorship of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The presence of Abu al-Lutf on this type of official visit to Brussels means a great deal. The Belgian foreign minister, commenting on this visit, said "I do not talk with or officially invite people I do not recognize." Therefore al-Qaddumi's presence in Brussels means Belgium's implicit recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The importance of this visit by Abu al-Lutf also lies in the high-level official meetings which he held with senior Belgian officials. He met officially with the foreign minister and met the minister of foreign trade and the minister of cooperation for economic development. He met each one of them in his ministry, in his official office, and in addition the foreign minister of Belgium held a luncheon in his honor at the headquarters of the ministry itself to which he invited the Arab ambassadors and a large number of Belgian official personalities. Abu al-Lutf also met with a number of parliamentarians and a number of Belgian political personalities from various political party tendencies in the Belgian parliament building. Each of these contacts is important in itself because it establishes the legitimacy of the representation of the Palestine Liberation Organization in an official form of the Palestinian people, and Belgium's official recognition of that. The Belgian press devoted major importance to Abu al-Lutf's visit, dedicating extensive spaces to it in its papers in a positive manner affecting Belgian public opinion and giving the proper picture of the Palestinian official who is talking from a position of responsibility and concern for the interests of the Palestinian people.

/Question/ How did Belgian official circles receive the recent statements by the French president on the principles of settlement in the Middle East?

/Answer/ These statements by President D'Estaing met with strong support in Belgian circles, although these circles received the French President's declaration with a kind of astonishment; Belgian officials did not understand why this kind of commotion was stirred up over President D'Estaing's statements and positions, which were not new as the foreign minister of Belgium had previously embraced them intensely and stated them, both in the context of the United Nations and in Belgium, even during the meetings of the nine European countries belonging to the European Common Market. However, in light of the sensitive position France occupies in European milieux, and also because the French president spoke for the first time during his visit to Jordan about the need for the Palestine Liberation Organization to participate in any discussions on the Middle East, they took these statements into consideration. Belgian officials told me that they were happy with D'Estaing's statements because they considered that the major European countries had started to proceed along the positive political path which the smaller European countries like Belgium and Ireland had been traveling on months before that. I can now say that European efforts are being made to conduct an important European diplomatic initiative whose features will become prominent after 26 May, the date of the conclusion of what are called the autonomy talks, which the European countries expect to fail in achieving the national aspirations of the Palestinian people. This European initiative will take place in order to avoid the political vacuum which will occur when it is apparent to everyone that the peace efforts the United States of America is making now in the Middle East fail, especially since America is now absorbed in the presidential election campaign and other crises which concern it more than the Middle East, especially the Iranian crisis. Therein lies the role of the European countries and the importance of their initiative. We hope that this European initiative will truly be positive and that it will not be in the Camp David framework or in the framework of American policy, which has proved that it is hostile to the rights of the Palestinian people and Arab issues in general.

Means of Contacting World Public Opinion

/Question/ How do you perform your task as a Palestine Liberation Organization official in contact with European organizations and bodies in Strasbourg?

/Answer/ Our opinion in the Palestine Liberation Organization is that European parliamentary bodies are ignorant of the details of the Palestinian cause and are ignorant of the true official Palestinian position for numerous reasons. In spite of all that, these circles, whether they are the Parliamentary Society in the European council or the European parliament, take decisions on the Middle East which ignore or are unmindful, in whole or in part, of Palestinian rights and Arab issues. Therefore, we have considered it necessary to work within these parliamentary circles because the resolutions adopted in these circles are relied on in the national parliaments of each European country as a prelude to get these national parliaments to adopt hostile positions on the Palestinian people. Therefore, the decision in the Liberation Organization was that we should concentrate intensively on the European Parliament and the Council of Europe and try to make their members understand the reality of the justice of our Palestinian cause and Arab causes. I can state now, through my contacts with European parliamentarians, that they have come to understand the truth of the Palestinian cause and parliamentary bodies have started progressing toward a demand for Israeli withdrawal from the occupied Arab territories and recognition of the rights of the Palestinian people and the Liberation Organization, especially in circles of the European Parliamentary Society, which recently heard the point of view of the Syrian foreign minister and the foreign minister of Jordan. In addition, the society's political committee met with representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organization, questioned them directly and allowed them to speak plainly to the European committee on the Palestinian situation. This all had an effect on the European position in general and the adoption of more positive, progressive positions regarding the rights of the Palestinian people than the previous positions, which were adopted out of ignorance or fanaticism on behalf of Israel.

The Importance of the European-Palestinian Parliamentary Meeting

/Question/ What is the importance of the European-Palestinian parliamentary meeting held lately in Strasbourg?

/Answer/ In Europe, there is something called the European Parliamentary Society for Cooperation with the Arab World, which in reality has no relationship to the European Parliament as a European parliament but rather consists of parliamentarians from the national parliaments of the European countries which meet in the society. This society began more than 6 years ago, when at the beginning it had five members; now their numbers exceed 350 from the various European countries. One of this society's activities has been to meet with a delegation from the Palestine National Congress, which it considers the Palestinian parliament, to talk with it about the issues which have been set forth and to attain understanding from it on the real positions of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Palestinian people. We held two meetings over 2 full days and they were dominated by serious discussion on these issues. We managed to answer many questions which are being presented to European parliamentarians in their countries on the Palestinian cause and its facts which in the past they were incapable of answering.

The importance of the issue is that the meetings were held in the headquarters of the European Parliament in Strasbourg, and this means a sort of Palestinian raid on the headquarters of the European Parliament. On this occasion the European Parliament also played a role and we seized the occasion to meet with some political groups in the European Parliament. The Palestinian delegation met officially with the socialist group of the European Parliament which represents the nine member countries of the European Economic Community in the European Parliament headquarters. We also met with the Communist group of the European Parliament and asked the Christian and liberal group, who declined to meet officially though we met with them in an unofficial manner in the headquarters of the European Parliament, conveying to them the Palestine Liberation Organization position while they presented us with their groups' positions. Following the session of the European Parliament, there is the session of the European Council, and I will be staying in Strasbourg to talk with the council's meetings on the Middle East issue and Europe's position on it.

/Question/ Do you believe that Mr Yasir 'Arafit will make an official visit to Belgium soon?

/Answer/ The fact is that our brother Abu 'Ammar has started the invasion of Europe, starting from the south. The countries proposed for the visit are France and Italy. It is probable that the atmosphere of elections in France will delay our brother Abu 'Ammar's visit to Paris but, as far as the other small European countries go, there is no doubt that they will wait; they do not want to be the first and do not want to be the last to invite Abu'Ammar, but I do not see anything, in the medium term at least, to prevent an official invitation being sent to our brother Abu 'Ammar to visit Belgium officially. I can state bluntly that we have not yet studied this matter seriously, in view of the Belgian situation, /but will/ when the political circumstances are ready inside Belgium. Unfortunately this country has been going through political crises for a number of months. Currently the government has resigned and we do not know if another new government will be formed soon or if Belgium will be compelled to have new elections.

KUWAITI PAPER COMMENTS ON SYRIAN-LIBYAN MERGER

LD111136 Kuwait KUNA in English 1006 GMT 11 Sep 80

[From the press review; quotation marks as received]

[Text] Kuwait, 11 Sep (KUNA)--AR-RA'Y AL-'AMM on Arab Unity

"The Arab citizen fully realizes that the horrible suppression to which he has been subjected stems from the absence of unity. Those who have planned to spread their hegemony over the Arab nation decided first to apply the policy of divide and rule. The imperialist knives began to tear the Arab body to pieces to ensure full control over its dignity and wealth. Then came the decision to create Israel in Palestine.

The most disastrous result was the creation of artificial entities in the Arab world which in the long run have turned into distant, repulsive and belligerent states.

For these reasons attempts at Arab unity were defeated repeatedly to the extent that this nation began to doubt its capabilities.

"Amidst this state of disappointment, it was obvious that salvation could only come through unity because this is the only thing we lack.

"Following yesterday's merger between Syria and Libya we became hopeful that the Arabs have at last found the curative medicine for the deadly illness.

This merger is a good omen for a bright future. The significance of this unity could be realised from the pronounced feeling of danger that has seeped through Israel and the Camp David parties. This feeling affirms that those enemies plan to keep the Arab nation torn apart so this (?nation) continues to be weak and defeated forever.

Unity is the only hope which makes the liberation of Arab lands possible. It is also the only means for the realization of national aims."

BRIEFS

IRAQI, JORDANIAN AVIATION MEETING--Baghdad, 3 Sep (INA)--Sa'dun Ghaydan, member of the Iraqi Revolution Command Council and minister of transport and communications, met here today with Ghazi Rakan, director general of the Jordanian Civil Aviation Department, and members of his delegation. The two sides reviewed various aspects of transport and communications cooperation between the two countries and the adequate means to strengthen this cooperation in implementation of the bilateral decision to consider air and land transport between the two countries as domestic transport. Husayn Hayawi Khammash, president of the Iraqi Civil Aviation Organization, met with his Jordanian counterpart Ghazi Rakan. Their discussion dealt with the possibility of increasing airflights between the two countries, inaugurating a direct air route from the port of Aqaba in Jordan to Baghdad and Basra in Iraq and coordinating the exchange of expertise between the civil aviation departments in the two countries. IRAQI PARTY CRITICIZES SYRIA--Baghdad, 5 Sep (INA)--Michel 'Aflaq, secretary general of the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party, has said that struggler Salah al-Din al-Bitar's martyrdom marks the beginning of a new stage in history for the Syrian people's struggle and for the stand taken by the international and Arab public on the Syrian issue and the Syrian people's ordeal. In a speech delivered here last night during the commemorative ceremony marking the 40th day after the death of martyr al-Bitar, Michel 'Aflaq said: Al-Bitar's martyrdom raises the issue of Syria's ordeal and the Syrian people's tragedy. It demonstrates that the Syrian regime is prepared to resort to anything to preserve its seats of power and to safeguard its plunder. The Ba'th Party secretary general added: We will not leave the proud Syrian people to stand alone in confronting this rancorous anit-Arab regime. We pledge to the Syrian people that we will make Syria's liberation the beginning of an escalating struggle of the masses that rectifies the state of affairs in the Arab countries, crushes al-Sadat's treason and returns Egypt to the arena of the pan-Arab struggle. [Excerpts] [JN050853 Baghdad INA in Arabic 0735 GMT 5 Sep 80]

EGYPTIANS DIE IN IRAQ--Cairo, 6 Sep (MENA)--The Egyptian authorities at Cairo International Airport have managed to unveil an ugly tragedy whose victims were 137 Egyptian peasants and workers who were working in Iraq. AKHBAR AL-YAWM reports today that the Egyptian authorities unveiled this tragedy when they were surprised one day by the arrival of 15 coffins containing the bodies of 15 Egyptians from Iraq. The paper says that the Egyptian authorities were suspicious of the cause of death of these peasants and workers because the death certificates sent with the coffins say that they died of an epidemic disease when there is no epidemic disease--cholera, for example--in Iraq. Although the Iraqi authorities claimed that the bodies were embalmed, a stench which emanated from the coffins was an indication that this was not true. The paper says that there must be a grave secret behind this ugly tragedy or that our sons in Iraq are being subjected to an ugly massacre, as can be conjectured from statements by some Egyptians who have returned from Iraq. AKHBAR AL-YAWM demands a quick investigation of the secrets associated with these bodies, which are arriving from Iraq inside coffins sealed with red wax, together with the death certificates which conceal the real cause of death. UAE, PDRY FINANCIAL AGREEMENT--Abu Dhabi, 11 Sep (QNA)--It was stated here that the UAE and PDRY have signed an agreement on financing the Aden electricity plant and (Nashtun) fishing port projects. The agreement stipulates that the UAE contribute $30 million to finance the Aden electricity plant project while Algeria will finance the rest of the project. The Abu Dhabi fund for Arab economic development will contribute 60 million dirhams, estimated at $16 million, to the project, the total cost of which amounts to 112 million dirhams. The paper AL-KHALIJ published today says that Shaykh Surur Ibn Muhammad, head of the UAE president's office, signed the agreement for the UAE yesterday while PDRY installations minister Abu Bakr Haydar al-'Attas signed it for the PDRY. Shaykh Surur Ibn Muhammad met with the PDRY minister yesterday but nothing was announced on the discussion held during the meeting. [Text] [JN111156 Doha QNA in Arabic 1050 GMT 11 Sep 80]

AFGHANISTAN INVASION A SIGN OF SOVIET WEAKNESS NOT STRENGTH

Paris POLITIQUE INTERNATIONALE in French Summer 80 pp 113-114, 118-119, 121-122

/Article by Emmanuel Todd: "The USSR in Afghanistan: The Final Collapse?". The author is a Ph. D. in history from Cambridge University. His other works include "La Chute Finale, Essai sur la decomposition de la sphere sovietique" /The Final Collapse: Essay on the Disintegration of the Soviet Sphere/, Robert Laffont, 1976, and "Le fou et le proletaire" /The Madman and the Proletarian/, Robert Laffont, 1979/

/Excerpt/ Since the entry of Soviet troops into Afghanistan early in January 1980, the West again believes in the possibility of a worldwide triumph of communism in its Russian and Soviet version. More and more imposing is the image of an immensely powerful USSR, ruthlessly aggressive, and ready to strike, invade, and control the world around it at the least sign of weakness or irresolution by the "imperialist camp." Through Cuban intermediaries, the Soviet Union seems determined to invest Africa, and through the intervention of the Vietnamese to master southeast Asia. Its fleets of warships, prodigiously developed since 1970, henceforth cruise in the Mediterranean, the Persian Gulf, and the Indian Ocean, asserting the presence--in those historically sensitive zones and traditional sites of great power confrontation--of a system which still aspires, as it has since 1917, to world domination. Concurrently with that "conventional" military and political expansion, the USSR between 1970 and 1980 has caught up with the United States in the domain of strategic--that is, nuclear--arms.

It is in this context of growing power that the Soviet Union, strong in its 22 million square km and 260 million people, is intervening in Afghanistan, thereby adding 20 million people and 650,000 square km to its empire, which already included 110 million east Europeans and Mongols spread over 2.5 million square km. How can we fail to interpret the invasion of that country, which has been neutral since the 1907 agreement between Russia and England, as an upsetting of the world power balance and a stage in the Red Army's march to the Persian Gulf and Indian Ocean? A glance at the globe clearly reveals the central position of Afghanistan at the junction of the Soviet, Moslem, Chinese, and Indian worlds. Specialists in geopolitics at once recognize in this vast stretch of desert and mountains an essential and alarming center of future expansion.

There is certainly some truth in that interpretation of Soviet expansionism. Here I wish simply to show that it can be countered by another equally credible but completely opposite interpretation, which sees in the operation against Afghanistan the effect of a generalized crisis--economic, demographic, and ideological--in the Soviet system. From this viewpoint, the entry of the Red Army into Kabul would not be an expression of strength, but a symptom of impotence.

Islam as a Demographic System

It is only from within the Soviet sphere that the population growth of the USSR's Moslem republics appears strange; on the global scale it is strikingly commonplace. Everywhere, from Morocco to Pakistan, Islam is remarkable for the extreme rapidity of its demographic expansion, even for the Third World. The growth rate for Uzbekistan approaches those for Algeria or Syria, and is especially close to that for Afghanistan. Much is said today about the cultural affinity between the peoples of Soviet central Asia and those of Afghanistan (approximately 15 percent of which is composed of Uzbeks, Turkmen, and Kirghiz, with a majority of Pushtuns). It is most often emphasized that the Russian revolution brought about a cultural divergence between the two zones, the Moslems of Soviet Asia discovering the delights of progress, and those of Afghanistan stagnating in backwardness.

The former are said today to be 100 percent literate, the latter 80 percent illiterate. An unlikely argument: the coincidence of demographic behavior on both sides of the Soviet border underscores the superficial nature of that so-called divergence. An examination of the respective growth of Afghanistan and Uzbekistan, for example, is rather revealing in this regard. Uzbekistan: 8 million inhabitants in 1959, 15 million in 1979; Afghanistan: 9 million in 1956; 19 million in 1976.

The American statistical annual [Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1978, p 902], in its demographic projections, predicted 36 million Afghans by 2000. An almost empty territory and a diplomatic fiction in 1907, Afghanistan will soon compare in size with such European nations as Spain or Poland. The Soviets' panic is understandable in light of the fact that this new nation has several counterparts within the territory of the USSR.

These demographic and national phenomena primarily concern the USSR, but they are in fact of more general import. It is difficult not to link the present Islamic effervescence to a phenomenon of massive augmentation and densification in a civilization hitherto very thinly spread: in 1940 the Arab world numbered 82 million people; in 1976, it had 192 million--an increase of 134 percent in 35 years.

The French are in a particularly good position to understand the demographic problem faced by the Soviet leaders. They had in Algeria an altogether similar experience.

When the troops of Charles X occupied Algiers on the eve of the revolution of 1830 north Africa, in terms of contemporary European norms, was barely populated. It comprised a few ports, which were pirates' nests, and a few nomadic or semi-nomadic groups inland. In 1876 Algeria still had but 1.3 million people. In 1956, at the start of the war for independence, it already had 11 million. In 1978 it reached 18 million. A nation was literally born under French occupation, just as one or more Moslem nations are being born in central Asia under Russian occupation.

The invasion of Afghanistan can thus be considered as the last episode of European colonialism: incapable of facing up to the Moslem problem within its borders, the USSR has chosen adventure. It has yielded to a sensation of giddiness. It had to settle the problem of the cultural irreductibility of 40 million Moslems. By its invasion of Afghanistan, the Red Army has just raised that total to 60 million, of whom 20 million are in a state of insurrection.

The global nature of the Moslem problem is perfectly perceived by the Afghan resisters. In the words of one of their commanders in the field, "To reach Kabul is not too hard; the whole country is with us. But next, we will take Samarkand and Bukhara, where our Moslem brothers are. Then, we will go as far as Tashkent, and some day we will reach Moscow." This desire to dismember the USSR recurs as a leitmotiv in the testimony of journalists on the scene. But though aware of the general character of the Moslem question, this resister nevertheless reverses certain aspects of the problem: it is hardly likely that the Afghans can, with their forces alone, thrust the Russians out of Kabul. The Soviet regime cannot consent to a withdrawal, which would be humiliating and apt to arouse by repercussion the latent nationalism of Moslems in the USSR. The Afghans' only chance, faced as they are with an invader seemingly resolved to wage savage warfare, in fact lies in a crisis which would shake the republics of Soviet central Asia, in the taking of action by the Uzbeks, Kazakhs, and Turkmen of the Soviet Union. Thus there is in the present situation an immediate phenomenon of progression towards extremes, for neither of the two adversaries can accept anything but the total destruction of the other. One can well see in this context the absolutely ridiculous nature of European proposals for neutralization of Afghanistan. The implementation of such a project would in fact constitute a direct intervention by the West in Soviet internal affairs.

A Deadlock War

After several months of operations in Afghanistan the results obtained by the Red Army in the field are slight: control of the capital and a few bases and lines of communication. From the start, losses were heavy: 500 to 600 killed in a month and a half of combat, according to American estimates. This figure, if it remained constant, would correspond to between 4,000 and 4,800 killed yearly, representing a level of engagement equivalent to that of the Americans in Vietnam in 1966 [Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1978, p 380]. Ideological control of Afghanistan by the Russians is rapidly declining to nonexistence; disintegration of the Afghan regular army is proceeding at a quickened pace.

Whatever their determination and brutality, the 115,000 men committed by the USSR (85,000 in Afghanistan proper and 30,000 stationed on the Soviet side of the border, but who go back and forth and serve as logistical support) will not go much farther toward control of the country. To win this war, even temporarily, the Soviets indeed would have at least to triple their forces in the field, that is, raise them to 300,000 men.

Because Afghanistan belongs to the Islamic community, the Soviet Union cannot apply to it the strategy of genocide pursued by the Vietnamese in Cambodia. It cannot physically eliminate the totality of the Afghan population, a procedure whose effect would be deplorable not only in the free Moslem world, but also in Soviet central Asia. Since Cambodia is more isolated culturally, the Vietnamese can permit themselves a final solution of the guerilla (already begun by the Khmer Rouge regime) by the organization and maintenance of a famine resulting in liquidation of the Khmer nation. In central Asia, on the other hand, the mathematics of demography suggest a constantly worsening situation for the Russians, with the Afghan population growing each year by a half million, and that of the Moslem world within the Soviet borders by 1.2 million.

Thus we are not witnessing the next stage in the progression of world communism, but rather the initial colonial difficulties of Russia. There is little likelihood that the conquest of Afghanistan will eventuate in a new advance toward the Persian Gulf. Supposing that the Soviet Union proves able to break Afghan resistance with 300,000 men--a very optimistic assumption--it would logically need 500,000 to master Iran and 1.5 million to control Pakistan.

Such a mobilization by the Soviet Union is inconceivable in view of its economic situation. In March 1980, Western intelligence services received reports indicating that food requisitions made necessary by the holding of the Olympics were starving large areas of Russia near Moscow! The Soviet Union is certainly capable of razing, by thermonuclear means, all the nations of the Western and Moslem world. It is perhaps capable of winning a quick conventional war in Europe. But it is very probably incapable of taking another step toward its conquest of the Islamic world. Occupation and guerilla war have their cost; the USSR, which has reached the limit of its economic strength, cannot pay it.

Westerners, as usual, are enormously overestimating the Soviet potential. They do not want to see that the USSR has less and less control, economically and culturally, over the popular democracies, where divers experiments are underway which are totally opposed to the spirit of Marxism-Leninism: political liberalism with a totalitarian facade in Poland, economic liberalism with a Marxist facade in Hungary. In Cuba, rapid disintegration of the economy and political regime will soon compel direct management by the Kremlin, already begun by the presence of a Soviet army brigade, no doubt charged with cowing the local population.

The West is no longer confronted by the monolithic bloc of the 50's, which then reached from Berlin to Peking. It henceforth confronts an exhausted Russia which is further exhausting itself to keep its place in the world, and especially in its empire, an ever more heterogeneous and gelatinous mass in which every human group--Polish, Hungarian, German, Uzbek, Turkoman--is in process of renationalization.

Russia, the universal hope of mankind from 1917 to 1960, is on the way to becoming an object of hate for all the world's peoples. Henceforth arrayed against it is not only the Western camp, but also China and, potentially, the whole Moslem world. This objective alliance is almost too vast. In consequence, is it indeed reasonable to imagine that Russia, a nation of 196 million souls, is about to take control of a planet numbering 4 billion of them?

ANTHONY HYMAN REPORTS LACK OF UNITY AMONG OPPOSITION

Karachi MORNING NEWS in English 1 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] The Russians are the only strong force in Afghan politics. We should learn from them at least the principle of unity," comments an embittered exile in Peshawar, the Pakistani town which provides a base for many of the Afghan opposition parties. Certainly, although the Government of Babrak Karmal looks dilapidated, and is unable to prevent members of the Afghan Communist Party's two factions--Khalq and Parcham--from gunning one another down in Kabul, the Opposition has not seemed able to do any better. In the past month private warfare between five opposition parties has resulted in 12 dead and 30 wounded in one province alone, Ningrahar, where guerrillas have struggled for more than a year to gain control of the provincial capital, Jalabad Afghan nationalists unattached to the main opposition parties have come to believe that the leaders are less concerned with beating the Russians than with ensuring their own future as politicians-in-exile.

The fortunes of the resistance groups could revive if large arms deliveries, believed to have been made recently from Egypt and friendly Muslim countries in the Gulf, are properly distributed around the rival parties and are also, for the first time, given to poorly-armed regional and tribal groupings. The arms consignments apparently include many anti-tank guns, which are urgently needed to lessen the immense disparity in military equipment between guerrilas and Soviet troops.

About a million refugees are now encamped just inside Pakistan and Iran and, in spite of international assistance, their presence is a great strain to the host countries. Equally serious, but more neglected, is the recent growth in the number of internal refugees. Hundreds of thousands of uprooted villagers have found shelter in the towns, which are relative havens of security from bombing raids and from hunger. This development is particularly evident in Kabul--the only large city in the country--where the population has risen from 700,000 in 1979 to an estimated one and a half million now. The Hazara parts of Kabul are bursting at the seams with refugees from Hazarat villages to the west of the city, while repeated bombings of dissident regions such as Logar and Wardak have produced a stream of Pukhtoon tribesmen fleeing their ruined villages.

Influx

Although the authorities in Kabul are trying to stop this influx--they have hastily erected roadblocks around the capital--the city still grows bigger by the day, as if by relentless force of nature. Only traditional Afghan customs of family hospitality keep many of the internal refugees with food and a roof over their heads. The refugees have no hope of employment in the city.

The scale of this migration had led to a collapse of the rural economy. Villagers and herdsmen have ceased to produce food not only for themselves but also for Kabul, where there are now only irregular arrivals of lories carrying vegetables or fruits, which sell out immediately The mass salughter of cattle in the Northern provinces has caused a desperate shortage of milk and meat.

The shortfall in grain production, like last year's will have to be made up largely by the Soviet Union. Wheat is the national staple food, and in the towns supplies have been maintained and prices have been held to 3 Afghanis (about 2p) for each standard flat loaf of bread (nan). No Afghan administration would dare risk bread riots in the capital, but only Kabul and the towns, where the Soviet-backed administration has effective control, can expect imports of wheat or other essential foodstuffs. Food shortages, and near-famine in poverty-stricken Jazarajat, are of great value to heel rural communities which are supporting the resistance.

Because of this policy of starving them out and because of general shortages caused by muddled land reforms, the coming winter will be a hard one for the guerilla groups high in the mountains. But the resistance can take some heart from the decline in the morale of the Afghan Army and Air Force. Afghan pilots have been withdrawn from bombing raids, and eighty pilots were sent to the Soviet Union in June on an oddly-timed "three year training scheme", after their loyalty had become suspect. The love for the Russians felt by the dwindling Afghan Army must also be in serious doubt after reports that an armoured division defected en mass in the crucial southern zone near Ghazni.

Soviet troops in Kabul are exhibiting a slight decline in military discipline, natural enough in the superficially rich atmosphere of Kabul. Exotic imported articles are stacked high in the city's shop windows and, lacking cash with which to buy them, many Soviet soldiers are engaging in barter. The going rate for one packet of American or English cigarettes in Kabul is two bullets (which is less than half the price in the provinces). Not only bullets but also items of uniform, wrenches, screwdrivers and tools of all kinds from Soviet vehicles, together with petrol from armoured cars, are finding their way into the Kabul bazaars. Soviet soldiers are interested in jeans, cigarettes and other Western imports as well as in one of Afghanistan's own products--drugs, Hashish and opium are freely available (as always) in Kabul, and trade is brisk.

Pilfering

The city's grocery business is less successful, as many food shops are suffering from pilfering during the curfew hours after 11 p. m. Although they are, in theory, protected from burglary by the presence of Soviet and Afghan patrols through the city, grocery stores are suffering the attentions of Soviet soldiers with a voracious sweet tooth: how else can one explain the fact that packets of biscuits and chocolate are continually removed while money lying in the shops is left untouched? At check-points and roadblocks across the northern trunk road which eventually joins the Soviet border across the Oxus, similar acts of sweet tooth robbery frequently occur. Trucks laden with luscious raisins and other Afghan fruits are stopped for inspection by Soviet soldiers, who take a crateful for their own consumption before allowing the lorries to continue their journey.

FRENCH AUTHOR REASSESSES STATUS OF ALGERIA

Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Aug 80 pp 1, 4

[Article by Andre Mandouze, professor at the University of Paris IV - Sorbonne: "Between Past and Present -- The Algerian Challenge"]

[Text] Professor at the University of Paris IV - Sorbonne and author of "The Algerian Revolution," Andre Mandouze presents his account of Algeria today, following a 3 week visit.

It would be foolish for anyone to try to characterize in a simplistic way this Algeria which on 15 July, on the evening of the first day of Ramadan, was informed of the list of 26 ministers and 6 secretaries of state decided upon by President Chadli Bendjedid.* Indeed, anyone who would note its hopes and its disappointment without any qualifications would prove by this very act that, substituting the sharpness of theories for the ambiguity of reality, he is giving in to the demons of a type of analysis which is more formal than Cartesian.

In any case, 3 weeks in the beginning of the summer of 1980, which I spent meeting a large number of political personalities and senior civil servants as well as old friends and Algerians of all kinds, have -- on the occasion of this reunion -- safeguarded me against such hasty conclusions which, in spite of being outrageously favorable, are ultimately more prejudicial to the object of sympathy than criticisms dictated by friendship.

For example, to obscure the seriousness of the problem of a galloping birth-rate which exists in this country would prove that one has not even deigned to risk setting foot in the streets of the big cities or that one has not paid the slightest attention to the average age of the people one has met during random walks. But it would also be a sign that one does not credit the political officials with the intelligence and courage necessary to try to bring this phenomenon under control as soon as possible. Likewise, to stress only the all too evident lazyness or corruption of certain bureaucrats or of certain racketeers would be to forget the example provided by or the part played in these fraudulent operations by the western counterparts of these domestic saboteurs of the Algerian revolution.

My first piece of luck was to be in Algeria during a kind of interlude, at the conclusion of the activities of the new central committee of the FLN, the reduction of the number of the members of the political committee having preceded that of the number of commission presidents,* but not yet allowing for a clear picture of the scope or the limits of the real political changes.

Therefore, speculation was widespread with each individual hoping that the new government team would respond to its wishes.

The skilful balance which resulted -- with few spectacular changes, but corrections of details which are open to varied interpretations -- now prolongs this situation, which was characteristic of the period from the end of June to the middle of July. Thus, if the country came out of the test of the long wait which preceded Ramadan, it continues nonetheless -- during this exceptional time of the Moslem year which ends it -- to calculate the chances of the hopes which were glimpsed and the promises which were made. However, one fact is certain, recognized by all, and not only by the opponents of the previous regime: the Boumedienne era has come to an end.

Does this, for all that, mean that the abolition of the revolutionary council signifies a repudiation of that era? Not at all. But a man is dead and life must go on. An episode is finished and it is assumed that the next one will inevitably be different.

An initiative, taken in March and recorded in the JOURNAL OFFICIEL of the Republic of Algeria, is characteristic in this respect: an allocation has been provided which will be paid to those -- Ferhat Abbas and Benyoussef Benkhedda -- who succeeded each other at the head of the GPRA [Provisional Government of the Algerian Republic] during another period of the revolution: the period which, during the last years of the war, preceded the independence of our country. There is no doubt that, even if the problem is more delicate, the history of modern Algeria will ultimately find its full continuity in the reinstatement, within the overall process of liberation, of the "Ben Bella years": all things considered, is this not the only way for the current president -- who took the initiative of the relative expansion measures which occurred in the spring of 1979 -- to prevent the development of that which, in politics, contains the most formidable force there is: a myth?

In any case, tongues were loosened and the Algerian temperament is back to its former self: concerned with a responsibility and an effectiveness which moderate its naturally rebellious instinct, it is eminently taken with a sense of freedom which causes it to be expansive. Henceforth, there are no longer subjects which are taboo. Thus, far from avoiding the subject of the Berber problem, the top senior officials make it their duty to learn a lesson from the serious events which took place last spring in the Kabylie and elsewhere. An example of this is the formula which I heard from one of the top people in the state and which was repeated practically in the same terminology in statements which he made, no longer in private, but before a very large audience: "If we want to avoid the dangers of Berber factionalism, it will be absolutely necessary for all the people and the nation to accept this overall Berberism."*

Does this mean that everyone agrees, without batting an eyelid, with this way -- though strictly true to history -- of stating that Algeria began to exist prior to being either Arab or Moslem? Certainly not, and it was not one of the least surprising facts for someone like me, who has known the country for 35 years, to discover the existence -- as recent as it is undeniable -- of the FM, that is to say the Moslem Brotherhood. But there again, an observer would be mistaken in departing from the steady calmness which the authorities have shown toward a phenomenon which -- even though it is undoubtedly more worrying than a simple product imported from the Middle East -- is nevertheless blatantly inconsistent with the Algerian temperament. Furthermore, under whatever sky and in whatever denominational context it may have appeared, fundamentalism has always been a kind of childhood disease of religious feeling: born of ignorance, these evil spells collapse as soon as politicians worthy of that name manage to prevent them from usurping their sphere of activity.

On the other hand, an attitude of symmetrical circumspection, no more no less, was aroused within the government formation by this "socialist vanguard" (PAGS [Socialist Vanguard Party]) which avoids not only for technical reasons calling itself "communist": as a matter of fact, as far as it can be guessed at through meticulous actions, its specific line seems less overloaded with Marxism than its terminology does.

Indeed, political Algeria remains an extremely subtle universe: Against a background in which the army, omnipresent, is far from monolithic, the FLN is trying to recapture, in a management context, the unquestionably revolutionary spirit which inspired its creation at the beginning of the war.

Realism and Courage

At this moment, when nothing yet has been either compromised or resolved, the most definite guarantee for the future of Algeria is undoubtedly the

---

* The son of Sheik Ibrahimi, Dr Ahmed Taleb, minister counselor to the president, had formerly written in the same vein: "When one says that Algeria consists of Arabs and Berbers, this is false. Algerians are more or less arabized Berbers. Algerian blood is Arab-Berber, with the dominant characteristic being Berber within an Arab culture." (Quoted on p 79, in a footnote, in "La republique algerienne democratique et populaire," by B. Cubertafond.)

realism with which its citizens, and not only the ruling politicians, turn toward this very future while keeping in mind the lessons of the past.

They are not among those who believe themselves to be infallible, and they have the courage to make assessments. True, they are mostly counting on the 5 year plan and expect that its implementation will re-establish a healthy balance between industry and agriculture. But, in order to achieve this and in spite of conflicts between a voluntary socialism and an influential bourgeoisie, they know henceforth that nothing is possible as long as the disparities between city and country, and between the public sector and the national companies continue to worsen and as long as, specifically, the prospect of the profits offered by the latter deprives the country of the "developers" it needs in all areas and which the university, in spite of everything, desperately tries to provide it with.

In this respect, the debate between teachers and students, which the very dynamic minister of higher education established in the beginning of July, was very symptomatic. Within the atmosphere of freedom which I mentioned earlier, it was inevitable that some of the more senior people found it difficult to accept being challenged while some of the younger ones felt that the size of their intervention was too small. Nevertheless, it is a fact that, for those who are in the profession and who know the methods of Mrs Saunier-Seite in France, the experiment which is thus being tried specifically on the crucial subject of the "formation," seems not only comforting in its very principle (unthinkable on the side of the Rue Dutot), but promising in terms of developments which, when used, could be decisive.

A trip to the South finally made me realize that the desire to move mountains clearly goes beyond the neighboring horizons of the Chrea or the Djurdjura and could reach as far as the Hoggar. Ever since the Trans-Sahara highway reached Tamanrasset, not only the city itself, but the whole region has become an enormous building site sprinkled with cranes and crisscrossed by trucks and machinery. If, in spite of the lack of water, which remains the major handicap and will necessitate extremely costly works, things have been envisaged on a very large scale, this was due to the fact that a very sure instinct has pushed today's Algerians to respond to the African vocation of this crossroads once glimpsed by Father de Foucauld. Already, next to roads, the advent of the telephone and of telecommunications by satellite has disrupted the conditions of life here. What will tomorrow be like when, thanks to the great effort made by the youth of the national service, the branch lines of the Trans-Sahara highway will have enabled the completion of a handy link between Southern Algeria and both Niger and Mali?

This was a very audacious economic wager if one remembers the investments required by the hydraulic problems. But it was, undoubtedly even more so, a human wager, if not an ethnological one, of an intense interest because of its formidable complexity: as a matter of fact, it really requires a belief in man and in his powers of adaptation to be able to contemplate the integration of the world of the Tuaregs in one of the most modern of projects.

It is not an a priori certainty that the price to be paid for rescuing this nomad universe from poverty will not be an urbanization only moderately concerned with safeguarding the real values of a very ancient way of life. What is certain, on the other hand, is that the time seems long past when the far South was synonymous with punishment or curse: today, it is probably those men who are most determined to succeed and who are most capable of understanding (because nothing durable could be achieved without the support of the peoples), who are involved in this formidable challenge to the weight of the centuries.

Gigantic Educational Effort

I hope I will be forgiven, being an academic and an intellectual specifically expert on the ancient history of the Maghreb, for concluding this quick survey of today's Algeria -- which is seemingly completely turned toward a future the risks of which it is trying to measure while knowing that this is the price of progress and that progress depends specifically, but not exclusively, on technology -- with a double step back into the past.

First of all, a figure struck me: today, there are 10 times more Algerian students than there were in 1963, when I was entrusted with the administration of higher education in Algiers. Now, this concerns all forms of intellectual life and, even though this is obviously a result of demographic growth, it remains true that this stage would not have been reached if it had not been for the gigantic effort made earlier to educate a country to which colonization had refused culture, except for rare exceptions (in 1946, there was one student of Algerian origin at the University of Algiers for each nine European students, whereas the population as a whole consisted roughly of nine "Moslems" for every European!). And for anyone who might be tempted to suggest maliciously that maybe diplomas come cheaply over there, I would like to note that, for the last session of university entrance qualifications, only 30 percent passed, a proportion which is substantially lower than for our corresponding BEPC [Elementary School Diploma].

Finally, I am left with an image. Not first of all -- may my Algerian colleagues forgive me -- that of very specialized seminars where I naturally found them to be listeners knowledgeable about the history and prosopography of (North) Africa from the fourth to the sixth century. What overwhelmed me much more was the mixed and, overall, very young audience which, completely filling the cavea of the Roman amphitheater in Tipassa (the ancient city dear to Camus), came, at nightfall, to listen to a speech about their ancestor -- Saint Augustin.

In response to a request from the minister of culture and conferring with the highest authorities in the country, I had, during a period of 3 weeks, been a witness to this will of Algeria to take on all of its history through all the languages spoken, all the civilizations experienced, all the religions practiced by the long line of men who, throughout the centuries, made this Algeria very specifically what it has become. That evening, through the mouth of a little boy whom I was asking questions about what he had understood of my words, I became convinced that the Algeria of tomorrow would no longer allow the confiscation of its share, specifically thanks to the prestigious Bishop of Hippo, in a civilization, said to be Western, which would not be what it is without the Maghreb.

Changes Reported

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 8-9 Aug 80 pp 1,3

[Article: "In the Wake of the Extraordinary Congress of the FLN: Numerous Changes in Governors' and District Heads' Assignments"]

[Text] The country is experiencing an intense activity in most fields, especially since the extraordinary congress of the party, the major objective being to fulfill the aspirations and hopes expressed by citizens and party members on numerous occasions, especially during the congress and during central committee meetings.

Now that the political bureau, the central committee of the party and the new government have been formed, numerous changes in governors' and district head's assignments have been announced yesterday, Friday. Thus, 5 governors have seen their appointments terminated, 5 others have been transferred, and 5 new governors have been appointed, a communique from the Presidency of the Republic announced; it also stated that 17 district heads had seen their appointments terminated, that 38 were transferred and that 22 applicants had been promoted district heads.

In addition, one district head and four governorate general secretaries have been promoted to governor posts.

The Presidency of the Republic has published the following communique to this effect:

President Chadli Bendjedid, president of the republic, general secretary of the FLN party, has decreed the following appointments:

Mr Khatib Djelloul, member of the central committee, is appointed governor of Oran where he shall replace Mr Boumahdi Benyoucef who has been appointed governor of Batna to replace Mr Noureddine Sahraoui, himself appointed governor of M'Sila where he shall replace Mr Chabane Ait Abderrahim who has been appointed governor of Constantine.

Mr Mostefa Maghraoui is appointed governor of El-Asnam where he shall replace Mr Mohamed Lamine Guerieb who has been appointed governor of Setif to replace Mr Abdelwahab Guedmani, himself appointed governor of Laghouat.

Mr Abdeslam Benslimane is appointed governor of Skikda where he shall replace Mr Fachid Aktouf who has been appointed governor of Tiaret.

Also, the following appointments have been made: Mr Mostefa Hidouci is appointed governor of Biskra; Mr Abdelghani Zouani, governor of Djelfa; Mr Chaffai Benremouga, governor of Mostaganem; and Mr Mokhtar Hanni, governor of Jijel.

In addition, 38 district heads have been transferred, 7 of whom to the central administration, viz. Messrs Akbi Mohamed, Tounsi Hacene, Bouzaher Mohamed Douadi, Lalmi Othmane, Terki Zaghloul, Hamadi Ahmed, Abda Mohamed Larbi, the other 31 being transferred to other districts. These are: Messrs. Cherifi Mohamed, Akhamoukh Bey, Quiddir Khelifa, Boutriha M'hamed, Abada Abderrachid, Chorfi Mahieddine, Fares Salah, Mechentel Salah, Makhloufi Abdelhamid, Bendris Mohamed, Boutemadja Mohamed, Hamaiti Mohamed, Bessaih Abdelatif, Kettaf El Habib (also called Omar), Khorsi Tahar, Boubzid Hamlat, Benouareth Abdelaziz, Legrioui Bachir, Kadri Ahmed, Merad Mostefa, Mouheb Mohamed-Ouali, Boutarfi Ahmed, Brahimi Mohamed Ould Tahar, Boualem Zeggai, Ait Ahmed Ouali, Bahloul Belkacem, Benlallam Seghir, Benarab Rachid, Idir Ismail, Benaissa Maamar and Benali Bouziane.

Also, 22 new district heads have been appointed. These are: Messrs: Bouguerra Hamoudi, Marouf Abdelkader, Louber Adberrahmane, Khemane Miloud, Lemhel Brahim, Hamed Abdelouahab Mustapha, Sekrane Tahar, Guemari Saddek, Laloui Abdellah, Brahimi Mohamed Ould Abdesselam, Tifoura Smail, Dahlouk Ali, Badrissi Ahmed, Drici Mohamed, Choul Mostefa, Redouane Hocine, Yacef Sid Ahmed, Benouddane Hocine, Ghimouz Messaoud, Guellai Djenidi, Nedjadi Aissa and Badaoui Djelloul.

Mr Mostefa Hidouci, former head of the Mostaganem district, has been promoted governor of Biskra.

Henni Mokhtar, born 8 February 1937; married, three children; graduate of National School of Administration.

Present rank: administrator.

Past political record: member of ALN.

Previous functions: district head from 1964 to 1972, then governorate general secretary from 1972 to date.

Assignment: governor of Jijel.

Benslimane Abdeslam, born 29 November 1943; married, one child; graduate of National School of Administration.

Present rank: administrator.

Previous functions: administrator at the Ministry of Internal Affairs starting in 1968, then governorate general secretary from 1976 to date.

Assignment: governor of Skikda.

Hidouci Mostefa, born 11 March 1935; married, three children; bachelor's degree.

Present rank: administrator.

Past political record: ALN member, 1955-1962.

Previous functions: district head from 1962 to date.

Assignment: governor of Biskra.

Zouani Abdelghani, born 7 February 1935; married, three children; bachelor's degree.

Present rank: administrator.

Past political record: ALN member.

Previous functions: district head from 1964 to 1976; governorate general secretary from 1967 to 1980.

Assignment: governor of Djelfa.

Mr Louber Abderrahmane was born 23 March 1939; a member of the National Liberation Army, 1957-1962, he obtained two certificates towards a bachelor's degree in arts before being appointed Biskra (Biskra) district head. Mr Louber Abderrahmane has filled an executive position at the People's Credit Bank of Algeria in Oran, prior to being appointed delegate to the governor. He is married.

Mr Hamed Abdelwahab Mustapha, who has been appointed head of the Ghardaia (Laghouat) district, was born 5 March 1934; a member of the ALN from 1955 to 1962, he took up responsibilities within the party from 1962 to 1965, before becoming controller at the Ministry of Trade, then department head at SNNGA [National Construction Materials Company]. He is married and the father of five children.

Mr Khemane Miloud, born 2 March 1941, was a member of the ALN during the liberation war prior to studying at the university where he obtained a bachelor's degree in economics. Since 1971, he has filled several executive positions (ONACO [Algerian National Marketing Office], ECOTEC [National Office for Economic and Technical Studies], SONELEC [Algerian National Company for the Manufacture and Installation of Electrical and Electronic Equipment], COOPEMAD [expansion unknown]) before being appointed head of the Bouhadjar (Guelma) district. He is married and the father of two children.

Mr Laloui Abdellah, born 17 October 1934, has been appointed head of the Djanet (Ouargla) district; a former member of the ALN (1957-1962), he then obtained a bachelor's degree in law and was appointed administrator. He is married and the father of six children.

Mr Badoui Djelloul, the new head of the El-Attaf (El-Asnam) district, was born 20 March 1941; a former member of the ALN (1958-1962), he has been administrator at the Ministry of Internal Affairs. He is married and the father of six children.

Mr Dahlouk Ali, born 3 January 1942, has been a member of the ALN (1957-1962) prior to filling several positions. He has been successively police inspector (1962-1964), delegate to the Ministry of Veterans' Affairs (1964-1971), then executive at the Ministry of Light Industry (since 1972) prior to being delegated to SONATITE [National Telecommunications Infrastructure Construction Company]. He has earned two certificates toward a bachelor's degree in law. He has been appointed head of the Ain-Oulmene (Setif) district.

Mr Brahimi Mohamed, the new head of the El-Assasna (Saida) district, was born in 1941. President of the APC until december 1971, he then became director of local administration and regulations. He holds a bachelor's degree and has the rank of administrator. He is married.

Rigorous Selection

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 8-9 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by Hamid Aberkane: "Necessary Rigor in the Selection of Men"]

[Text] Numerous changes in the assignment of governors and district heads have just been announced officially, only a few weeks after the new government has been formed following a series of events which have recently shaped to a considerable degree the country's political activity, and the most important of which has probably been the extraordinary congress of the FLN which took place in June. This operation was expected; therefore, it does not stand apart from the direction taken by the country's leadership. It is, of course, the necessary continuation of a rather large movement which had already touched all positions of responsibility in the nation. After the fourth congress of the FLN, a comprehensive process of completion of the central structures of the state and of the institutions had been undertaken. This process has now been carried further, by means of changes in decentralized structures and institutions, involving new appointments, promotions and transfers. These structures must become more dynamic, they must become able to take proper care of the interests of the citizens and the state, the highest interest of Algeria, and to prove themselves in carrying out the urgent tasks which have been assigned to them. Then, they must renew themselves, they must not hesitate to call on new men and, above all, to select them among those who satisfy the criteria defined in the National Charter.

The decision of our country's leadership is based primarily on the desire to decentralize as much as possible the means and the decision-making process, to render them effective on a regional scale, and to enable institutions and men to play their part in full. President Chadli has stressed this particular point in several official speeches and statements.

Is it necessary to recall, however, that decision-making is a difficult task which requires a deep sense of responsibility and great scruples in those who assume it?

Therefore, the choices made by the political leadership could not be devoid of rigor because they are the result of a prerequisite of the extraordinary congress of the FLN and are inspired by the unanimous will or our people to give a meaning to the principles "the right man in the right place." In selecting these men, the political leadership has taken at least three criteria into consideration, some of which had been neglected at times: the militancy record of the new officials, i.e. whether they took part in the national liberation war, as members either of the ALN or of the FLN.

The newly appointed men have also been selected for their intellectual qualities. They are either university graduates, or competent cadres. Finally, they also have some practical experience in exercising the responsibilities which they now must fulfill creditably.

We should also consider that shuffling men at all levels of responsibility had become an indispensable operation resulting from the desire to avoid sclerosis, routine, "local" consecration of an individual, or the political careerism of an authority. No appointment can deviate from what we must call "the highest interest of the nation." National or local responsibility must exist solely--exclusively--in the service of the state and of the citizens, never--as has already happened--to satisfy personal interest and open the road to patronage. All the credibility of our decentralized institutions now depends on the high level of conscientiousness of these cadres, and on the selection made by the political leadership, who have the full confidence of our people.

Methods, Men

[Article signed K.B.: "After the Changes Among Governors and District Heads: Methods and Men"]

[Text] The communique from the Presidency of the Republic concerning the changes which have been made among governors and district heads shows that the series of measures announced by the country's leaders at the extraordinary congress of the FLN is progressing both in depth and in scope.

Everything indicates that the leadership is determined to restore order in the state apparatus which had become heavy with bureaucratic sluggishness and which, because of its size and complexity, required an overall in-depth examination, as well as a revision of its methods, to enable it to take over--centrally as well as in decentralized structures--responsibility for the problems related to development and to the fulfillment of the people's needs.

The extraordinary congress of the party has closed once for all the question of the men entrusted with a state mission. It was high time to end a certain form of patronage which had arisen among our structures and developed at the lowest level like a gangrene, creating situations of wilful immobilism, regionalism and nepotism which, if they did not serve the masses, inculcated into them mentalities which have nothing to do with state and community interest.

The question of elected or state-appointed cadres has now become crucial; experience has shown that the results obtained on location will depend on how these men are selected. "It is through them that the masses judge the political and moral health of the revolutionary movement," and, above all, the democratic institutions with which the country has endowed itself.

The changes announced among governors and district heads, coming after the government reshuffle, have definitely found an echo in the public who can see that new men are appearing, which gives its true meaning to the concept of relief through experienced, politically trustworthy and more dynamic elements.

The appointment, in the government and in governorates, of officials who have already proved themselves in lower positions is a way of giving encouragement and recognition to the more deserving; it marks a break with methods which might promote routine and careerism.

Since the fourth congress of the FLN, and especially since the commitments made by the president of the republic at the last extraordinary congress, the guideline has shown that the political leadership has, until now, proven equal to its responsibilities and that it is determined to continue to make sure that each institution plays the part which it has been assigned, the more so as the requirements of the five-year plan and the necessity to satisfy social needs require an actual mobilization of the structures and of the men who operate them from the base to the top.

We must recognize that public opinion has not remained indifferent to all the measures taken by the country's leadership, which it feels are of prime importance. In these measures, it finds concrete answers to its desire for a better life and a responsible and efficient functioning of the institutions, the purpose of which is to serve the masses.

It goes without saying that these measures clearly indicate that the country's leadership has taken full advantage of the Ramadan period. For Algeria cannot afford the luxury of a two months' idle period as was the custom during previous years (Ramadan and holiday periods).

Now is the time to work, and to work only!

This is the slogan which all citizens and officials must now bear in mind.

LIFE BEGINS IN RAMADAN THE 10TH CITY

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 22 Jun 80 p 6

[Article by Muhammad al-Hawari: "Two Thousand Families Move Into Ramadan the 10th City This Week"]

[Text] This week life actually begins in Ramadan the 10th City. The water supply and utilities are in operation and 2,000 families will move into the city.

On 21 June, Engineer Hasaballah al-Kafrawi, the minister of reconstruction, housing and land reclamation, and Engineer Mahir Abazah, the minister of electricity, inaugurated the first power plant in Ramadan the 10th City. The power plant's capacity will reach 66,000 kilowatts, which is enough to provide electricity for all of the city's residences and the industrial area.

The inauguration was attended by the Romanian minister of trade and the governor of the province of al-Sharqiyah. Engineer 'Abd al-Hamid al-Sayyad, the head of the Commission for Electrification of the Rural Areas, announced that the new power plant cost 4 million pounds, and that its capacity during the first phase will be 25,000 kilowatts. The power plant will be linked to the central electricity network, by means of aboveground cables, and will provide electricity for all of the city's utilities as well as for its residential units and industrial area. It has been decided to immediately begin the installation of electric meters in the homes.

Engineer 'Imad Ibrahim, head of the Development Agency for Ramadan the 10th City, announced that the city would begin its life this week with the handing over of 2,000 residential units to the citizens who will be living in them. They will be provided with all electric and water supply services plus four shopping centers. Occupants of these residential units will be the people working in the city's plants, which have already begun functioning. There are 10 of these plants, and 4 more are presently under construction.

Ibrahim added: "We are finishing the construction of 2,000 more units which will be handed over to their new occupants during the next 3 months. We are also presently giving 2,000 plots of land to other citizens so that they can begin building on them."

He also said: "This year's plan includes beginning the construction of 2,000 new units, to be added to the 4,000 units previously built. Utility services will be extended to 24 districts in Ramadan the 10th City, which will absorb 150,000 inhabitants during the next 2 years."

COMPLAINTS AGAINST NEW IMPORT SYSTEM

Cairo AL-AHRAM AL-IQTISADI in Arabic 23 Jun 80 pp 18-22

[Article by Hasan 'Amir: "An Opening for Monopolies in the New Import System"]

[Excerpts] "Listen to us. Publish our point of view. It could be that we are wrong. We hope that we are wrong, and that the Ministry of Economy and Foreign Trade is right. But it is our right to try to find people who will listen to us and engage in discussion with us. The newspapers have published in detail what was said by the ministry concerning Decision No 15 which reorganizes the import system without currency conversion, but the newspapers have ignored the [views of] thousands of individuals, companies and agencies who are importers!"

These feelings have been expressed many times, in different words and in various versions. They have been expressed quietly or excitedly. Logically speaking, there is nothing wrong in listening to the point of view of those who are in the importing sector. This is particularly true since the volume of allegations made against the decision, regarding the form in which it was issued and the way it is being interpreted, is growing daily. The following is alleged concerning the decision: It permits the growth of monopolies. It deprives Egypt of available credit facilitations. It curtails the freedom of the banks. It imposes the power of banks over the market. It impairs liquidity. It paralyzes commercial agencies. It raises import costs. It places new financial burdens on the shoulders of the consumers.

Instant Conflusion!

The wording and interpretation of the decision have brought confusion into the market on several levels. It has caused emotional confusion! In the words of Mr Azman, member of the board of directors of the Cairo Chamber of Commerce: "None of the merchants believed that [Minister of Finance and Economy] Dr 'Abd al-Raziq 'Abd al-Majid, who had revoked the most ridiculous decision ever made in Egypt (the decision to pay customs fees in free currency), would sign a decision which has such comprehensive side effects."

There has also been legal confusion. This is because the decision was issued in a very vague and obscure form, and has required daily clarification on the part of government officials. As our sources say, it is not reasonable to expect the market to keep adjusting itself to the flow of clarifications, interpretations and modifications being made. Vagueness and obscurity of decisions are more dangerous for the market than are clear decisions, whatever their dimensions and effects might be.

Added to this is the confusion which has occurred in bank transactions, customs transactions and elsewhere.

In spite of the fact that 17 days have passed since the decision was issued, this confusion still exists. In addition, there is a chain of apprehensions and allegations which alternately surface in the commercial market and are emphasized in every discussion.

Veiled Monopoly!

"Certainly the decision will lead to the formation of monopolies." These words were said by Fathi Shahdi Ibrahim, head of the lumber merchants' division in the Chamber of Commerce.

He elaborates as follows: "The decision obligates an importer to pay 25 percent when opening credit to import foodstuffs, 40 percent when importing intermediate goods and 100 percent when importing luxury goods. This advance payment for opening credit is capital which is frozen for a period which ranges from 1 month to up to 6 months.

"It is conceivable that a small importer could open credit once or twice a year. The medium-size importer could open credit 3 or 4 times a year. But the large importer is the only one in a position to open a succession of lines of credit. His financial liquidity provides him with liquidity in commodities. Consequently, he is able to fix prices, drive small or medium-size importers out of the market, and, finally, monopolize the market."

In the opinion of Ahmad Na'im Ahmad, an importer and head of the perfume dealers' division [of the Chamber of Commerce], the decision eliminates competition. "Competition exists in the market only when there is a large number of importers," he says.

Special Terms

According to Mr Azman, the decision is in the interest of foreign suppliers because it eliminates the special terms which a large number of Egyptian merchants had obtained from foreign suppliers. He says: "These special terms gave the merchants from 90 days up to a whole year to pay. In most cases there were no interest charges. Depending on the type of goods, credit could in most cases be opened without any advance payment. These special terms will be lost, because the importer will be obligated to make advance payments of 25, 40 or 100 percent. As we understood from the Customs Bureau, 100 percent payments have to be made for about 95 percent of imported goods."

Privileges of Agencies

Mr Azman adds: "The special terms in question include privileges obtained by commercial agents. Most suppliers send goods to Egyptian commercial agents without letters of credit. They provide the goods to the agents on terms which sometimes do not call for interest charges.

"Also, this decision nearly deprives us of our special relations with foreign banks and joint banks. Bank regulations permit opening credit by means of an advance payment of 10 percent. And once there is trust and a close relationship between the importer and the bank, the opening of credit takes place without any advance payment!"

In the words of Fu'ad Hammudah, member of the Assocation of Egyptian Businessmen: "These special relations are not established with individuals only, but rather have a collective aspect. For example, there are a number of easy terms which foreign countries offer the private sector. Examples of them are the loans made by the American International Development Agency and the easy terms provided by the British Export Development Corporation, the French organization (Kufas), German organizations and others. How are we now supposed to deal with these organizations? We still do not know the answer, in spite of all of the clarifications which have been made so far."

There Will Be Losses

Mr Ahmad Na'im Ahmad brings up a new point: "The decision exposes importers of goods of a special type--such as foodstuffs, cement, glass, medical supplies and others--to the danger of tremendous unforeseen losses. Before these goods can be cleared by customs, they have to pass agricultural, industrial, health and other inspections.

"Theoretically, these goods can be either rejected or accepted. Before Decision No 15, losses due to rejection of shipments of goods were taken into account in advance. Under the previous system, the only expenses incurred were bank and inspection fees. If the goods were not accepted, I either reexported them or returned them to the supplier, and there were no problems.

"Under the new system, I have to make an advance credit payment and deposit 50 percent of the customs fees. These amounts of cash remain frozen and, commercially speaking, are wasted. In case the shipment of goods is not accepted, the loss becomes a triple one of expenses incurred for shipping, unloading and reshipping of goods, while my capital is frozen until I resell the goods."

Prices Will Likely Go Up

According to Mustafa Muhammad 'Ali, a member of the paper products division [of the Chamber of Commerce], there is no doubt that the decision will affect prices negatively, not positively. He says: "Prices will likely go up. It is true that expenses involved in buying dollars from the black market have decreased, but the freezing of a portion of one's capital in the form of an advance payment for opening credit is a process which is costly from the commercial point of view. It is also costly to borrow from banks to make such advance payments. In both cases, these expenses are passed on to the final consumers in the form of higher sales prices.

"Prices will likely go up for another reason. Most goods which arrive in Egypt are fully paid for. This is in contrast to the previous system which permitted imports under a system of credit, and at a lower rate of interest. This has been the case with goods coming from Britain. The British Export Corporation granted terms of 120 days at a 7.5 percent rate of interest. This rate of interest is quite a bit lower than the prevailing rate of interest in Britain which goes as high as 20 percent. The difference in the two rates of interest means that the price of goods was effectively lower under the old system."

Mr Fathi Shahdi feels that prices will likely go up also as a result of monopolization and elimination of competition.

Commercial Financing

Other sources in the Chamber of Commerce say: "The old import system allowed importers to distribute their shipments of goods to small and medium-size merchants on credit, because the importers themselves originally received easy credit terms from the foreign suppliers.

"Losing the easy terms extended by foreign suppliers will weigh heavily on small and medium-size merchants. The situation may even develop to the point where groups of merchants will either have to cease doing business and close their shops, or pay the importers in advance for their orders. The large-scale importers will be transformed into banks which receive advance payments for orders of goods. I am afraid that once this system is in full swing, swindlers will look for opportunities to run away with the merchants' money."

Shrinkage in the Supply of Goods

Pessimism has pervaded the commercial market after the decision was issued. Most merchants expect that the supply of goods will shrink, fortuitously or by design. The monopolies which are expected to emerge will see in the short supply of goods an opportunity to optimize profits. The smaller supply of goods will certainly affect production and cause an increase in wasted resources.

It is almost certain that the new system will lead to a decrease in the dollar's rate of exchange. But will this lead to an increase in the value of the Egyptian pound on the world market? This question is being asked by merchants and importers, and there is still no answer to it.

The Merchants' Demands

What do the merchants want?

1. 'Abdallah Mustafa Ibrahim, head of the [Chamber of Commerce's] division of automobile spare parts merchants says: "We want a period of grace during which we can clear up old transactions." He adds: "I am in favor of the decision. And I am in favor of setting import guidelines, but with reservations."

2. Merchants feel that decisions taken concerning the commercial market should be discussed with those who have an interest in the market, so that all may have a chance to adjust their activities in accordance with the new regulations.

3. Some merchants have more radical opinions. They demand that Decision No 15 be reexamined and that other methods be found to achieve the desired aims. They say: "If the aim is to have import transactions done by Egyptian banks instead of foreign banks, we welcome this. It is possible to achieve this by means of a political decision or directive."

Some importers say that a large number of import transactions are in fact now being carried out by Egyptian banks. This occurred after importers found that the rates of interest charged by Egyptian banks are lower. But this switching over to Egyptian banks has not been total, because the manner in which business is done in Egyptian banks caused delays, for many days, when one tries to open credit there. This is due to reasons beyond the control of the Egyptian banks, which are burdened with requests by the public sector to open credit.

Nevertheless, shifting transactions to Egyptian banks is something which can be achieved through appropriate coordination.

4. Merchants feel that if the aim is to protect local industries, what is needed is protective tariffs and predetermined market shares, instead of a newfangled experiment called "bank protection!"

[The following is inset as part of this article]

It Is Forbidden for Foreign Suppliers To Play Games With Egyptian Agents

The Association of Egyptian Businessmen sent a memorandum to the various levels of government economic agencies. The memorandum discusses the negative aspects of the law concerning the appointment of commercial agents, and suggests a series of guidelines for correcting the course of this experiment.

The memorandum says: "Actual application of the law reveals that a large number of committees [which decide on bids of merchants to be appointed as agents] do not adhere to the law. There is a flaw in the process of issuing temporary permits which allows foreign suppliers to play games with Egyptian agents who have paid earnest money. Also, foreign suppliers designate more than one merchant as agent, even for the same product."

The association suggests that the government economic agencies concerned should issue a decision which will obligate all committees in charge of bids to adhere to the law. The association also suggests that the issuing of temporary permits be done in a serious and exact manner, and that agencies issuing a permit should make sure that a dealership authorized by a foreign firm has not already been given to some other merchant.

The association demands shortening the period of final review for authorization of an agent to a maximum of 30 days. It also demands consolidation of the apparatus which reviews the authorization of agents, to put a stop to the phenomenon of more than one Egyptian merchant being an agent for the same foreign goods. The association demands that lists of agents be continually reviewed to make sure that only one agent is authorized to deal with a particular item from one supplier.

COMMENTARY ON CONTROL OF FOREIGN BANKS IN EGYPT

Cairo AL-AHRAM AL-IQTISADI in Arabic 23 Jun 80 pp 6-7

[Article by 'Isam Rif'at: "Our Companion on the Road We Are Taking, and Misconceptions About Foreign Banks"]

[Text] A few days ago, Dr 'Abd al-Razzaq 'Abd al-Majid, deputy prime minister, announced that all foreign banks in Egypt--53 in all--are now under the control of the Central Bank of Egypt. It is necessary to make some comments concerning this action.

1. The Central Bank's control over all branches of foreign banks should be complete.

It is not enough to say that agreement has been reached with 53 branches of foreign banks to have them deposit 15 percent of the value of their free currency deposits in the Central Bank so that the financing of commodity import operations may not create congestion. There is still a long way to go, and the gap is still very wide between "reality" and total control by the Central Bank over foreign banks in Egypt.

2. For this reason, even though we acknowledge that this step is considered to be a turning point in the course of the Egyptian economy, we maintain that a great deal remains to be done.

It is not necessary to plunge into the world of statistics to show that the collective financial position of banks which benefited from the provisions of the investment law from 31 December 1975 until 1978 reveals an extremely important economic fact which needs to be addressed.

This fact is the withdrawal of some of our deposits for investment abroad.

What I mean is this: Foreign currency deposits are finding their way into international financial centers outside Egypt, and some of them are being used for short-term operations instead of being used to finance investments of a productive type.

Perhaps the explanation for this situation is the purely economic one which says that it is a matter of high interest rates abroad.

But this explanation is not acceptable when we consider the purpose behind setting up foreign banks in Egypt and the importance of their role in "priming the pump" of local investments.

Perhaps the government has finally done something about this by means of its decision concerning the 15 percent reserves. However, we have many reservations concerning this matter, since there is no actual control over these banks. This makes the issue of the "size of the reserves" nebulous, and leads us to the third point.

3. The third point concerns the role played by the "Central Bank" in Egypt in theory and in practice, especially under the economic open-door policy.

We know that the Central Bank is the bank of the government in the sense that it is the bank which acts as the government's "accountant" and keeps its books. Also, by virtue of its numerous functions which are recognized in all textbooks throughout the country, it stands above all banks--national or foreign. It is the "bank of banks" in the sense that it is responsible for guiding and controlling other banks. It is responsible for monitoring their abidance by all financial policies and guidelines it lays down for them.

As far as the Egyptian banking system is concerned, the Central Bank is God's representative on earth.

How do we now stand with regard to all of this?

Here is what Dr Hamid al-Sayih, the former minister of economy, told the press:

"Government economic authorities have complete control over all operations of 'Egyptian' banks, and the Central Bank has complete control over the process of setting interest rates for 'local currency,' be it in Egyptian or foreign banks."

This means simply that control over interest on "foreign currency" has been relinquished, and that the Central Bank does not have complete control over the transactions of "foreign" banks in Egypt. Consequently, the formulation and implementation of banking policy is a matter which requires clear definitions of the roles played by the various arms of the banking system, be they the Central Bank, our national banks, or the foreign banks.

In the final analysis, we do feel that the deputy prime minister's decision to have 15 percent of the foreign banks' deposits placed in the Central Bank is a step toward rectifying the situation. At the same time, we emphasize that this does not constitute a retreat from the open-door policy.

On the contrary, it is a rectification and a means of guiding our "companion" along the "road" of the economic open-door policy, so that this policy may achieve its aims of real growth of our national economy.

Finally, the term "companion" does not designate just the foreign banks. It also designates the companies operating on the basis of the open-door policy. But this is a subject which merits a separate article.

DETAILED ACCOUNT OF EGYPTIAN NUCLEAR SCIENTISTS IN ALL NATIONS

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 23 Jun 80 p 3

[Article by Wajdi Riyad: "Total of 227 Egyptian Scientists Are Participating in Nuclear Research in a Number of the World's Major Cities"]

> [Text] The [Egyptian] Atomic Energy Agency prepared this year 250 research studies which have been published in specialized international journals.
> The Egyptian scientist, Dr Yahya al-Mashad, was the only one who assembled the entire technology of the atomic bomb.
> The assassination in Paris of Dr al-Mashad, the professor of atomic reactor engineering, perhaps reveals the prominent role played by Egyptian scientists in the field of atomic research throughout the world.
> It is not surprising that we have a large number of Egyptian scientists in all fields of atomic research. They left Egypt to conduct and lead scientific research projects in Arab countries, Europe and America. There they set up schools of science to which they are attached, just as their names are attached to these schools. Their knowledge and genius have spread all over the Arab world, and they administer atomic research laboratories in many Arab countries.

Dr Yahya al-Mashad was one of those scientists who did outstanding work in the field of nuclear reactors. He was the only Egyptian scientist who was interested in putting together all information concerning the design and technology of the atomic bomb. Perhaps this explains the secret of the research which the criminals were searching for in his private room. This must be the case, since during the course of his entire academic life in Egypt, Dr al-Mashad never engaged in any political activity. He possessed outstanding scientific capabilities. At the same time he was a man of outstanding morals. Operating as a skilled scientist, he created a school of science which dealt with nuclear reactors.

Five years ago, in the first conference on nuclear science and its application, he alone presented 14 scientific papers concerning nuclear reactors. He did all of this in only one conference! In the words of Dr Ibrahim Hammudah, chairman of the board of directors of the Atomic Energy Agency: "We lost Dr al-Mashad at the second conference on nuclear science and its application in 1978, because at that time he was going to Baghdad."

Dr Fawzi Hamad, professor of nuclear metals at the Atomic Energy Agency, says that the Atomic Energy Agency has great appreciation for his efforts indeed. He used to administer the nuclear reactor research laboratory of the Atomic Energy Agency. Then he went to Alexandria where he joined the faculty of the School of Engineering at the University of Alexandria. However, he kept in close touch with the Atomic Energy Agency and remained involved in its projects. He was chosen member of the executive committee of the second nuclear power station to be constructed in the Sidi Karir district of Alexandria.

As we know, Dr al-Mashad was supervising the construction of nuclear power reactors in Baghdad. The late Egyptian scientist raised the research reactor's capacity from 2 to 10 megawatts, that is, he increased its capacity by 5 times. At the same time, the Atomic Energy Agency in Baghdad was building an atomic power reactor. Dr al-Mashad was in charge of everything concerning this new reactor. He conducted all aspects of the scientific negotiations between the French Atomic Energy Agency and the Iraqi Atomic Energy Agency. He was empowered by the Iraqi Government to negotiate in its behalf. The reason for this was that negotiations centered entirely on supplying Iraq with 90 percent fuel and plutonium. This is a percentage which has been of some concern to the International Atomic Energy Agency headquartered in Vienna. This agency usually supervises and monitors all agreements of this kind, because of its concern that such research could be utilized to design atomic bombs.

It is said that France had decided to back down on supplying Iraq with 90 percent nuclear fuel. The task of Dr al-Mashad, who was 48 years old, was to bring these talks to a successful conclusion, and come up with an agreement which would satisfy the Atomic Energy Agency.

The Iraqi Atomic Energy Agency had been the target of an incident which was tantamount to a warning. This was when some groups of extremists blew up parts for a power reactor before they could be shipped out of France.

In the words of Dr Fawzi Hamad, who was a colleague of the martyred scientist: "His scientific school is now full of young scientists. It includes Drs Yusri Abu Shadi, Yusri Jawhar, 'Atiyyah, Dimitri, Abu Mandur and many others. Al-Mashad was cooperative, sincere and humble. He had all the qualities of a scientist."

Our Scientists Abroad

According to the latest statistics put out this week by the Atomic Energy Agency in Egypt, about 227 Egyptian scientists went on official leave of absence to work in other Arab countries in 1979. Of these, 147 have had their leave of absence extended, 50 have had it renewed, and 30 are slated to return to Egypt.

Among the scientists of the Egyptian Atomic Energy Agency, 300 are Egyptian scientists who specialize in 13 different fields of nuclear science. Their fields include nuclear reactors, nuclear physics, nuclear chemistry, nuclear metals, nuclear fuel, radioactive isotopes, scientific nuclear instruments, nuclear laboratories, reactor physics, plasma, nuclear accelerators, protection from atomic radiation, nuclear biology and nuclear environment.

In addition to the scientists of the Egyptian Atomic Energy Agency, there are the scientists of the Institute of Nuclear Radiation Research. It is estimated that there are 100 such scientists. This would mean that Egypt now has 400 nuclear scientists.

Dr Muhammad Rabi' Ahmad 'Ali, an instructor in the nuclear reactor department of the Atomic Energy Agency, who has just returned from the United States, says that in America alone there are about 50 Egyptian scientists who are working in the field of atomic research and in all specialized fields of nuclear energy. In the National (Argon) Laboratory alone, there are more than 15 Egyptian scientists conducting nuclear research.

As far as the Arab world is concerned, there are Egyptian experts in almost every Arab country. There, they administer nuclear research laboratories or atomic energy agencies. They are qualified to do this, because of the expertise which they possess in the field of atomic research--expertise which is attested to by all of international conferences. The following is a list of some of the outstanding names among the Egyptian scientific experts who engage in the field of atomic research: Dr Jamal Za'luk, who works in the administration of lighting and power projects in North Carolina; Dr Husayn Yahya Fu'ad, one of the most prominent scientists in the French atomic energy company (Fram) and a specialist in design; Dr Hasan 'Abd al-Halim, an administrator in the field of designing nuclear reactors in the American firm (Nabcox Wilkes); Dr Salah Badir, who works in North Carolina and is an engineer who designs fuel cells; Dr Fathi 'Arif Darwish, a professor of nuclear metals in Brazil; and Dr Muhammad 'Abd al-'Aziz 'Abduh, one of the directors in the nuclear fusion programs in the National (Argon) Laboratory in the United States.

In the Arab World

The map of the Arab world is studded with Egyptian scientists who work in numerous fields, the most prominent being the field of nuclear research.

In Algeria Dr 'Abd al-Fattah Mujahid, professor of radio-biology, Engineer Fahmi Hajjaj and Dr Ibrahim Muhammad Jum'ah teach nuclear science subjects in Algeria's universities. The following Egyptian scientists are in Libya: Dr 'Isam 'Abd al-Ghafur, whose field is nuclear chemistry and desalinization; Dr Jalal Abu al-'Aynayn, whose field is nuclear reactor engineering, and Dr Sa'd Fadil, whose field is nuclear reactor engineering. All of them have obtained a doctor's degree in nuclear reactor engineering and nuclear chemistry, and they all teach in Libyan universities. In addition to these people, there is Dr 'Izzat 'Abd al-'Aziz, who is the technical consultant of the Atomic Energy Agency for which the Libyan Government has allocated 1 billion pounds to build a reactor with a capacity of 300 megawatts. The reactor is being planned and built by the Soviet Union. Other Egyptian scientists in Libya are Dr Muhammad Mas'ud, who teaches plasma physics; Dr 'Isam 'Isa, who is in the field of nuclear physics, and Dr Muhammad Ahmad al-Jarihi.

In Iraq the following Egyptian scientists engage in teaching and in working in the Iraqi Atomic Energy Agency: Dr Ahmad Abu al-'Ala; Dr Ahmad al-Qassas, head of the department of nuclear reactor physics; and Dr Hasanayn Jabir, professor of nuclear metals. Work there was administered by the late martyr, Dr Yahya al-Mashad. Iraq had gone to great lengths to get Dr al-Mashad to work there, especially since Iraq was pursuing an ambitious national atomic energy program. Other Egyptian scientists in Iraq are: Dr Mursi al-Sayyid Mursi, and Dr Mujdi al-Din 'Ali Ra'iyyih.

A Laboratory Which Produces Scientists

Mrs Zayn Shah 'Abd al-Fattah has compiled some statistics concerning Egyptian scientists who have been sent abroad or who have gone abroad on official leave of absence this year. It turns out that 444 of them are on official leave of absence abroad. This includes instructors, assistant instructors, teaching assistants, professors and assistant professors. All of these people are from the Atomic Energy Agency. And the total number of employees, technicians, and scientists who work at the Atomic Energy Agency is 2,580.

Dr Ibrahim Hammudah, chairman of the board of directors of the Atomic Energy Agency, says: "The Atomic Energy Agency is a laboratory which produces scientists who serve Egypt and all of the Arab countries. Egypt is the country which produced the first school of nuclear science in the Arab world, and was one of the first countries to do this in the Third World."

Dr Hammudah adds: "Egypt has a basic group of experts of its own who are able to absorb the complicated technology involved in nuclear power programs. This extensive group of scientists and qualified personnel has grown during the course of the last 25 years and has acquired an international reputation and prominent status which Egypt is proud of. With their expertise, these Egyptian scientists, through organizations of international experts, have contributed a lot to the Arab countries. All of them have ended up working in the largest atomic energy laboratories in universities and in large industrial nations. Most of them are working in the United States. At the present time, 141 Egyptian scientists are working in Saudi Arabia; 28 are working in Iraq; 3 scientists are in Yemen; 11 scientists are in Qatar; 13 are in Kuwait; 4 are in Jordan; 6 are in Libya; 2 are in Algeria, and 1 scientist each are in Syria and Zambia."

Dr Hammudah says in conclusion: "Our scientists and experts have taken on the great task of confronting future difficulties when nuclear power is introduced as a means of producing electricity. This is because nuclear power is considered to be the only alternative currently available to deal with future energy needs--in view of the shortage of petroleum resources and the continual rise in the prices of oil. The government's national plan for developing sources of electricity calls for setting up a number of nuclear power stations, the capacity of each of which will be 6,000 megawatts. This is to be done by the year 2000. The program as a whole aims at raising Egypt's power capacity from its present level of 4,000 megawatts to a level of 17,000 megawatts by the year 2000."

NEW GRADUATES FINDING JOBS OUTSIDE GOVERNMENT MANPOWER SYSTEM

[Article by Latifah 'Abd al-Raziq: "A Total of 30,000 Graduates Did Not Seek Employment Through the Government Manpower System"]

[Text] The process of placing graduates this year has revealed an important phenomenon. It turns out that there is a shortage of 30,000 graduates in various fields of specialization. This is because recent graduates did not seek employment through the government manpower system. Instead, they got jobs elsewhere. Government agencies still have vacancies, especially in positions for engineers, general agriculturalists and lawyers.

A total of 89,000 college graduates, classes of 1977 and January 1978, and secondary vocational and trade school graduates, class of 1976, have been placed in the provinces in which they said they wanted to work.

AL-AKHBAR met with Sa'd Fanjari, the director of the graduates placement office, and asked him about the reason for the aforesaid phenomenon. He said: "These graduates [who did not seek employment through the government manpower system] were absorbed by the market right after they graduated. This shows up very clearly in some fields of specialization. For example, with regard to law school graduates, we have a shortage of 2,037, since 1,736 graduates applied for jobs, when we needed 3,773. There is a shortage of 380 new architects, as 407 applied for jobs, but the need was for 787. There is a shortage of 1,587 new civil engineers, as 160 civil engineering graduates applied for jobs, but 1,747 were needed. As for accounting graduates, we have a shortage of 37, since 4,753 applied for jobs, but the need was for 4,790. In the field of business administration, there is a shortage of 1,171 graduates, as 525 business administration graduates applied for jobs, but the need was for 1,696."

The director of the graduates placement office went on to say: "In addition to this, we are still suffering from a shortage of people who specialize in languages, especially Arabic, English and French. There is a shortage of about 9,000 new graduates in this field. For this reason, the Ministry of Manpower was forced to employ 1976 graduates [sic] to fill the need for graduates specializing in Arabic and foreign languages."

Making Up for the Shortage in Specialists

Sa'd Fanjari added: "In spite of the fact that there is a shortage of specialists in some fields, there is a surplus of specialists in others. This is true, for example, with regard to general agriculture graduates [sic. First paragraph above refers to a shortage of these]. There is a surplus of 130 such graduates, as 2,351 applied for jobs, but the need was for only 2,221. There was a surplus of 130 graduates with bachelor of science degrees who studied geology, as 191 applied for jobs, but the actual need was for only 61."

"For this reason, in order to make up for the shortage of specialists in certain fields, the ministry has decided to suggest retraining programs. This would be done by specialized agencies. A complete training plan would be set up for all [interested] new graduates, to be implemented in cooperation with the agencies concerned."

Women Are Given Priority

Sa'd Fanjari went on: "The Ministry of Manpower and Training has seen to it that the new graduates are located geographically in accordance with their place of residence. The ministry has also seen to it that women have equal opportunity with male graduates. Women received priority in terms of getting jobs in accordance with their place of residence, or where they, in their applications, said that they wanted to work."

Sa'd Fanjari also said: "On 12 September 1979, the ministerial committee for services issued recommendations to give administrative agencies in the government freedom to fill positions by means of competitive testing. But it has been noticed that this principle has not been adhered to. For this reason, we wish to reaffirm this principle in the interest of equal opportunity for new graduates."

Opinions of the Graduates

Hashim 'Uthman 'Awad, a graduate in agriculture, class of 1978, says that he wants to work in the Ministry of Supply, because this is the only ministry that he can work in, since his field is microbiology. He stresses the fact that it is important that he be placed in Cairo, because that is where his family is.

Hasan Shahatah Muhammad, a 1977 graduate of the Cooperative Institute, says that he will go along with the graduate placement office's placing him in the appropriate ministry, provided it is in Cairo.

'Abd al-Ra'uf Ahmad 'Abd al-Ra'uf, a graduate of the accounting department of the school of commerce, says that it is very important for him to be able to work in the province of al-Jizah. But he says that this does not mean that he would not accept a job in the Ministry of Supply or in the local government.

Samiyah 'Abd al-'Aziz Ahmad, a graduate of the class of 1977 who has specialized in physiology, says that she wants to work in the National Research Center, because that is where she has applied to do her master's thesis. She says that although she lives in Heliopolis, she is prepared to make a sacrifice for the sake of her master's thesis.

Su'ad Tawfiq 'Ali, a graduate of the class of 1978 who has specialized in mathematics, says that she wants to work in the Ministry of Education, because one can more quickly land a job there. She also says that she wants to be placed in a job in the province of Alexandria, because she is married, lives there, and wants to stay with her husband so that then can remain together as a family.

COMBATTING WASTE IN UTILIZATION OF INDUSTRIAL RESOURCES

Cairo AL-AHRAM AL-IQTISADI in Arabic 23 Jun 80 pp 14-17

[Article by Jamal Zayidah: "The Future War Against Wasted Productive Resources"]

[Text] In 1978, 302 million Egyptian pounds were lost as a result of wasted productive capacity in the public sector. It is expected that this figure will increase for the year 1979, although the statistics for 1979 have not yet been finalized. Wasted productive capacity represents a loss not only of national income, but also of individual income. On the average, each individual in Egypt lost about 7.5 pounds of income. Also, wasted capacity means a loss of wages and adds [sic] to the rate of inflation.

This loss is compounded when you take into consideration the circulation of capital. The revenue lost as a result of the lack of circulation of 304 million pounds [the value of wasted resources] is very large. If this amount were merely invested in the form of a bank deposit, at an interest rate of 15 percent, it would yield 45 million pounds.

"Wasted Resources," was the subject of a symposium organized by the Research Center for Technological Planning and Development at the University of Cairo. Those participating in the discussion were Engineer Taha Zaki, minister of industry, 35 heads of industrial companies and a number of professors from the university. The symposium lasted 8 hours, during which the following topics were taken up: the reasons for the increase in the phenomenon of wasted resources, its effects on the national economy, and ways of utilizing this wasted capacity and incorporating it in the process of national production.

Inquiries and Ideas

At the beginning of the discussion, Dr 'Ali al-Silmi, director of the Research Center, introduced a series of inquiries and ideas, such as: Has agreement been reached concerning a comprehensive and exact definition of what constitutes idle and wasted productive capacity? Have all of the reason for, and causative factors of wasted capacity been defined within a formal framework to enable us to sort out the interaction of the causative factors of wasted resources in such a manner as to prevent an overlapping of indicators and concepts? What method could be used to compile statistical data concerning wasted capacity? What is the optimum speed for compiling data to enable us to eliminate the effect of the time-lag factor on the effectiveness of efforts to deal with the problems of wasted capacity? And how can we measure productivity and evaluate different methods of monitoring and comparison?

Within Our Control and Beyond Our Control

There are many reasons for the phenomenon of wasted capacity. They can be willful or fortuitous. They can be caused by the workers or the administrators. And they can be due to investment or financing factors.

Minister Zaki dwelt on fortuitous factors which contribute to the phenomenon of wasted capacity. He said: "There are factors which are beyond the control of the companies. The most important of them is power failures. It is estimated that, in 1978, losses of industrial companies in the public sector resulting from power failures amounted to 57 million pounds."

Minister Zaki referred to foreign competition as another factor. On this matter he said that allowing imports without currency conversion and permitting unequal competition by foreign goods has led to a stagnation of Egyptian production. The value of the resultant loss of domestic production in 1978 was estimated at 62 million pounds, that is, 21 percent of total wasted resources.

In recent years, companies have also been suffering from a lack of liquidity and lack of capability to finance their needs in terms of production requirements. The negative effects of this factor have been compounded due to the rise in world prices for services and spare parts, and this has affected costs and volume of production. Resultant wasted capacity has been estimated at about 86 million pounds, or about 28 percent of the value of total wasted resources in the industrial sector.

Wasted Time

Dr Yahya Qabil, the head of Cairo's city planning division, dealt with the effect of the waste of production time on the phenomenon of wasted resources. He said: "In many cases, wasting time has turned into a tradition and a right which the workers have acquired. Examples of this are coming to work late, leaving work early, taking time off during work to eat and have something to drink. The workers often do this as a group--reading newspapers while on the job, taking time off to pay respects to the family of a deceased person, and taking time off to go meet or see off important visitors." Studies made concerning losses resulting from time wasted on the job show that between 20 and 40 percent of the time on the job is wasted. This percentage differs from one production unit to another.

The Problem Is An Administrative One!

In the opinion of Raja' al-Hadi, first undersecretary of the Ministry of Industry, the problem of wasted capacity is an administrative one. He believes that as long as the administrative methods used in the public sector do not change, the phenomenon of wasted capacity is likely to continue and to increase. He said that the heads of public sector companies are hampered by bureaucracy and obsolete regulations which restrict action and the taking of sound decisions.

In his analysis of bureaucracy and obsolete regulations, he went on to say: "The problem is that regulations are not stable. They keep on changing from time to time. Sometimes companies receive instructions to accept a labor force which their production units do not need. At other times they receive directives to the effect that they are not allowed to expand their labor force."

He added: "The regulations which restrict the higher management definitely lead to wasted capacity. The heads of companies are sometimes not able to take quick decisions when there is a problem between workers or between one company and another. In such cases, bureaucracy makes it necessary to initiate investigations which waste the time of administrative personnel. An example of this is the fact that the records of certain companies have been kept in the offices of district attorneys for the last 20 years, because investigations have not been completed. How is it possible for these companies to function when their records are not in the administrative offices of the companies?"

In conclusion, he said that wasted resources is not only a matter of machines burned off, but also a matter of unproductive labor.

The Regulations, Again!

Engineer Fu'ad Abu Zaghlah, president of the Iron and Steel Co, dealt with the problem of laws and regulations. He said: "One worker in the company damaged a roller which cost 8,000 pounds. This is sabotage of the company's resources. I wanted to suspend this worker from his job for a period of 3 months. This required a meeting of the company's board of directors, because the president of the company does not have the authority to suspend a worker from his job for more than 3 days."

The Ph.D's Are Prepared!

Dr Yahya Qabil brought up an important question, which was: How can a substitute be found for the expertise of higher administrative personnel who leave their jobs in public sector companies and go to work either for companies operating under the open-door policy or in foreign countries? The drain in administrative expertise contributes to aggravation of the problem of wasted resources. He added that to make up for this, it is necessary to reexamine the conditions under which such administrative personnel work. He felt that it is necessary to seek help from university researchers to overcome technical and other obstacles. He said: "University professors are prepared to be of service to the production sector, but companies continue to ignore the fact that the universities and research centers have tremendous expertise which could help them. In the more advanced countries, 70 percent of the work done by university professors basically goes into serving the sectors of production. Only 30 percent of their efforts is in the direction of study and research at their universities. For this reason, we should start having agreements, concerning the exchange of knowledge, between centers of production and academic institutions."

Actual Cases

A number of presidents of companies gave presentations concerning the problems of wasted resources in their companies. Engineer Amin Rif'at, president of the Edwina Canned Foods Co, said that unutilized resources in his company, in the year 1979, added up to a value of 675,000 pounds. He said that there are many reasons for this, including a shortage of produce. For example, there is a 52-percent shortage in tomatoes, a 60-percent shortage in mangoes and a 66-percent shortage in okra. The reason for this is that the company is unable to obtain sufficient amounts of these items from the market, either because production is down, or because prices are too high. In addition to this, there is the factor that production of these items is seasonal. Also, there is a time lag between the availability of vegetables and fruits.

Obsolescence of Production Lines

Another reason for wasted resources is the fact that the useful life of some of production lines is over. For example, the production line for canning fish has been in use for more than 20 years, and production line for canning oranges has been in use for 15 years. The problem is not only one of obsolete production lines. There is also the fact that spare parts are not available when needed.

The same problem exists in the National Textile Co, according to Engineer Hasanayn al-Hisafi, the general manager of the company's plants. The company has more than 900 mechanical looms, but most of them were assembled in 1937. Their productive efficiency has gone down to 40 percent of what it used to be.

Training the Labor Force

Engineer Husayn Bayyumi, head of the Nasr Steam Boiler Manufacturing Co, said: "Our company's problem in the realm of wasted resources consists of the fact that the present labor force does not have the necessary level of skill for the production of steam boilers and pressure containers. This results in inferior products, a slow pace, and the need to repeat some operations." He pointed out that some of the trained labor force has gone to work in other Arab countries or in investment companies, because the wages there are higher. He also mentioned that training programs are inadequate and unable to raise the level of skill of the labor force. Mr Bayyumi also talked about the inadequate level of engineers and supervisors, especially the fact that most of them have just recently graduated from school. Likewise, he referred to the problem of the lack of adequate data, which makes it difficult to solve problems and make decisions.

The National Textile Co also suffers from this problem of a lack of a trained labor force. This shortage of workers is not only due to emigration. Mr Al-Hisafi pointed to the existence of another problem in the fact that 400 workers have retired to take advantage of the early pension law.

Finding Their Own Solutions

Some companies have confronted the problem of wasted capacity and have found their own solutions. For example, the Edwina Co started manufacturing its parts locally.

The company set up central workshops equipped to produce spare parts. It also concluded contracts with other local workshops for the production of some spare parts. The Edwina Co has striven to revamp its production lines by using automated systems in order to decrease the need for labor. In addition to this, the company has set up programs to train new workers to perform technical jobs and has improved wages by means of a system of incentive payments.

The Nasr Steam Boiler Manufacturing Co confronted the labor shortage problem by hiring and training auxilliary workers to replace workers taking leave without pay or resigning so as to work in other enterprises.

Some companies have begun to supply their plants with diesel generators to be used in case of power failures. But these generators can only be used for a limited number of hours.

But what has the Ministry of Industry done to deal with this problem which plagues 116 industrial companies?

The Agreement With (Unido)

Engineer Ibrahim Sharkas, vice president of the Public Industrialization Agency said: "The agency has reached an agreement with (Unido) on a project to deal with wasted resources. The project is called "Optimum utilization of available industrial resources." The (Unido) Organization has allotted 1.3 million pounds for this purpose. The aim of the project is to find ways which will insure the full utilization of available productive resources in some industrial companies. This will be achieved by bringing in specialized experts as consultants, and by providing the necessary equipment and know-how for developing and raising the level of production."

In 1978 the governments of Egypt and the United States signed an agreement concerning a loan of $46.5 million and a grant of $38.5 million to finance projects designed to replace old machinery, renovate and develop production in existing plants, and make studies of the benefits to be achieved by these projects.

In 1979 the Public Industrialization Agency and the (Unido) Organization signed an agreement for aid to a project for the full utilization of available productive resources at three companies. These are: the Dyestuffs and Chemicals Co in Kafr al-Zayyat, the Nasr Co for Manufacturing Steam Boilers and Pressure Containers in Cairo and the Edwina Canned Foods Co in al-Ra's al-Sawda' in Alexandria.

The symposium ended with agreement concerning a series of guidelines, by means of which it would be possible to deal with and control the phenomenon of waste resources. They include:

1. Provide the necessary funds for preventive and continual maintenance to keep buildings and equipment in sound condition.

2. Give priority in investment policy to vertical expansion so as to fully utilize existing resources.

3. Provide training programs to meet needs for skilled and semi-skilled workers as well as administrative cadres.

4. Concentrate on productive efficiency and vocational training. This is particularly necessary, because industry became interested in productive efficiency in the fifties, but then interest waned. Productive efficiency should be entrusted to responsible officials in the company.

5. Reexamine the laws governing industrial companies to give their administrations the opportunity to act and account for their accomplishments at the end of the year.

BRIEFS

TWO EGYPTIAN-ROMANIAN PLANTS--On 21 June Egypt and Romania signed a protocol for cooperation on the construction of two plants for making cement and iron for reinforced concrete in Sadat City. It will cost $200 million to construct them. The agreement was signed in Ramadan the 10th City by the Romanian minister of trade (Alexander Milka), and Engineer Hasaballah al-Kafrawi, the minister of reconstruction, housing and land reclamation. Al-Kafrawi announced that the agreement includes the construction of a cement plant, with an annual production capacity of 1 million tons, and a plant for making iron for reinforced concrete, with an annual production capacity of 400,000 tons. Construction of the two plants will begin immediately. Al-Kafrawi said: "Import restrictions will be eased to facilitate the importation of supplies for the construction of the two plants, and this will strengthen the ties of friendship between Egypt and Romania." On behalf of the Egyptian Government, al-Kafrawi thanked Nicolae Ceausescu, the Romanian president, and said: "The two plants will be a symbol of Egyptian-Romanian cooperation." NEW POWER PLANTS--It has been decided to speed up the installation of additional electric power plants in "May 15 City," near Halwan, in order to accommodate 50,000 persons this year. This was announced by Mr Hasaballah al-Kafrawi, the minister of reconstruction, housing and land reclamation. He said: "A total of 10,000 residential units in 'May 15 City' will be handed over to workers of the plants of Halwan in order to solve the housing problem in this important region." The minister also said: "During the next 2 weeks a gas-powered electric power plant will be inaugurated in Sadat City and will begin operating for the industrial area of the city. This is in addition to a number of other gas-powered power plants, with an output of 5 megawatts, which will be imported early next year. This is made possible by a loan of 10 million Swiss francs from the Swiss Government. It has also been decided to speed up completion of the power plant in the new city of al-'Amiriyah so that normal life may begin there." The minister added: "Electricity is considered to be the basis for any normal type of life in the new cities, because it is involved in the operation of all other utilities." RETURN OF OLD ASSEMBLY PROPOSED, RATHER THAN NEW ELECTIONS

[Editorial by Ahmad al-Jarallah: "What if the Old National Assembly Returned, with Conditions?"]

[Text] There is no doubt that the period of time set for the reconvening of the National Assembly is insufficient for the necessary concepts to be publicized and firmly implanted. One of the fundamental issues set forth now is the reapportionment of electoral districts, which is unconstitutional without the consent of the National Assembly. This means that the government by itself does not have the constitutional authority to reapportion.

Therefore, reconvening the former Assembly might be practical, provided that the government actively works towards what it has committed itself to and that it takes action that it believes is in keeping with the notion of the common good. By this I mean its duty to endeavor to obtain the consent of the Assembly--the old one now, the new one, once the electoral districts are redrawn--on the condition that it submits matters for public debate.

I believe that public opinion is mature, capable of crystallizing what it understands to be its interests and desires, which may have general, as well as limited and particular significance. In any case, it [reconvening the old Assembly] would provide an opportunity to weigh alternatives and to find out what is actually wanted.

Reconvening the former Assembly, in itself, would save time, provided that the government plays an active role in it.

Naturally, there would be no harm done if the government had to dissolve the Assembly again, if it failed to find a suitable formula for cooperation between the two. For the dissolving of representative assemblies is a common thing in all advanced countries. Indeed, it is part of the democracy game, although we would not press this here, because that sort of thing may cause confusion in a state which is still in the process of development.

We toss out this idea to save time and to get away from discussion of ideas over which debate may drag on and on, to the point that the government could find that the time announced this week for reconvening the Assembly has run out.

ARMY REVOLT CONNECTED WITH LIBYAN OPPOSITION

Cairo AKHIR SA'AH in Arabic 27 Aug 80 pp 4-5

[Article by Muhammad Majdi Qanadil: "A Look at the Situation in Libya--the Secrets Behind the Libyan Army Revolt in Tobruk"]

[Text] What happened in Tobruk was neither completely surprising nor startling!

What happened in the Ninth Libyan Brigade was nothing strange, and can be said to have been expected!

The revolts and attempted coups against the regime of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi which might occur later will be a natural, consequential, logical result of the policies of the absolute dictatorship which is stifling the Libyan people, governing their fate, threatening their freedom, and squandering their money.

Therefore, observers and political analysis are almost unanimous that something will happen in Libya, and that a ruler like Colonel al-Qadhdhafi cannot go on being a center for terrorism and the export of unrest to the rest of the region. A regime like the ruling regime in Tripoli cannot continue the political chaos represented by the "revolutionary committees," which have been transformed into anarchic groups and gangs so as to impose terror, snatch money and demoralize the people.

Colonel al-Qadhdhafi and his aides try to find an explanation for the armed revolt which occurred in the Ninth Brigade in Tobruk, commanded by Maj Idris al-Shuhaybi. Maj 'Abd al-Salam Jallud, the number two man in the Libyan regime, tries to cover up the suppressed complaints in the Libyan army and to blame foreign parties such as Egypt for the "attempted insurrection" in order to decieve people and evade reality. However, no matter what it does, the ruling regime in Libya will be unable to suppress the mounting popular uprising against it, or to falsify the facts of the terrorism, oppression and corruption which rules Libya.

The available facts about Maj Idria al-Shuhaybi indicate that he was the director of Libyan intelligence in Tobruk, and was responsible for contacting the tribes in the Cyrenaica and desert regions adjacent to the Egyptian borders. After some time, there were some disagreements between al-Qadhdhafi and al-Shuhaybi about money matters and the millions of dinars allocated for payment to al-Qadhdhafi's bedouin agents and for enlisting tribal mercenaries.

Al-Qadhdhafi transferred al-Shuhaybi from Tobruk, and he disappeared from the intelligence agency for a long time, until his name reappeared recently in connection with the Ninth Brigade incidents.

It is certain that a state of emergency was declared in the eastern region--Tobruk and Benghazi--to counter the insurrection and to pursue and arrest the participating officers and soldiers.

It is also certain that there were many victims of the bloody clash, amounting to 400 persons.

I will not go into the details of the attempt which took place in the Ninth Brigade stationed in Tobruk, and I will not go into Maj Idris al-Shuhaybi's motives which led to an armed clash between the rebel forces and al-Qadhdhafi's forces, commanded by East German officers.

An Eyewitness to al-Qadhdhafi's Thinking

But I will linger over an important observation made by an Arab politician who met recently with Colonel al-Qadhdhafi in Tripoli, and who returned to say that he was astounded and amazed at al-Qadhdhafi's thinking, for he is living in a dream.

He--that is, the colonel--believes that his thoughts will solve all the country's problems, and that his theories will sooner or later be applied to the whole world. Thus he is prepared to do anything to carry out what is in his head--in Libya, at least, so it can be a model. He believes that his "Green Book" is better than anything humanity has published or known so far. In order to apply it, he has allocated a huge budget in petrodollars, and does not hesitate to use any means of removing any obstacle in his path.

The visiting Arab political eyewitness went on to al-Qadhdhafi's thinking and the behavior which results from his visionary dreams, saying, "Therefore, the colonel lives in isolation, attacking in particular the politicians and intellectuals who do not accept his way of thinking. Therefore, he orders the murder and liquidation of political opponents, or those he considers to be opponents, among the refugees abroad, and launches concentrated operations to arrest lawyers, journalists and writers who have not stomached the theories of the Green Book.

"For example, 28 intellectuals accused of forming illegal organizations were brought before the Tripoli Criminal Court at al-Qadhdhafi's command. They have been detained without an investigation since mid-April, and no verdict has yet been issued in their case.

"More seriously, the new law on parties and members of political movements which al-Qadhdhafi is preparing calls for the punishment of death for this charge"!

Government by the Green Book and the Revolutionary Committees

This testimony by the Arab visitor gives a sample of the ruling way of thinking in Libya, and gives a true indication of what is going on in the colonel's head. It is also obvious that no one has the right to dispute al-Qadhdhafi's thoughts and theories without facing imprisonment, death, or banishment outside Libya.

There is no place for educated thinking or enlightened opinions in the colonel's vicinity, for he considers this to be opposition, which he must silence, make a crime and charge with treason!

There are some definite facts discovered by Amnesty International about the repressive methods governing Libya, which indicate the arrest of hundreds of Libyans--civilians and military personnel--since February, simultaneous with wholesale overseas assassination operations against al-Qadhdhafi's opponents.

Thus Lawyer Amin Dayfin died in prison under obscure circumstances after 3 days of torture, and masses of Libyans attended his funeral procession. Al-Qadhdhafi's reaction was to arrest two more prominent lawyers, Muhammad Sajir and Muhammad Banuna, who in turn met their end at the hands of the popular security committees.

It is significant that the colonel ignores the law in confronting judicial reservations about his thinking. Justice has become totally based on the principles and teachings of the Green Book. When he arrested hundreds of businessmen and army officers, they were tried before a "people's court" composed of "revolutionary committee" members who had no connection with the judicial system. Because those officers were charged with corruption, they were not permitted to appoint lawyers to defend them. The purpose was to get rid of patriotic elements in the Libyan Army!

There is another resistance to Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's theories, as eyewitnesses coming from Libya report and that is the religious men's opposition to his thoughts, which are antithetical to Islam and which distort the Koran. The colonel imagines it to be his duty to "renew" the religion through his own interpretation of God's book and through his Green Book.

As the ultimate in foolishness and perilousness, al-Qadhdhafi has eliminated the presence of muftis and religious men and has prohibited their speaking on the radio or in the press, to such an extent that Shaykh 'Azawi, the mufti of Libya, is now prohibited from appearing on television. The colonel has replaced him with speeches inspired by the Green Book.

The Al-Maryam Tribal Incident in Tobruk

This challenge to the law, defacement of religion and destruction of freedom, has consequently led to the accumulation of feelings of anger and suppressed rebellion, whether among the people or in the army. What happened in the Ninth Brigade had its beginnings in Tobruk itself 5 months ago, when the angry public demonstrated spontaneously, protesting the conduct of the popular committees. The demonstration turned into a bloody battle with the security forces, which fired on it, and ended with 37 dead and wounded demonstrators. Two days later, two corpses of popular committee members were found in the harbor at the port of Tobruk.

The reason was that the popular committee had summoned a shaykh of the Al-Maryam tribe to its headquarters in the city. The man refused to make a statement to these young mercenaries because of his status in his tribe. In the evening, four committee members broke into his home and struck and insulted him. The result was an outburst of anger; the next day hundreds of Al-Maryam tribe members beseiged the committee's offices and the clash took place.

Such incidents have been repeated many times in other parts of Libya as a result of the excesses of the popular committee members. In most cases, al-Qadhdhafi has been forced to dismiss and change them, to quiet public opinion and to stop the committees from going to extremes in dominating the people and exploiting their influence.

There is other testiomony to the resistance which has begun to break out. Huge masses shouting in unison "God is Great" participated in the funeral procession of a well-known Libyan who died under torture in Tripoli Prison, and this participation was tantamount to a cry of opposition and protest against the al-Qadhdhafi regime. But everyone is afraid of the tyranny of the revolutionary committees, which the colonel has unleashed to eliminate his opponents and confiscate their money and property. One eyewitness who visited Tripoli recently says that the Libyans have to remain silent because they fear imprisonment or assassination, but they are biding their time, and sometimes one of them finds the courage to say, "Perhaps someday someone will rid us of al-Qadhdhafi."

The colonel is aware of all these dangers surrounding him, especially since the recent assassination attempt in which he was shot in the arm. He lives in isolation behind the "iron curtain" which he has built bit by bit around Libya, and no one can find out where he is.

Suppressed Ferment in the Libyan Army

Therefore, al-Qadhdhafi is always uneasy about the army, and his doubts about the Libyan officers opposed to him are increasing, especially in Cyrenaica. Recent commotions have occurred in the Libyan army prior to the revolt of the Ninth Brigade in Tobruk, and leaflets speaking out against the al-Qadhdhafi regime were distributed in units stationed in Benghazi and Sabha (the southern capital). There are two basic influencing factors in the army's complaint:

1. The resounding disgrace of al-Qadhdhafi's intervention in Uganda to help Idi Amin, now his arch-enemy, and the breaking-up and dispersal of his forces in the jungles of Uganda, a disgusting defeat which resulted in the death of 400 Libyan officers and soldiers and the caputre of another 200. This led to heightened complaining and opposition among the officers against the dangerous direction being taken by al-Qadhdhafi's foreign policy.

There was strong opposition to the mass conscription of Libyan youths, at the colonel's order, and their transport to the Egyptian borders to be stations along the "Chibouk" line under the command of Cuban and East German officers.

2. The Soviet experts' increasing domination of the Libyan armed forces, especially the airplanes, rockets and tanks, and the stripping of authority from Libyan officers leadings the units. These experts number more than 1,000 technicians and officers. Planes take off only at their command, and ammunition is issued only with their approval. This is besides the influx of mercenary pilots from communist countries and the East German experts' domination of security agencies and intelligence.

Those Wounded in the Uganda Operation Are With the Resistance

Popular committee members who support al-Qadhdhafi try to justify the assassination of opponents of the Libyan regime in European capitals and in Libya itself by claiming that al-Qadhdhafi decided to assassinate his opposition in Europe because he learned that a number of Libyans were getting overseas training under American CIA supervision, and because he wanted to forestall the development of a link between those overseas Libyans and the current of domestic opposition.

But it is certain that this link has actually existed since early this year.

Some Libyan officers and soldiers who were wounded in Uganda last year went to London for treatment, very bitter and indignant about al-Qadhdhafi's policy which got them into the Uganda imbroglio. They seized the opportunity to refuse to return to Libya, and got together in the British capital to organize a resistance to bring down the colonel's regime. They contacted the al-Qadhdhafi opponents who were living there and in Rome, Geneva, and Rabat. The scope of the Libyan "National Democratic Movement" expanded when a number of intellectuals, students and businessmen joined it, and its activity increased during the last few months, as a counter-reaction to the start of the assassination and physical liquidation attempts directed at those opposition figures spread throughout the capitals of Europe.

The movement felt that it was facing a direct threat from al-Qadhdhafi's agents and the Libyan assassination teams distributed overseas. The executive bureau of the movement met last April and decided to answer al-Qadhdhafi with the same violence. After that, the movement's leaders met in late May in an Arab capital and decided to move quickly to confront the danger facing them, and the attempts to wipe them out one by one.

Afterwards, they went to another Arab capital via Rome to organize the assistance against the Libyan regime and to reply to al-Qadhdhafi from within Libya itself. The Ninth Brigade movement came about as a confirmation of the outbreak of suppressed complaining and anger.

But Colonel al-Qadhdhafi huddles in his isolation and does not want to recognize the existance of an opposition. He deludes himself in his interviews with foreign journalists, saying that there is no political problem in Libya!

But the state of domestic collapse is strangling the colonel, and his doubts about everyone around him are increasing. Therefore, last year he formed a special team to protect him, made up of members of his own al-Qadhdhafah tribe from the Sirt region, and armed it with the most modern Soviet equipment. Constant purging of the Libyan army, through imprisonment and execution, has helped him carry out his plans, but for how long? That remains to be seen!

EUROPEAN MIDEAST INITIATIVE IS EXPECTED FOR DECEMBER

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 3 Sep 80 p 5

[Commentary by Moncef Ben Amor: "Saving Face"]

[Text] While in Tunisia for the meeting of the French-Tunisian mixed commission, Quai d'Orsay's chief, Francois Poncet, will meet with the secretary general of the all-Arab organization, Chedli Klibi, for a full review of the situation in the Middle East and of the prospects for getting the European-Arab dialogue going again. Messrs Klibi and Poncet will also, at that time, reconsider the outlines of a possible European initiative expected, in principle, this coming December.

Since the one side is staying out of the limelight, and the other side is weary or cautious while awaiting the outcome of the presidential elections this November, Europe is the only one, actually, that is in a position, if it wants, and if the others permit, to play a part in moving the stalled negotiations moving.

Still, it is extremely difficult to delineate the contours of the initiative. Two factors account for this. First, the enormous differences of opinion on the nature and even the notion of peace between Israel and the Arab countries. Second, Europe's hitherto diffident activity in that region of the world and its inability, on paper at least, to "impose" a peace solution on the two superpowers and on the protagonists themselves. It is this that renders any European initiative for the Middle East difficult, not to say impossible.

The "deterioration" of the situation, following Israel's and Egypt's signing of a peace treaty and the two superpowers' unprecedented military, economic, and political involvement, one on the side of Tel Aviv, the other on the side of Damascus, lead to the belief, nonetheless, that Washington and Moscow could perhaps seriously get things moving again, and still save face, by endorsing a possible future European initiative.

KEY GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS IN BUREAUCRATIC REFORM MEASURES

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 13 Aug 80 p 6

[Report on government proposals for administrative reform by Siah B. Larbi: "Administrative Reform Project -- The Key Proposals"]

[Text] Responsibilities: to devolve and decentralize.
Authority: to turn the center into a body for conception and supervision.
Citizens: to facilitate procedures to be followed by citizens: for example, building permits.
Civil servants: to improve salaries through a precise and well defined legal statute.
Retirement: maximum retirement benefit: 90 percent for 35 years of service.

Administrative reform. A fashionable term lately. A topical subject for debate. This testifies to the acuteness of the concerns raised by the administration in terms of its performance and its relations with the citizens. An administration which is highly hierarchical and heavy in terms of its mechanics. As an example: according to government statistics, the required waiting period to obtain a building permit for a villa averages 60 days. "I cannot imagine a waiting period of more than 10 days," one official tols us. For a building permit for an apartment building, the average waiting period is 80 days. Not to mention official documents -- very common and touching all citizens -- which also require waiting periods of variable duration and sometimes are a nuisance for the citizen. The reason for this is the maze of departments through which an administrative document must go, even an elementary one, with each department jealously safeguarding its prerogatives.

The diagnosis established by the administration's reform project is the following:
- An administration characterized by a multiplicity of grades and aspirations to go up in the hierarchy and of decisions of all sorts;
- An infinite multiplicity of structures with imprecise responsibilities;
- Cumbersome and formal procedures;
- A regional administration lacking any significant authority.

The remedies:
- To entrust the small structures with those matters they are better able to handle than the others;
- To regionalize the administration without "creating a self-defined regional authority";
- To facilitate procedures;
- To redefine the civil service statute in order to improve the salaries.

The administrative reform project is organized along three main lines, veritable pillars of the Tunisian administration: the structures, the network and procedures, and the status of the civil servant which is the determining element for the success of an administrative reform.

The administrative structures comprise the central bodies as well as their internal departments, the municipalities, the councils of the governorates, the field offices, etcetera... Their vitalization implies the granting to each structure of what it alone can accomplish in order to rationalize the management of the life of the cities and villages and to facilitate the procedures to be followed by the citizen.

The achievement of these objectives implies a transfer by the central authorities to the regional departments and local communities of actions and services with the following characteristics:
- secondary importance,
- current matters,
- regional or local impact.

The legal means for such a transfer are: devolution and decentralization.

"Devolution means to entrust responsibilities and decision making powers of the central administration to officials appointed by the central authorities." For example, the governor.

"Decentralization is the process by which the state, a legal person, delegates part of its prerogatives to another legal person." The typical structure for this kind of action is of course the municipality.

Devolution of course empowers the territorial administrations to exercise their authority, without necessarily implying a loss of control by the center. Decentralization does not lead to the creation of "a self-defined regional authority, but to administrative, economic and social powers fitting into a national institutional system which determines responsibilities, sets down rules, oversees their implementation and provides arbitration."

In order for the governorate to have means at its disposal to impart a regional character to the development programs, it will have to be equipped with instruments such as research departments, "think tanks"...

The departments involved in the planning of the human and material environment to prepare it for development, referred to in the administrative reform project as "development training services" are affected by the /devolution/ [in italics] project:

- land agencies,
- training centers,
- reclamation bodies,
- regional development bodies.

As well as the support sections, which "support the actual implementation of development," banks, foreign trade, etcetera...

In order for the devolution project to succeed, "a putting in order will be necessary." Of what?

Of the relationships between the governor and the "department heads" of the regional departments of the central administration, a putting in order which is based on a specific definition of their respective authority. The law of 1975 concerning the governors is clear: "the governor has authority over the personnel of the state departments operating in his governorate." According to the very terminology of the project, the field offices of the civil administration of the state are "characterized by heterogeneity" at various levels, including the delegation of authority to the field office. It suggests two ways for "putting in order."

First, a division into regions of devolution, each of which would group together two or three governorates, one of which would be selected as devolution capital, where field office heads would be given the delegations of authority provided for the whole devolution region. The merit of this formula is that it relieves congestion in the capital by subdividing the large regional units.

The inconveniences: it postpones the implementation of devolution while waiting for the selection of the regional capitals, and runs the risk of demobilizing [as printed] the governorates which were not selected as regional capitals.

The second formula maintains the current division (19 governorates, 136 field office centers and 1221 sectors).

Advantages: by grafting regional directorates, which would represent the ministries and be provided with wide powers, the central administration would be free of day to day management matters and solutions to citizen's problems would be provided "with desired swiftness."

The means provided by the project to achieve devolution are the currently available funds of the central administration, and it suggests incentives for officials going to work in the interior regions:
- a housing allowance, the amount of which could vary in relation to the geographic location of the governorates relative to the capital:
- a seniority bonus, which would make it possible for officials working in the interior of the Republic to be promoted more rapidly than their counterparts working in Tunis;

- access to those ranks at which appointment is discretionary (director in chief, director general).

As for decentralization, its ideal framework is definitely the municipality.

To optimize its action, one has to "go through successive adaptations to find the model most likely to organize the whole of the city (...) while avoiding centrifugal tendencies which break down tribal order..."

For the administrative reform project, the restructuring of the municipalities involves:
- the extension of the territorial limits of the municipality to that of the field office area in order to "progressively erase the distinction between the urbanized municipal areas and the rural areas";
- taking charge of training facilities: land development, refuse removal, various networks, centers for the promotion of administration, culture and sports; and related facilities: shopping centers, parking lots, green areas, etcetera...

As far as the governorate councils are concerned -- local communities, which manage the interests of unincorporated areas -- the project proposes a widening of their authority in order to:
- be acquainted with the data relating to the governorates,
- issue proposals,
- participate in the elaboration of rural development programs.

In short, to become "the privileged authority of the area in matters of economic, social and cultural development."

Those who would be represented in it are: representatives, municipalities, cells, national organizations and economic bodies, "without falling into sterile debates to find out whether the members of the council should be appointed or elected."

Means:
- the recycling of personnel assigned to the local communities, which are thus decentralized,
- the transfer of credits from the state budget.

New resources would be released thanks to taxes, assessments and revenues.

The territorial division of "economic regions" should lead to homogeneous regions "within which the deviations from the mean would be as small as possible." One should avoid a division based on complementarity (East-West, for example), which would "lead to a covering up of the differences, and probably to their intensification."

They will be provided with regional councils "with exclusively economic powers."

Their responsibilities would be:
- the conception of the economic and social issues concerning the region,
- following up on the implementation of the national plans,
- coordination among governorate councils.

Two requirements have to be reconciled: no excess of numbers and a balanced representation of the various governorates.

The presidency could go to each governor in turn and the meeting place would be the seat of the governorate whose governor is presiding over the regional council.

The second large section of the administrative reform project concerns procedures, which, in the view of the citizens, is the basis of the humanization of the administration. The citizens who, it must be admitted, are hampered in their daily business by the sluggishness of the bureaucracy and are caught in a veritable Kafkaesque system.

The procedures, which the project suggests should be made more flexible, are at several levels.

Economic Level

Procedures concerning the following matters:
- building permits,
- the creation of enterprises,
- industrial credit guarantees,
- the importation of raw materials,
- the importation of agricultural products,
- technological transfers,
- statistical registration of new enterprises,
- FOPRODI [expansion unknown] projects,
- customs procedures,
- agricultural credit,
- transportation permits,
- technical inspection center for vehicles.

Civil Level

Procedures relating to civil documents may well constitute the major share of administrative actions and put the citizen in daily contact with the administration.

All citizens are involved and have to take all kinds of actions to be in order in their civil life. Actions which involve getting birth certificates, number 3 certificates or even burial permits.

It has already become easier to get a number 3 certificate and other actions will follow, such as, for example, with regard to car registration books.

Numerous ministerial departments have published citizen guides.

Inter-administrative Level

This level concerns the internal procedures of the administration. For example, the project suggests that the prime minister raise the ceilings which limit the respective powers of the various trade committees. It also suggests that the elimination of preliminary validation, the orders for advancement in rank and the orders relating to the granting of compensations as provided in the regulations currently in use.

The status of the civil servant, mainspring of the administration and promoter of all administrative reforms, is the third target of the reform project.

Two ideas: the fruits of reflection by the High Civil Service Council.

- Improve the provisions of the general statute by facilitating mobility between administrations, by improving conditions for internal promotion, by adapting the statute to certain realities (half-time work, special leave for training and reorientation, for mothers, for those active in sports and an extension of the duration of availability...)

- Lighten certain procedures at the level of evaluation and of the disciplinary system...

Government workers will see a recasting of their statute, which will take into account newly developed qualifications, an updating of job descriptions and an improvement of fringe benefits, etcetera...

Corollary of the definition of a precise legal statute: the improvement of remunerations.

The project recognizes the existence of "some injustices and some imbalances" in a remuneration system involving 150,000 civil servants, divided into 60 separate bodies and more than 200 grades, which correspond to very different qualifications.

It suggests that the remuneration system should take into account the quality of the civil servant, the job being held and the manner in which the official performs his job.

Principles for improvement:
- maintenance of the principle of equality at the level of grade related remunerations,
- extension of certain specific bonuses to those officials who respond to the criteria of their granting, but who have been previously excluded,
- creation of new special allowances and possible revaluation of those which exist in function of service, specific qualifications, needs of the country in a given special field, etcetera,

- extension of additional allowances -- which are in no way related to the job specifications -- to all the categories of civil servants and government workers,
- indexing of the base remuneration to changes in the cost of living, according to a still to be determined formula.

Finally, the reform project tackles the guarantees of post retirement life.

With regard to the recommendations concerning the system of retirement benefits, the current pension level -- with its maximum of 80 percent -- could be raised to a level which would come close to the remuneration while employed: 90 percent.

At the present time, the requirement to receive the maximum of 80 percent, is 40 years of service.

To improve the determination of retirement benefits, two solutions are presented:
- a regressive plan where the highest benefits would be found at the beginning of a career (as for CAVIS [expansion unknown]),
- a progressive plan: the highest benefits would be found at the end of a career.

The project proposes that the maximum could be reached after 35 years of service, whatever annuity plan is adopted.

The retirement benefits problem opens onto the problem of setting age limits.

Three levels of age limits could be provided:
- first level: 65 years of age for the upper cadres whose access to civil service jobs comes at the approximate age of 30. At the age of 65, the duration of service (35 years) would lead to retirement benefits at the maximum rate of 90 percent;
- second level: 60 years of age for the medium cadres;
- third level: 55 years of age for the lower level officials.

At the age of 55, they will have accomplished 35 years of service because the average age of access to a civil service job is at the approximate age of 20.

BILLION DINARS FOR IMPROVEMENT OF QUALITY OF LIFE IN SLUMS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 10 Aug 86 p 2

[Article by B. L. Slah]

[Text] The main objective of the rehabilitation project for Jebel-Lahmar, Saida Manoubia and Mellassine is to get rid of the shacks.

An unhealthy, squalid belt, these zones promote the rapid multiplication of unauthorized and dangerous structures where homes are crowded together in promiscuously cramped quarters and suffer from the lack of sanitary equipment: sewerage systems, drinking water, electricity, etc.

What is the origin of this unplanned housing phenomenon?

What are the distinctive features of the present situation and the objectives which the rehabilitation projects envision?

We are offering an answer to all these questions below.

The deterioration of the urban fabric is unquestionably the outcome consequent upon migratory movements of people fleeing the countrysides for the great centers of population where they are attracted by urban "conveniences." For these movements, which indicate a certain lack of security prevalent in various regions, towns and countrysides, the center of attraction is the capital.

After 1956, the capital was invaded by a vast influx of migrants who came directly from the countryside or the inland towns.

The most underdeveloped social strata intensified the movement which increased the density of urban space "used" by the inhabitants. This densifying movement particularly affected such districts as Mellassine, Saida Manoubia, Jebel-Lahmar, Sidi-Fathallah, etc., which town planners called "shacktowns" because of the precariousness and insalubrity of their structures.

On the other hand, the migrants, on arriving in the capital, found in these districts neglected and therefore disposable plots of land for their building projects. Some examples: In the "Ennour" district in "Kebaria" some "houses" were built overnight!

In Ariana, in a district humorously called "Neguez" city, migrants and some families dig the foundations at night, build and cover the shacks over with sheets of zinc. In the morning, the families move in!

In a town-planning study which the Ministry of National Economy made in 1972, it is evident that the "predominance of the nation's private sector gives rise to distortions unfavorable to the consistent development of the local network by encouraging the wide scattering of developments and the consequent waste of space.

Speculation also contributes to marginalizing property-wise (if we may use this term) the underprivileged and to driving them into primitive structures in a framework devoid of foundations.

The following table gives a detailed outline of the present situation as well as the social plan for the provision of housing.

Elements	Jebel Lahmar	Saida Manoubia	Mellassine (1st section)
Total area	102 ha	105	57
Number of inhabitants	45,000	37,000	23,500
Number of households	8,180	6,500	3,415
Number of lodgings	4,800	3,800	1,864
Average household monthly income	71 DT	72 DT	49 DT
Portion of income going to lodging	19 %	17 %	18 %
Average number of people per room	5	5	4
Substructure Percentages
Lots connected to water system	53	30	41
Lots connected to electricity system	67	78	95
Lots connected to sewerage system	41	24	60

The rehabilitation projects for these three districts, which aim at merging these areas with the Tunis urban network, revolves around three axes: equipment in substructure and joint foundations, the improvement of housing conditions and the betterment of the inhabitants socioeconomic situation.

The on-site substructures include automobile and pedestrian road systems, drinkable water, electricity etc, as well as public equipment.

In regard to housing, the three conditions calling for improvement are:
--the reorganization of the land and legal situation of the real estate to allow the occupants access to the property;
--the construction of temporary housing for rehousing with a view to dismantling the shacks and thinning out the existing housing;
--the granting of credits for housing improvement.

The pillars of the socioeconomic promotion project are:

--the creation of new jobs by setting up small industries, the sale of lots for business enterprises, the granting of credits for the circulation of capital, technical assistance and the improvement of existing small workshops;
--the establishment of social services, prenatal and maternity care centers and professional training centers.

The services planned are as follows:

Projects	Jebel Lahmar	Saida Manoubia	Mellassine
New housing	1,000	838	3,000
Schools	1	5	1
Kindergartens	--	--	1
Dispensaries	1	1	1
Markets	1	1	1
Household refuse removal station	--	--	--
Tar-surfaced roads	30,000 m	20,000 m	27,000 m
Drainage	18,700 m	19,000 m	7,000 m
Drinking-water mains	16,400 m	16,000 m	10,000 m
Electricity (cableline)	17,000 m	14,000 m	6,000 m
Public lighting	713 homes	415	150
Improvement of socioeconomic conditions [in Tunisian dinars]	188,000 DT	112,000 DT	354,000 DT

The overall cost of the Jebel Lahmar operation is estimated at 4.738 million DT. For Saida Manoubia and Mellassine (first section) the costs are rising respectively, to 4,562 million and 2.332 million DT.

AGRICULTURAL SITUATION REPORT 1979-1980

[Text] A series of working sessions were held this week with the regional commissioners of agricultural development to study the outcome of the 1979-1980 agricultural campaign, within the framework of the operation undertaken, to determine both its characteristic effects and its weak points, and to prepare for the next campaign. These meetings, which the Ministry of Agriculture cooperating deputy, Mr Moncef Moatamri, chaired, took place at Bizerte for the northwest districts, at Nabeul for the Northeast, at Kaironan for the central districts and at Sfax for the South.

From these meetings it emerged that during the 79-80 campaign almost 110,000 hundredweight of selected seed had been sown, which was an increase of almost 20 percent as compared with the previous campaign. As for the extent of the areas sown, on the other hand, there is a decrease, particularly in the Central district and in the South where the areas sown have gone from 1.776 million hectares (78-79) to 1.59 million hectares, or a 23 percent decrease. Weather conditions were mainly responsible for this decrease. On the other hand, the various campaigns went off quite well. The agents were pleased to note that there was no report of any lack of fertilizer or seed supply and that the farmers are becoming more responsive to the use of selected seed of which the tonnage used has shown an actual increase. With regard to field cleaning, achievements in this area have far exceeded expectations as 186,000 hectares have been cleaned as against 106,000 hectares for the past year.

Regarding the mechanization problem, Mr Moatamri has informed the regional commissioners of the recent decisions which the Ministry of Agriculture has made to promote the use of agricultural machinery. These decisions essentially relate to the decentralization of the SONAM [National Society of Mechanical Farming] operation. As a first step, four of this society's agencies (Jendauba, Za-Zaghouan, Beja and Siliana) will be granted their independent management.

With regard to farm credits, the commissions explained the problems which the farmers met in obtaining these credits. On this occasion, Mr Moatamri told the commissioners about the minister of agriculture's decisions to encourage small and average farmers in particular and to have them agree to the credits which constitute the most important factor for achieving food self-sufficiency.

Therefore, in the first phase, he has decided to establish mutual farm security companies at the delegation level. These companies will make access to farm credits easy for the farmers. In the final phase, they will generalize the establishment of these companies.

Considering the encouraging results recorded during the 79-80 agricultural campaign regarding the development of screened farming and the part which this operation can play in improving production and in job creation, in accordance with the prime minister's instructions, it was decided to change the initially planned 180-hectare area of screened farmland to 250 hectares.

Also, within the framework of opening up agricultural training centers to farmers in their respective regions, beginning with the next campaign, students will have continual contact with the farmers. They will work right on these producers' lands and will meet these latter in their centers where the teachers will hold briefing and practical work sessions with them. This procedure, which is conducive to making the agricultural training centers truly influential centers in their regions, corroborates the success of this 7- and 8-year experiment.

On the administrative level, the next campaign will indicate the starting point of the radical reform which the Ministry of Agriculture has undertaken, namely, the extension of local government. Beginning next January, the regional commissioner will have the power which will allow him to administer budget items I and II. FOSDA [Special Agricultural Credit Fund] credit has already been entirely decentralized. The various departments will necessarily send accounts to the CKMA [CRMA] Regional Agricultural Mutual Fund] in order to entrust them with certain prerogatives rightfully theirs. The ministry staff will thus be able to visit the country's heartland more frequently.

[Text] Tunisia, a moderate producer with 5.4 million tons in 1979 and an expectation of 6 million in 1980, covers its petroleum invoice for the most part thanks to exports.

As our crude oil contains very little sulphur, its quality is excellent. Moreover, we export the bulk of our products (around 95 percent) at the price of $30 to $35 a barrel (early in 1980) and we are now importing for our own consumption. The petroleum returns in 1979 went up to 250 million dinars and should reach 325 million in 1980.

Domestic consumption (2.5 million tons in 1979) shows a yearly 12 percent increase; development needs explain this very high rate. Now, the production output of the two main deposits has reached its ceiling with 2.8 million tons per year for El-Borma and 2.3 million tons for Achtart, not to mention that beginning in 1985 oil drilling is to drop and reserves depleted in the 1990s. This is putting things at their worst. However, some 30 international companies are conducting research. They have planned to invest 42 million dinars in it in 1980 as against 38 million in 1978.

Up to now, they have discovered only six small deposits (with an average of 200,000 tons each year): three in the South (in Medenine and Kasserine) and three offshore near Hammamet, Sousse and Sfax. But in the opinion of a representative of a foreign company established in Tunisia, that goes to prove that "the Tunisian mining area has not yet said its last word." On the other hand, a court settlement with Libya on the boundary of the continental shelf in the Gulf of Gabes (now before The Hague International Court of Justice) may grant Tunisia full right to explore the Isis deposits (1 million tons a year).

Another significant point in petroleum policy: the expansion of the Bizerte refinery, the only one we have in Tunisia. ABandoned time and again, the project, whose works could get underway around the end of 1980, is to have a yearly refining capacity of 1.5 to 4 million tons.

ENGINEERS DEVELOPING SOLAR ENERGY TECHNOLOGY WITHIN COUNTRY

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 15 Aug 80 p 12

[Article by Hassen Chaari]

[Text] With regard to Tunisia, the solar energy supplied us is considerable, varying from 6,057 calories per cm^2 to 19,870, according to the month and the area.

Tunisia's climatic conditions are favorable for the exploitation of this energy resource. In fact, we enjoy sunshine for almost 3,000 hours a year, between 147 and 377 hours a month according to the month and the area, or still an average of between 5 and 12 hours a day.

The inexhaustible energy source is supplied to us regularly and especially generously. All we need would be to have a collecting surface area large enough to have the appropriate watts for heating the sanitary water, the housing and the air conditioning.

Solar energy can significantly help improve the quality of life for millions of Tunisians living in rural villages. The use of this energy is indispensable in Tunisia for two main reasons:

1. Our country must face the expenses involved in the rapid rise in the price of oil used to produce energy in urban areas.

2. Because of the lack of energy, forests have been decimated to get wood to burn. This results in erosion and at times in the abandonment of the land.

The Tunis National School of Engineers (ENIT) has been trying for some years now to adjust Tunisian solar cells to higher efficiency by directly changing solar energy into electricity and by means of parabolic pick-ups to obtain higher temperature by thermal route. On its part, STEC [expansion unknown] has only recently been marketing small solar stations for the production of hot sanitary water. Moreover, some private organizations have been established to manufacture 100 percent Tunisian pick-ups with an integration quota of a large amount of local materials.

In the agricultural area, they have initiated the establishment of solar pumps powered by solar cells in the Tunisian south. These pumps are used to drain the water necessary for consumption and irrigation.

Tomorrow's energy--solar rays--is now ready for use. On several levels, its techniques are perfect. If the costs are still high in Tunisia, it is because the succession of steps has not yet been reached.

There are 3 million solar water heaters in Japan, 400,000 in Israel and 50,000 in France....

This energy--a new frontier which has no enemies--kindles hopes and enthusiasm. It can be a momentous joint adventure for Tunisia, for other developing countries and even for the Western peoples.

COLONEL HABIB AMMAR INSTALLED AS NEW COMMANDER OF SAHARA BRIGADE

[Unsigned article: "Border Troops Symbolize Militancy and Vigilance"]

[Text] The Sahara Brigade, which stands at the desert's edge as a bastion of Bourguiba's doctrines and which guards the integrity of the national territory, experienced its hour of militancy and vigilance yesterday during the visit to Remada of Mr Slaheddine Baly, Minister of National Defense, who came to install the new brigade commander. After a three-hour flight by military helicopter, he arrived in Remada with General Abdelhamid Ech-Chikh, Army Chief of Staff, and a number of senior officers. He was greeted by local cadres led by Mr Salah Bhouri, governor of Medenine, and Mr Hedi Cherab, secretary general of the Coordinating Committee.

Mr Baly first went to the Monument of the Martyrs where he placed a floral wreath and said the Fatiha in memory of the heroes felled on the battle-field during the battles of Remada. Then the minister went to brigade headquarters where he proceeded to install Col Ammar in his new functions as brigade commander replacing Col Abou Bakr Ben Kraiem who has been called to other duties.

In his closing address to officers, non-commissioned officers and enlisted men, Mr Baly emphasized the privileged character of the mission which befalls border posts.

He declared that "at each visit to this militant region whose sons, at the time of liberation struggles, wove solid bonds of affection with the Supreme Commander, we experience admiration and gratitude for border troops conscientiously and devotedly guarding the integrity of the nation."

He added:

"Led by valorous officers trained in Tunisian and foreign military schools, the border zones form the shield of the state and the guardians of the people. All those who reside there, be they military or civilian, must be imbued with the principles of the Bourguiba doctrine, and must harbor patriotic and civic sentiments. In these regions, vigilance is essential, and it must be constant, able to detect and destroy any domestic or foreign attempt to tamper with the nation's gains. Since particularly strategic regions are involved, the importance of the soldiers' mission is thereby increased."

The minister further stated that in addition to its defense and protection role, the army must perform a task at another level. It must contribute to the development of these distant and arid zones in order to establish nuclei of civilization and to settle populations. The symbol of the state's sovereignty resides in that tenacity which mankind possesses in creating resources where nature's harshness and climate make sedentary settlement difficult.

In this connection Mr Baly praised the results obtained in Borj El Khadhra and Borj Bourguiba where urban, economic, and cultural development is beginning to gain a foothold.

He emphasized that "the presence of the army and citizenry in the most remote areas of the republic is testimony to our determination to defend and maintain the integrity of every parcel of our national territory."

He continued, saying that "these are certainly disadvantaged areas where life is particularly difficult, but is not the guiding spirit of the Bourguiba doctrine, to have always been able to derive the most from the least, and to have expanded potential and created wealth thanks to effort and gray matter?"

The minister of defense also paid tribute to the brigade and thanked Col Ben Krajem and his collaborators for the quality of their achievement. He pointed out the dynamism and earnestness of Col Ammar, the brigade's new commander, and stated his conviction that the new commander, like his predecessor, will succeed in working harmoniously with regional authorities toward developing and protecting the Sahara.

Mr Baly and the senior officers accompanying him then went by helicopter to Hosr Ghilane and to Garaat Boutnija, 200 km from Gabes, where the minister inspected the projects of the National Service which is carrying out a program of 50 dwellings, a mosque, a market, a dispensary, and a primary school. The local population, struggling with exemplary courage to improve the resources of a palm plantation recently established under the rural development program and which provides these people's subsistence, greeted Mr Baly warmly and gave him a message of support for President Bourguiba. On his part, the minister transmitted the greetings of the Chief of State:

"The Supreme Commander asked me to tell you that he thinks of you and truly appreciates the value of the mission you are performing, you who are mourabitines bravely struggling against nature's harshness to create progress. We know your life is hard and that you lack means. The army is there to assist and aid you, as its means allow, to improve your existence. The essential thing is your conviction that the Bourguiba regime is determined to make it possible for every Tunisian everywhere to enjoy decent living conditions. What the state expects from you is your vigilance, as well as your alertness to the least bit of information likely to strengthen the security of the Tunisian people, and to aid the army in performing its role efficiently and seriously."

Mr Baly returned to the capital at the end of the afternoon after a marathon trip of more than 10 hours in the Tunisian south.

NATIONAL GASOLINE COMPANY--The UAE is to set up a national company to sell petrol in the Emirates. At present sales are controlled by three foreign firms. The cabinet took the decision in principle yesterday and asked the Oil Ministry to make final studies on establishing the company. Earlier this year the government had to step in with massive subsidies for petrol prices. The three foreign firms, Shell, Caltex and British Petroleum, had raised them by 30 percent, sparking street protests. The UAE has to import most of its petrol because of a lack of refineries. DEPORTED WEST BANK MAYORS INTERVIEWED ON U.S., EUROPEAN TOUR

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 2 Jul 80 p 19

[Interview with Fahd al-Qawasimah, Hebron Mayor, and Muhammad Mulhim, Halhul Mayor, by 'Adnan Nasrawin; "Fahd al-Qawasimah to AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM: Our Mission In Paris Has Been Very Successful; 40,000 Palestinians Have Entered Jail Since 1967"]

[Text] Paris--Fahd al-Qawasimah, the mayor of Habron, and Muhammad Mulhim, the mayor of Halhul, who were deported from the occupied West Bank last week have visited Paris within a tour they are making in the European countries and the United States.

AL-RA'Y AL-AMM has had this interview with al-Qawasimah and Mulhim during their stay in Paris:

[Question] What is the purpose of your tour in the international capitals?

[Answer] Al-Qawasimah: We have visited so far the United States, Britain, the Netherlands and Switzerland and we will continue our tour to Vienna to meet with Austrian Chancellor Kreisky. The aim of our tour is to ask the officials of these countries to exert pressure on the Israeli government to repatriate us and also to familiarize the world public opinion with the actual conditions of oppression to which the Arab citizens in the occupied terrorists are subjected by the Israeli military rule authorities.

I must point out here that our visit to Paris has been very successful, that we have met with the head of the Middle East Bureau in the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs and have assured him that all the citizens in the occupied Arab territories stress the need for France's recognition of the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and the need for France to play an effective role in realizing just and comprehensive peace for the area. We have also impressed upon the French official the need for France to perform its role with the Israeli government to repatriate us.

We have met during our visit to Paris with Francois (Mitterrand), the chairman of the French Socialist Party; Georges (Marchais), the chairman of the French Communist Party; and (Couv de Mourphille), a Gaullist leader and the chairman of the French Parliamentary Foreign Affairs Committee. They have all expressed their full sympathy for the cause of the Palestinian people who are demanding the restoration of their legitimate rights to their homeland.

Muhammad Mulhim: We have come to Paris, as my colleague Fahd al-Qawasimah has said, to meet with the French officials. But at the same time, we have come to address the French public opinion through its press. The fact is that the French public opinion has begun to respond to the Palestinian right. We are prepared to come back at any time our French friends invite us so as to tell and reveal to them the enormity of the conditions in which the Palestinian people live under the Zionist occupation.

[Question] What is the position of the mayors of the Bank and of the Strip toward the PLO?

[Answer] Al-Qawasimah: It must be noted first that the number of mayors in the occupied West Bank is 24 mayors and that there are four municipalities in the Gaza Strip. I say with utter strength and firmness that all the Palestinian people under occupation support the PLO which we consider our sole legitimate representative. We have proven this more than once when we had official documents signed by all the official establishments, associations, unions, chambers of commerce and other organizations functioning officially in the occupied territories and then had the documents transmitted to the United Nations. We also conveyed the documents to the consuls present in Jerusalem, including the French consul who, I believe, was a sincere human being who did actually transmit the documents to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. You will find that these documents are signed by me, by my colleague Muhammad Mulhim and by all the mayors in the Bank and the Strip.

[Question] What is the status and what are the activities of the Palestinian National Front in the occupied Arab territories?

[Answer] Muhammad Mulhim: When al-Sadat launched his evil initiative by visiting Israel--an initiative which later led to the Camp David negotiations and the proposed self-rule--the official organizations and national personalities in the occupied Arab territories rallied to call for holding national conferences. One of those conferences was the Jerusalem conference which declared openly its rejection of Camp David and of self-rule and its adherence to the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and to setting up their independent Palestinian state. In all honesty, all the municipal and village councils, unions, chambers of commerce and religious establishments were represented in this conference from which emanated the National Guidance Committee to follow up the conference resolution on mobilizing the Palestinian people in the occupied Arab territories in order to attain their national goals. This committee has considered itself an arm of the PLO and not an alternative to it, as is evident in all of the committee's actions up to this moment. I and Al-Qawasimah have been members of this committee. All the committee's actions and resolutions have been public and have been heard in all the world, thus leaving no place for doubt as to the aspiration of our people in the occupied territories to realize their goals.

[Question] Why were you deported from the occupied territories to Lebanon?

[Answer] Muhammad Mulhim: We were not consulted on the matter. Had we been consulted, we would have chosen to stay in our homeland. Moreover, if all the Palestinians in Lebanon were consulted, they would choose to return to their homeland, even if given Lebanon, Syria and the entire Arab homeland. There is nothing sweeter to their hearts than the day of their repatriation. We will acknowledge with gratitude and forever the good deed of all the Arab brothers who have received us and supported us in our tragedy outside the homeland.

[Question] Can you tell us about the arrest and intimidation campaigns to which the Arab citizens in the occupied Arab territories are subjected? And what is the purpose of your deportation?

[Answer] Al-Qawasimah: The number of detainees incarcerated in Israeli prisons at present is more than 5,000 Palestinians and Arabs because there are prisoners from Lebanon, Jordan, Syria and other countries--prisoners who have fought alongside the Palestinian people and have been arrested.

As for the number of people who have entered the Israeli prison since 1967, this number exceeds 40,000 Palestinians--i.e. more than 10 percent of the forces qualified [sic] to enter prison. The rest are on their way.

As for the purpose behind our deportation, it means deportation or intimidation of all the national elements. However, I want to stress that even if only a single Palestinian remains in the occupied Arab territories he will continue to struggle until he achieves his rights to self-determination and to setting up a Palestinian state. They are wrong if they think that they will devoid the land of its national elements by deporting two mayors. We learn patriotism from our children and I will tell you this story which confirms what I am saying: In one of the demonstrations staged in Hebron, the picture of my 15-year old daughter was taken while she was hurling stones at the occupation troops. The picture was taken by the Israeli intelligence. The military ruler confronted me a few days later with the picture and I told him: This is all our people, not only my daughter, stoning the occupation soldiers. When I returned home, I asked my daughter about the picture, just to make sure: Is it true that you hurled stones at the soldiers? I did not want to punish her. However, she did not give me a decisive answer and then she went to her mother and told her verbatim: If my father fears for his position as the mayor, then I don't want him to come to bail me when I get jailed. Believe me that I went to apoligize to my daughter when my wife told me of this because it is not what I had meant. This is the reality of our Palestinian people with all their factions in the occupied Arab territories.

DETAILS OF LATEST PALESTINIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS BARED

/Article: "AL-WATAN Exclusively Publishes Verbatim Text of the Palestinian National Congress Meeting"/

/Text/ AL-WATAN has obtained the verbatim text of the Palestinian National Congress meeting held in Damascus on the evening of 7 June 1980 from high level Palestinian leadership sources. AL-WATAN is anxious to avoid mentioning some of the special secret resolutions bearing on military aspects, lest the revolution's adversaries and enemies benefit from them. Here is the text:

At the beginning of the session, agreement was given to the following agenda:

The activity of the Executive Committee, which will be broken down into:

A. The visit to India. B. The Tripoli meeting of the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front. C. The meeting of the Islamic state foreign ministers in Islamabad. D. The visit to Amman. E. The National Congress delegation visit to Europe.

The situation in the occupied territories.

The situation in Lebanon.

The 15th session of the National Congress.

Analysis and general discussion of political conditions in the region and the world.

Miscellaneous

1. Popular organizations in the Libyan jamahiriyah.

2. The detentions in Jordan.

'Abd-al-Muhsin Abu Mayzar spoke, stating: "India's visit to the organization delegation came after Indian recognition of us, and the visit concerned various levels--the minister of foreign affairs, the prime minister, and other officials. One can summarize the Indian position on international and Arab issues as follows:

"India's position as regards Afghanistan is concentrated on concern for relations with the Soviet Union and Afghanistan, and they said 'We cannot participate in the American game, since the issue must be dealt with by another method, a sound friendly method.' As far as the Palestine cause goes, India's position fully supported the national rights of the Palestinian people and agreed on the formation of a committee of cooperation in more than one cultural and non-cultural field."

He went on, "The committee held its first meeting directly after the visit. Representing the organization was Dr Sidqi al-Dajani, and the visit really was distinguished from the ordinary by two issues concerning India, which affect the Indian position on the subject:

"1. Yasir 'Arafat eliminated a great obstacle in Indira Gandhi's way when he managed to convince a prominent Islamic leader in India to desist from his enmity toward Indira and stop making attacks against her and defaming her.

"2. The economic situation. Regarding this point, 'Arafat got in touch with Saudi Arabia and the Gulf and guaranteed India's oil requirements at reasonable prices; in exchange for this, there is this positive Indian position regarding the Liberation Organization."

Ahmad Sidqi al-Dajani then spoke about the visit to India, stating "We discussed the situation in Lebanon and Afghanistan, the Islamic conference, nonalignment, the occupied territories, economic cooperation between India and the Arabs and the third world, and cultural cooperation. The most important thing achieved in India was the oil question, as our brother Abu Hayzar said."

Muhsin Abu Mayzar: Let us now move on to the second point, which is the Steadfastness and Perseverance Front.

Abu 'Ammar: At the front meeting, al-Qadhdhafi stated that he had no relationship with the revolutionary committees and that he would hold anyone bearing responsibility for this activity to account. However, we were again surprised when al-Qadhdhafi asked 200 teachers to give their agreement to the political committees or be banished.

The FATH Conference

Abu 'Ammar: The fact that the conference had not been held for 9 years was due to the difficult circumstances of the revolution, which you well know, and the diminution of the conference, since there are about 200 staff members who were prevented from attending because of circumstances outside our will. In brief, the atmosphere was democratic, issues were presented unhesitantly, from Abu al-Sa'id's activities to the military activities, and I recognize that there was supposed to have been guided democracy and not negligent democracy. The resolutions and the political program were issued, and what was authorized was the text issued in FALASTIN AL-THAWRAH. What was issued in the newspaper AL-LIWA' was not carefully edited. The resolutions of the National Congress complemented FATH's premises and did not conflict with what was issued up to the third congress.

He said, "The bylaws have been modified on behalf of the powers of the Revolutionary Council, oversight, periodic meetings and so forth. Agreement has been reached on the attendance of six observers from popular organizations to attend congress meetings. I have been appointed a general commander of the congress and for the first time 76 countries attended our conference and we stressed that our national unity is our national demand."

Muhsin Abu Mayzar made a statement of appreciation for FATH and the resolutions issued by it in the name of the Central Congress.

Abu Salih: Abu 'Ammar was the one who did the most to make conference succeed and honor various opinions, which is a characteristic for which he has always been noted.

On the Islamic Conference

Muhsin: The conference went beyond the cause, and everything going on in the area. We have made efforts to rectify the situation as far as our cause goes and we achieved some success, especially on Jerusalem, the occupied territories and the refusal to turn the organization of the Islamic Conference into a pulpit for the United States of America. Through our participation in the committees, we had influence on a large number of conference members, since everything was mobilized against Afghanistan on America's behalf.

We had reservations on the drafts of some resolutions, and Abu 'Ammar's visit to India had a negative effect on Zia-ol-Haqq, which was reflected in the conference.

Concerning the delegation of the Palestinian National Council to Europe (Khalid al-Hasan was absent from the session), discussion of this subject was postponed.

Emphasis was placed on not talking about political matters, and non-political ones, outside the Palestine National Congress resolutions.

2. Agreement was reached to hand the subject of the European delegation and the statements issued on that over to the Executive Committee.

3. While it was necessary to refer to this in the Central Council statement, the statement issued did not refer to the issue in any clause or word.

The Situation in the Occupied Territories

Abu 'Ammar: We talk a great deal and we do little as regards the occupied territories. We have received $76 million and have not been able to send that to our people. There are Arab countries which have not yet sent their commitments. As far as the situation in Lebanon goes, that is costing us a lot, especially the military aspect.

Bahjat Abu Gharibah (Abu Sami): There is a liquidation coming, not a settlement. The enemy is working with great speed to empty the occupied territories of Arab people. As far as what is being said about international support and international resolutions, they have a positive character but there is no road but the military solution. The Liberation Organization must be convinced, first, and the Arab countries second, of this matter.

Abu Riyad: There is a conspiracy,not a settlement. The attempts underway either by Europe or some Arab countries (which he named) do not go beyond the status of an operation to save Camp David. There is much evidence and also some people are acting as if the Palestine cause was a commodity they could deal in. Examples of that are what an Arab official stated, and his declaration "I can line up the Palestinians." Therefore one must stress and emphasize that no one whoever except the Liberation Organization may talk for the Palestinian people.

Regarding the situation in the Kingdom of Jordan, the stage is serious and the coming period will be the occasion for the crystallization of a plan which will constitute the common denominator for a Jordanian-Palestinian formula.

The secretary general of the Jordanian Communist Party, Fa'iq Warrad: I support the viewpoint of Bahjat Abu Gharibah; we cannot achieve any progress worth mentioning without confrontation.

Abu Hatim talked about the Aid Agency and said, "I recommend that the Arab countries and the Liberation Organization make the agency's payments, to eliminate this agency's dominance over the Palestinian people.

Abu 'Ammar: I object, because that means abandonment by other countries, especially the foreign ones, of support and aid for the cause.

Farhan Abu al-Hayja: We always make disorganized reactions which fall short of what is desired. We receive aid from Arab countries but we must not forget the masses. We have relied on the Arab People's Conference, though realizing that Arab action should be developed. Our activity must not be restricted to the official aspect--rather, our presence must be consecrated on the popular level.

Taysir Qab'ah: We must break out of the circle of illusions. We must be clear. It is necessary to stress national unity first and effective dynamic action secondly.

Abu Salih: We have an inflation in support from the world public opinion and a deficit in the Arab context. France's position, for example, is ahead of that of an Arab country concerned (he named it), and al-Sadat has wasted all the resources of the Arab nation, but al-Sadat is not alone. There are America's other Arabs. We have been flexible to the point where flexibility has become a burden on us, including the outbreak of disputes among us; we have been described as capitulationists, and the goal was to transfer the struggle within us. We are on the side of the Perseverance and Steadfastness Front and it is on our side, by virtue of interests, and we must cooperate in accordance with these interests in favor of the Arab situation. What is going on in Lebanon is an Arab act. There is the likelihood that "Begin" will resort to a military decision and the occupation of southern Lebanon if he comes to a dilemma. We must call a spade a spade and start with ourselves first. As far as the National Congress goes, we must be oriented toward a national unity in front form and if this occurs, the Palestinians will be able to provide half their budget domestically. We must produce political clarity. No one will respect us if we do not threaten America's interests in the region, since in either case the plot and the attack rising against us are continuing. That is, in spite of flexibility, why don't we use force, on grounds that force is the way toward a just peace, not diplomacy? There is no peace and the settlement which is being proposed is a clear process of capitulation.

Abu Salih continued: Attaining a Palestinian state, even on a square inch of land, will require force and many long years of struggle.

Ahmad Sidqi al-Dajani talked about the future format for Arab action, the international situation, and the Zionist entity. He said, "The Palestinian leadership is considered by the international picture to be the most mature leadership and we have been told more than once on more than one occasion, 'You are the stronger for your maturity.'

"I am in favor of what our brothers said with precision on the need to draw up boundaries for our policies, but we must preserve this course, I mean political activity during the past years, and not content ourselves with slogans which are 30 years old. We are not proceeding toward the mirage of 'settlement'--examples of that are why is there a dispute between the United States and Europeans, why is there a dispute between China and the Soviet Union? There is the Arab card, the security of Europe is linked to the security of the area, and there are the Soviets and nonalignment. Europe is influenced by India's position. Since 1974 we have been in the international context, and diplomatic relations influence and are reflected on us positively. For 5 years the European position has been evolving and has come around to support the rights of the Palestinian people, and America is boycotting the European countries. There is a danger in this role and we must repel it, on grounds that America has monopolized dealings with the situation in the region since 1977 and wants to continue doing so."

At the end of the meeting, agreement was reached on:

Holding the National Congress in the early part of the middle of next month.

Meeting the secretary generals (Saturday 14 June in the capital of Syria).

Preparatory meetings to guarantee the success of the session of the Palestine National Congress, especially as regards the issue of national unity.

AL-FAHUM DISCUSSES PALESTINIAN MEETINGS, EUROPEAN INITIATIVE

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 29 Jun 80 p 17

[Interview with Khalid al-Fahum, Chairman of Palestinian National Council, by Khalil al-Taqi: "Council's Forthcoming Session Will be Palestinian National Unity Session; Greater Powers for PLO Council and Unionist Measures for Resistance Factions"]

[Text] Damascus--In the wake of its latest meeting in Damascus, the Palestinian Central Council--which includes the Palestinian resistance movement leaders--decided that the 15th session of the Palestinian National Council will be held in Damascus on the 31st of next August. Political observers consider this session one of the most important sessions in view of the serious issues that it will discuss on the one hand and of the serious phase through which the Palestinian issue and the Arab nation are passing on the other hand.

It has become certain that a mini-committee representing the top-level Palestinian leaderships will meet at the beginning of the coming month of July to discuss the new developments concerning the Palestinian issue and to draw up a draft political statement to be presented to the next session of the National Council as a fundamental working paper for discussing and tackling the current issues, the new developments and the firm and principled positions of the PLO.

In an interview with AL-QABAS, Khalid al-Fahum, the Palestinian National Council chairman, has said that the forthcoming 15th session of the council will be one of the most important meetings and "I believe optimistically that it will be the session of Palestinian national unification because I hope that it will implement the organizational program approved by the 14th session and providing for the formation of a new executive committee in which all the resistance movement factions are represented. I also hope that the National Council will approve a proposal to strengthen the PLO Central Council and to give it more powers to enable it to perform its full role as a responsible leadership body in the organization."

Al-Fahum has also expressed the hope that the National Council will realize in its 15th session "the establishment of more Palestinian unionist organizations, especially in the military field, in addition to the organizations already set up in accordance with the resolutions and recommendations of the Palestinian National Council's 14th session which was held in Damascus at the beginning of 1979." Al-Fahum has added that he hopes that the Executive Committee which will be elected by the National Council will be able to exercise its work as a collective leadership capable of shouldering the responsibilities of action at all the levels of struggle.

Al-Fahum has also reviewed the most important issues which will be discussed by the 15th session of the Palestinian National Council and has said that they are embodied in:

A. The unified Palestinian position vis-a-vis the European movement or any international movement that may produce a new cover for the camp's [Camp David] agreements.

B. Strengthening and bolstering the relationship of fateful struggle with the pan-Arab Steadfastness and Confrontation Front on the basis of bolstering and developing its agencies and its methods of work.

C. Relations with the Arab countries according to their positions vis-a-vis the Palestinian issue and toward the international movements concerning the issue.

D. The explosive situation inside the occupied homeland.

E. The conditions prevalent on the Lebanese arena.

Al-Fahun has also said that he believes that the council will emerge with a unified Palestinian position on all these issues.

Meetings of Palestinian Leaderships

The Palestinian National Council chairman has also discussed the outcome of the meetings held by the Palestinian leaderships in the past few weeks, saying: "These leaderships have held recently a number of meetings, the most important being the meeting held by the Central Council in Damascus at the beginning of this month. This meeting discussed a number of new developments concerning the Palestinian issue inside the occupied homeland and on both the Arab and international arenas. The meeting also discussed the convocation of the 15th session of the Palestinian National Council to achieve national unity and the importance of realizing unionist steps among the resistance movement factions in the military, financial and political spheres."

In this respect, the Central Council has decided to form a mini-committee including the chairman of the National Council and of the Executive Committee, the general secretaries of all the resistance movement factions and four members of the Central Council to be entrusted with making serious preparations for convocation of the 15th session of the Palestinian National Council. This committee did actually meet in the middle of June and it discussed all the political developments pertaining to the Palestinian issue, especially in the military and financial spheres, and decided on two important things:

1. Set the date for convocation of the 15th session of the Palestinian National Council as the first of next August in Damascus.

2. Form a mini-committee comprised of the chairman of the Executive Committee and of two committee members, the National Council chairman and the general secretaries of the resistance movement factions to discuss the new developments pertaining to the Palestinian issue according to the following bases:

A. Putting stress on ratification of the political and organizational programs approved by the 14th session of the Palestinian National Council.

B. Drawing up the fundamental broad lines of the political statement which will be presented to the next session of the Palestinian National Council and will deal with all the current issues.

C. Formulating practical visualizations for real unionist steps in all the spheres--steps liable to be developed to the maximum.

D. Formulating steps for military unity among the resistance movement factions and for controlling the violations so as to confront the danger present on the Lebanese arena.

E. Re-forming the Executive Committee in a manner that enables it to shoulder the responsibilities and to make the independent Palestinian decision through rallying the active organizations and forces behind it.

F. Studying development and expansion of the PLO Central Council.

Relations With Syria

Discussing the Syrian-Palestinian relations, al-Fahum has said:

The Syrian and Palestinian views are in agreement on the need to reassess fundamentally the strategy of the Arab action to confront the Zionist-U.S. plot that is aimed against the Arab nation and its central issue, namely the Palestinian issue. Through an evaluation of the situation with the brothers in the Syrian leadership, there has been full agreement that the movements taking place for the realization of a political settlement in the area under the canopy of the imbalance between the Arabs on one hand and Zionism and imperialism on the other will lead to further concessions in favor of the enemy. Therefore, the need arises to reassess all the policies for confronting this situation in a manner that will guarantee creation of all the conditions that lead to enabling the Arab nation to regain its rights and defend its entity.

European Position

Al-Fahun added:

Within the framework of the study conducted with the officials in the Arab Syria on the situation in the area, the communique issued by the European summit was studied and analyzed in detail. As a result, the Palestinian and Syrian leaderships have become aware of the negative aspects of this communique. Ultimately, the communique has come as an attempt to beautify the Camp David accords and to lure some Arab countries. The communique also constitutes an outflanking of the Arab position in order to facilitate the success of the Egyptian-Israeli-U.S. negotiations. Consequently, the sum total of the principles and ideas contained in the communique--especially its reliance on resolution 242 which is rejected by the Arab nation that does not consider this resolution fit for the establishment of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace--has brought nothing new to the contents of the two Camp David accords, especially in regard to the firm national rights of the Arab Palestinian people and particularly their right to repatriation and to building their independent state of their liberated national soil. These rights have been recognized by the international community as firm and inalienable rights that can be subject to no prior condition. Moreover, the European communique has not recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Arab Palestinian people. While acknowledging Israel's right to security and survival, the communique has given the Palestinian people conflicting and ambiguous words, using the Camp David language, especially in the phrases concerning the right to self-determination. The statement links the self-determination to appropriate measures within the framework of a comprehensive settlement and this is something that devoids it of its meaning and gives Israel the right to accept or reject whatever pertains to this right of slef-determination. Moreover, the European summit communique has excluded Jerusalem from the framework of the occupied Arab territories and has considered it a separate and negotiable issue and this arouses suspicions over the position of the European group countries toward the Arabism of Jerusalem. Moreover, the European communique has linked withdrawal and its concept to the instrument, method and course imposed by the Camp David accords and the Egyptian-Israeli treaty, and this is something that the Arab nation rejects. Thus, the European communique has come in evident response to the U.S. pressures and in line with the U.S. Middle East strategy.

Egyptian-U.S. Coordination

In his discussion of the European position, al-Fahum added:

The issue of the European movement has preoccupied the minds of many Arab officials but the Venice communique has been disappointing. The Palestinian officials have expressed our position toward this initiative.

We believe, and our brothers and friends share our opinion, that no European, African, Asian or international movement can be accepted unless it is based clearly and frankly on two fundamental points: First, recognition of the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of our people and recognition of the firm national rights of the Palestinian people, namely their right to repatriation, to self-determination and to establishing their national state over the liberated Palestinian soil. Second, rejection and frustration of the Camp David policy because it doesn't represent the right path toward just, comprehensive and real peace.

Al-Fahun also said: It has now become indubitably clear and evident that the military coordination between the United States and al-Sadat's regime against the aspirations and hopes of the Arab Egyptian people and of their national forces is coupled with another and more evident kind of coordination because the United States and Israel to impose the U.S. imperialist domination over the Middle East area and to control our national resources now that the energy crisis has intensified and become a matter of live or death for the west. This coordination between the United States, al-Sadat and Israel is also aimed at containing the area and at putting an end to the Arab liberation movement so that they may control the entire Arab homeland.

Conditions of Occupied Territories

Speaking about the conditions in the occupied homeland, al-Fahun said:

Our people in the occupied homeland are the ones who have foiled the self-rule plot. They have foiled it despite the enticement and intimidation campaigns to which they have been subjected by the racist Zionist occupation authorities, by al-Sadat's intelligence agencies and by the U.S. Central Intelligence. Not a single Palestinian has agreed to take part in the self-rule plot. Therefore, I am not exaggerating when I say that the steadfastness of our kinsmen in the occupied territories and the fully evident coordination and cooperation between the Arab Syria and the PLO have helped our kinsmen in the occupied territories to bolster their steadfast position, to carry on with their confrontation to continue to endure and to inflict defeat on all the forces of evil and aggression.

The stance of the Arab countries rejecting the policy of capitulation which the Camp David parties are trying to impose--this stance has had a clear impact on bolstering the steadfastness of our kinsmen in the occupied homeland and on raising their morale. However, the positions of these Arab countries should be developed. I hope that the Arab reactions to what our people are being subjected to will be of a more practical nature than the words of sympathy that we hear now, especially since foiling the self-rule plot is an indivisible part of the pan-Arab struggle because liquidation of the Palestinian cause means Zionist control of the Arab nation's destinies.

Concluding the interview, al-Fahun said;

The steadfastness of our people in the occupied homeland and supporting the PLO are tantamount to defending the Arab struggle generally. This is why we find that the racist Zionist enemy has intensified his ferocity and violence with the aim of imposing its control on the West Bank and Gaza Strip and why this enemy has resorted to the maximum degrees of organized terror through the deportation and assassination of the Palestinian national leaderships with the aim of devoiding the Palestinian land of its Arab inhabitants so that he may annex and incorporate it and may leap from it to size the neighboring Arab terrorists.

LATEST CRIMES, SCANDALS IN ISRAEL DESCRIBED

Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM in Arabic 23 Jun 80 p 18

/Article: Letter from Amman: AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM talks with Abu Jihad: We Will Compel Israel To Stay in a State of Permanent Alert"/

/Text/ At midnight, AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM recorded an important, intense conversation with one of the most conspicuous leaders of the Palestinian revolution, our brother Khalil al-Waz'r, Abu Jihad, member of the Central Committee of the FATH movement.

By virtue of the responsible position the well known fighting commander Abu Jihad occupies, the discussion concentrated on Palestinian military activity within the occupied territories.

In his talk, the Palestian official also dealt with an analysis and evaluation of the exploding situation in the occupied territories, and the relationship between the Palestinian revolution and liberation movements, especially in the military field. In brief, I can state that his serious, responsible talk makes the reader feel that he is making our nation face its responsibilities of providing the equipment and wherewithal to support the Palestinian fighting man and give free rein to the Arab fighting man, so that they may together create the badge of triumph, in a manner totally harmonious with the eternal slogan "ask for death and it will give you life!"

Herewith follows the text of AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM's conversation with the leader Abu Jihad:

/Question/ What is your evaluation of the situation in the occupied territories and analysis of the phenomenon of the resignation of the mayors and members of the municipal councils, or the withdrawl of the councils there, its connection and effect on the situation domestically, and Israeli reactions?

The leader Abu Jihad replied, "Regarding the subject of the resignations, we must pay heed to the fact that that is always linked with the nature of the events facing our people in the occupied territories; the method the Israeli enemy uses to confront our people is making the incidents there grow in number in accordance with the nature of the circumstances and the nature of the Israeli enemy's style. For a while, circumstances demanded, in the condition of the struggle of our brother Bassam al-Shak'ah, his arrest and the decision to banish him, that the mayors and members of the municipal councils declare a united stand alongside our brother al-Shak'ah. This stand has had its effect in having the enemy back down. Then the circumstances and events followed one another, and through these events the role the mayors play in the struggle to confront the occupation and to express national positions regarding every event our people experienced in the occupied territories became strengthened. This role has terrified our Zionist enemy, and he showed his vengeance and resentment at this role when theenemy leaders repeatedly declared their opposition to the mayors' domestic method vis-a-vis the definition of their positions and the positions declared on their part on national issues. Therefore the enemy has always called on the mayors and drawn their attention, through its declarations and press statements, repeatedly prevented the mayor of this town or that from meeting newsmen and prevented them on many occasions to have any meetings of a group of mayors, in addition to many measures the enemy adopts which we have learned about through the various press agencies and information media.

"The enemy," commander Abu Jihad went on, "has realized that the mayors' positions constitute one of the citadels of the struggle in confronting his tyranny, in confronting the occupation and his terror, in revealing and exposing the enemy's terrorist methods against our people, the grievances he is committing against them, and the arbitrary measures he is perpetrating to influence the moral spirit of our people, practicing more pressures to force our people to abandon their land and emigrate from their homeland so that he will be able to carry out his schemes and measures.

National Symbols

"When the campaign of national confrontation with the occupation intensified, we saw our enemy losing his judgment.

"Here he is, not knowing how to act, and we find him repressing a number of mayors and expelling some of them, as heppened with our fighting brother Fahd al-Qawasimah, the mayor of Hebron, Muhammad Hasan Milhim, mayor of Halhul, and His Eminence Shaykh Rajab al-Tamimi, the Islamic judge of Hebron. The enemy uprooted them from the territory of the homeland and threw them far away, over the borders, to Lebanon, imagining that throwing these fighting men out of their homeland would douse the flame of revolution in the occupied territories. However, in spite of his terrorist methods and curfew system, the attacks by 'Gush Emonim' bands on the town of Hebron and its sections, their aggressions against property, cars, and inhabitants, and in spite of the methods of brutal terror which have also taken place in confronting the upheaval of our people in the occupied territory--in spite of all that, the flame of revolution has not been extinguished, in fact, to the contrary, it has become more and explosive and inflammatory. As information has been constantly reaching us, the enemy leaders have discussed and studied in the Foreign and Security Affairs Committee and in their cabinet means whereby they can confront this decisive uprising, and they adopted the decision to use a more brutal method, which is that of individual liquidation. There then occurred the episodes of the aggressions against our two fighting brothers Bassam al-Shak'ah and Karim Khalaf, alongside the attempt also to commit aggression against our brother Ibrahim al-Tawil, the mayor of al-Birah. Through these operations, the enemy tried to liquidate the national symbols within and snuff out the burning firebrands of the struggle. However, their fortunes were dashed and their dreams were not realized. The fighting spirit exploded in a more extensive fashion within the ranks of our masses and this popular rallying about these fighting men made the enemy miss what he wanted. Our people's rallying around the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Palestinian revolution within the occupied territories has increased."

The Mistake of Resignation

The fighting commander Abu Jihad elaborated, stating: "In this atmosphere prominent voices said 'one must make a stand in which the mayors declare their resignations.' There was an initiative on the part of some and we ourselves said directly that this measure is a mistake. First, there must be a single national position on the part of all our brother mayors and municipal and village councils domestically, a united position is necessary, and then it is necessary to study the adversary's goals. In this struggle, he has tried to liquidate some mayors, and, if others resign, that will mean that we are falling into the adversary's net. Therefore it has been necessary that our brothers who declared this initiative directly must draw back and stand alongside their brothers. Otherwise we will be giving our enemy an opportunity then to form military committees which will take charge of commanding these municipalities, and therefore his schemes will be realized."

A Different Struggle

Our brother the commander Abu Jihad said, "This struggle is different from the previous one. The goals of this struggle are specific and its dimensions are clear. Therefore, we must act in our steps from this premise, and therefore the opinion has been that it is necessary not to resign and that those who offered their resignations should withdraw them. These brothers responded and the position within the occupied territories now has become clear. It is also a united position against the processes of resignation and a national position which perceives the goals of the adversary and understands what our Zionist enemy wants from these operations."

Military Operations

There is no doubt that the leader Abu Jihad is the best person to whom to direct a question in evaluating the index of guerrilla military operations against the Zionist enemy within, comparing them with past years, then evaluating their nature, qualitatively and quantitatively, and the reactions and comments by the enemy leadership on them.

Abu Jihad replies: "Naturally the platform of FATH and the Palestinian revolution has been and remains one of escalating revolutionary combat activity within our occupied territories; in fact, this activity has increased and escalated, and has not decreased. It is increasing every year over the preceding one, because our platform is to increase operations against the Zionist enemy in spite of increased Israeli measures and precautions and in spite of the almost permanent state of alert in every town, colonial outpost and settlement in the occupied territories. The life our enemy is living of near-alert, mobilization of civil guard and police, army, informers and the like, of which we may find a picture in their declaration that they have used 110,000 local guard members as well as army, police and general security forces and have used methods of enticement to follow up on military operations when they announce that prizes of 1,000 Israeli pounds are being offered to anyone finding anything suspicious, that anyone finding bombs will get 2,000 to 3,000 or 5,000 pounds, and that anyone seizing the person who set out the bomb will get 20,000 to 30,000 pounds, making the main concern of tens, indeed hundreds, of thousands of unemployed persons to act as informants roaming the streets of Jerusalem or Tel Aviv, Haifa and other colonial settlements in search of suspicious objects--and we hear Israeli police reports stating that thousands of reports reach them every day concerning every town or settlement--this life of a nearly permanent alert and constant vigilance the Zionist is witnessing constitutes a problem in military activity, but, in spite of all these circumstances, the schedule and list of military operations is increasing qualitatively and quantitatively."

Statement of Operations and the Enemy's Admissions

The commander Abu Jihad says, "Let us talk in the language of figures, according to the admissions of the Israeli enemy himself." Abu Jihad left the place, hastening to an adjacent room in order to bring a military file containing facts, statistics and figures on military operations within the occupied territories, then started to flip the pages of the file, stating, "According to admissions by the Israeli enemy--operations in 1977, for example; I do not want to talk about before that--the number of operations he acknowledged within the occupied territories in 1977 were 163. In 1978 they rose to 185 and increased to 329 in 1979. What has been broadcast about the number of military operations since the beginning of this year, up to the end of April, were 77 operations, by the enemy's admissions."

Increasing Operations

The commander Abu Jihad says, "These figures, according to Zionist admissions (which try to belittle the importance and number of the operations) give a clear picture of the increasing number of operations from the quantitative standpoint. From the standpoint of quality, and from the standpoint of performance level, the nature of operations, the style of organization and implementation, and the provision of security, let us listen to what our enemy says in this sphere.

Israeli Testimony

"The military correspondent of the Zionist newspaper YEDIOT AHARONOT talked about the status of the resistance and its development during the recent period, saying, 'The guerrillas have learned lessons from their past experiences. From the standpoint of organization their cells were many in number, but now, with the organization of their new cells, they pose abundant problems for Israeli intelligence. In recent time the personal level of the guerrillas has risen markedly and Israeli intelligence personnel say that they have discovered that the secret cells and the guerrilla groups they have discovered recently include the greatest number of college and university graduates who receive special instruction in which they learn ways of persevering in the face of Israeli intelligence interrogation if they fall into Israeli hands. The people trained in this field are guerrillas who have experienced detention in the occupied territories and have completed periods of imprisonment. Their weapons inside the occupied territories have developed greatly. Just 1 year ago 75 percent of the explosives were manufactured locally, in primitive form, but this year 80 percent of the explosives discovered or seized have been of excellent types, such as Cytex or R DeLuxe, whose killing power is much greater than any other explosive. This is one of the latent reasons for the fact that a very large number of people have been killed or wounded in the guerrilla operations which have been carried out in the recent period.'

Who Is Yusuf Nidam?

"The military editor of the Zionist newspaper YEDIOT AHARONOT went on to say, 'The guerrillas have never owned such a tremendous amount of explosives and war materiel as they do today. All evidence shows that this materiel is being transported somehow, but not via the bridges, through Lebanon or by the port of Haifa. Their greatest success occurred when they seized some explosives upon arresting Yusuf Juju Nidam and his group.'"

Another Item of Testimony

The Palestinian leader Abu Jihad went on to state, "Israeli military reports, which are confirmed by the military correspondent of the Zionist newspaper HAARETZ, stated 'Establishment of guerrilla cells has assumed a new form, and the number of people per cell has become very limited and small. There are cells made up of one person or two only, while in the past cells consisted of six to nine persons. The type of guerrilla personnel also differs. Most guerrillas who have been arrested have enjoyed a broad cultural, educational and training level."

New Leaders in the Strip

Abu Jihad went on to say, "Military activity has developed not just on the bank but also in the Gaza area, which was dominated by a period of paralysis. 'She'ef Ze'evi' has mentioned that FATH exerted special efforts for months to expand its organizational and operational groundwork in the Gaza Strip. FATH particularly has operated there during the recent period to introduce commanders of a good level to develop the organization of secret cells and operation cells as well as developing the introduction of arms."

Developing Operations--and Increasing Their Rate

Commander Abu Jihad continued his statement, presenting his analysis and evaluation of guerrilla military operations and stating "These operations have developed and their areas have extended to encompass all areas of the occupied homeland, both the areas occupied in 1948, which the enemy has acknowledged have increased qualitatively and quantitatively, and the areas in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip." Even Col 'Yossi Wartmund,' head of the section of explosives experts in the Zionist police, has said, 'We cannot win this war; guerrilla bombs and explosives have become more developed and advanced than in the past. The arms stores and depots of the Israeli forces recently have become a big source of supply of explosives and weapons for those they call terrorists, and Palestinian organizations have succeeded in obtaining weapons in addition to army sources through marine shipments along the Mediterranean coast or by numerous packages by various ways and means, coming in by land, sea or air.'"

Military Activity--a Revolutionary Wing

On relations between political and military struggles within the revolutionary context, commander Abu Jihad says, "What I would like to state and stress here is that these military operations are constant and successive; they are increasing in quantity and developing in quality. These operations constitute one of the wings of revolutionary struggle; alongside this revolutionary struggle there is also another wing, the political struggle. Our people inside the occupied territories are performing this role inside, through the development and escalation we see in their political struggle, in confronting the challenge with strikes, protests and sit-ins, and in confronting terrorist methods with the national stands declared by our people, through their various institutions and leaders inside the occupied territories. This combative activity inside is not far removed, either, from what it represents in terms of a combative harvest in the form of a background for the Liberation Organization and Palestinian revolution's political struggle in various Palestinian spheres, among the ranks of our people in all the areas where they are gathered and oriented, since the people's rallying about the Palestine Liberation Organization within these national forces inside the ranks of our people is being deepened and their national unity is also being deepened, in addition to our people's struggle inside our occupied territories or the Arab scene, when these triumphs of our people inside constitute a background and an incentive for the masses of our Arab nation in the Arab area, or for Arab regimes as well, and in the international area for all those with live consciences in this world who have supported our people's struggle or are standing alongside this struggle by various means--or even those who have not supported our rights but before whom these struggles constitute factors which challenge reality. It has become clear that these people are determined to gain their legitimate rights for their homeland, self-determination, and establishment of an independent state, and therefore our political movement is a combative movement complementing our revolutionary struggle and the military struggle and the political struggle are two wings of our people's revolutionary struggle."

Revolutionaries of the World in Palestinian Camps

/Question/ But what are the areas of cooperation between the Palestinian revolution and the revolutions in the world, especially in the context of military action? What is the philosophy of the Palestinian revolution defining the contexts and the policy of this cooperation?

Commander Abu Jihad says, "We, as a Palestinian revolution, have suffered a great deal from bitterness and torture. We as a Palestinian people who have borne many pains and hardships along the combative road are facing clear truth, which is that it is our duty to reduce the distance of torture and the road of pain for everyone battling for his rights. This is a conviction which has been born through our struggles and we have therefore announced our positions through every means in the Liberation Organization and the FATH movement. It has also been included in our political program, which was issued by the fourth conference of the Palestine National Liberation Movement (FATH), and it has also been included in numerous statements by the Palestine Liberation Organization and its national congresses, stressing the fact that the Palestinian organization and revolution stand alongside everyone who fights against occupation, alongside everyone who struggles for his rights, and alongside everyone who is oppressed, downtrodden or tortured. This position is a position in principle on the part of the Palestinian revolution, which stands in support of all fighting men. This has not been a slogan which is voiced--it is a fact embodied in our stand alongside all the combative and revolutionary movements in Asia and Africa." The commander Abu Jihad added, "If you come to our camps you will find revolutionaries there from all parts of the world; brother combatants are being trained in our camps and follow up on their combative missions after that."

The FATH Conference and the Main Issue

/Question/ What, however, is the effect of the resolutions of the recent Fourth FATH Conference in escalating military and fighting activity in the occupied territories?

The commander Abu Jihad replies, "The issue of escalating the Palestinian armed struggle and political struggle against our enemy was FATH's slogan at the fourth conference, and the main issue on which the Fourth FATH Conference laid emphasis, which was the summary of the resolutions, was to give priority to this issue and the escalation of the armed struggle within the occupied territories, escalating our struggle for the sake of attaining more victories. This was one of the basic points of emphasis and prominent landmarks at the meeting of the Fourth FATH Conference."

EASING OF U.S.-IRAN CRISIS HINTED

[Text] In spite of the continuing publication of various anti-American announcements, and anti-Iranian ones in the United States, it appears that the crisis between the Iranian and U.S. governments is lessening to an extent. From one direction U.S. officials, concerning the property looted by members of the Pahlavi family, have once again announced, but this time more precisely, that complaints can be brought to U.S. courts for the restitution of this property. Of course if a complaint were brought, the first action according to U.S. laws would be to freeze the property until the court's opinion was announced. From another direction, in the case of the Iranian demonstrators who were arrested in Washington, it was decided to remove them from the police prison and place them in the authority of immigration officials. Furthermore, any one of them having permission to reside in the U.S. were to be released immediately. Only those not having residence permits would be tried on that charge and not on the (first) charge of disturbing the peace and fighting with the police. Meanwhile, as a result of objections of Iranian students residing in the U.S. concerning police brutality against those arrested, it was decided to begin investigations in this connection.

At the same time during the past two weeks, a number of Iranians have received travel visas to the United States "for humanitarian reasons," the first time since the students' occupation of the former U.S. embassy in Tehran and the hostage-taking of its personnel. A number of others have been promised that their visa request will be examined in a favorable light. Lastly, it was said in the United States after the deposed Shah's death that his family will not be able to reside in the United States with the easiness of the past.

Certainly this is slight evidence for claiming that the Iran-U.S. crisis is about to end. However, if we add to it the recent letter of U.S. senators to the Islamic Consultative Assembly, the sale of $150 million of spare parts from western petroleum organizations, among them American, to Iran by way of England, and note besides that the tone of recent anti-

American declarations and statements by Iranian officials and the numerous centers of power in that country has become milder, then we can say that basic efforts are probably underway behind the scenes to resolve the crisis between the two countries. It certainly appears that this time the channels of communication have completely altered. Basically, the Americans who had until now based their hopes for creating better relations with Iran on secular leaders, have this time established some religious leaders as their direct correspondents.

BEHESHTI SEEN AS IRAN'S FUTURE LEADER

London AL-MAJALLAH in Arabic No 27, 16-22 Aug 80

[Article by Wafiq Ramadan: "Beheshti: 'Khomeyni's Alternate'"]

[Text] Next to Imam Khomeyni, everything in Iran revolves about Ayatollah Beheshti who, until a few months ago, was relatively unknown. Now, however, as the political picture in Iran is becoming clearer, Beheshti's name is heard everywhere. Political life from Qum to Tehran appears to revolve about him.

The political picture that is emerging after many months of confusion is as Beheshti has planned. He has managed to divide the country into two factions: the weak and the powerful. The powerless group--which was not so only a few months ago--has been reduced to its present impotent position as a result of Beheshti's shrewd and exceptionally brilliant political maneuvering and intellectual skill. Simultaneously, Beheshti's superior organizational ability has made the powerful group even stronger. The political battlefield is now wide open before this group and it is expected to tighten its grip on the country's political reins.

The weak faction consists mainly of those who had returned from exile to join the Islamic revolution. Imbued with liberal ideas, and laboring under the notion that loyalty to the revolution and Imam al-Khomeyni was all that was needed to insure the success of their cause, this group has been woefully disappointed. Heading the list of this faction are the President, Dr Abol Hasan Bani-Sadr, followed by the minister of foreign affairs, Mr Sadegh Qutbzadeh, his predecessor Dr Ibrahim Yazdi and others. The powerful group, on the other hand, is made up largely of the clergy, a group that will settle for nothing less than total control.

In today's Iran, Beheshti has become the only standard by which the political strength of all political figures is measured. His total control of everything in Iran is exercised principally through the various offices and positions he holds:

--He is the first secretary of the Revolutionary Council, which, until the new Majlis (parliament) was convened a few weeks ago, exercised both legislative and executive power.

--He is the head of the Islamic Republican Party, the party of the clergy, which boasts millions of members, and which controls parliament, a body more than 70 percent of whose members are party adherents. (Because parliamentary elections in certain parts of Iran have not been completed, parliament has only 236 members out of a total of 270. Of the 236 members, 120 are party members and 40 others are sympathetic supporters.)

--He heads the revolutionary (governmental) committees, which have replaced the police and the army, and which exericse de facto control throughout the country.

--He heads the Council of Experts, which supervises all legislation, and which was responsible for drafting Iran's new constitution.

Ayatollah Beheshti, 51 years old, is a tall man. His black religious garb tends to make him appear even taller. Unlike other clergymen, he is extremely careful about his appearance. His crisply pressed garb is tailored of the best material. His appearance is impressive, and his deep resonant voice is heard immediately the moment he alights from his dark green automobile among a group of heavily armed guards.

During Imam Khomeyni's last months of exile in Paris in the fall of 1978, his voice was heard through Beheshti, who acted as his coordinator, interpreter, chief organizer and executive. Beheshti's name was linked with a number of events associated with the fall of the shah's regime and the success of the Islamic revolution. His gradual rise in Iran's religious and political circles caused even the United States to take note of his power as evidenced by the indirect contacts made with him regarding the American hostages. Such contacts were initially made with President Bani-Sadr. These contacts, however, will be to no avail, particularly in view of Beheshti's more extreme position on the hostage issue as well as on relations with the United States in general. Beheshti's power has in fact grown in proportion to the decline in Bani-Sadr's influence and to his multiplying internal political difficulties. The Iranian President's immature, even childish, actions to regain Imam Khomeyni's support are a measure of his desparation to gain the upper hand in the struggle against Beheshti and to halt his rise to power.

From the moment he was elected president, Bani-Sadr has failed to assess properly Beheshti's religious and political clout. This lack of vision led him to declare prematurely upon his election that the Islamic Republican Party was finished and that, at any rate, it represented no more than 4 percent of Iran's electorate.

Bani-Sadr's declaration was the signal that the conflict between Beheshti and his supporters on the one hand, and Bani-Sadr and the handful of his friends who have returned with him from exile on the other has come into the open. The disparity in the relative strength of the opposing parties soon became evident. For while the Islamic Republican Party's newspaper,

THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC, began to accuse Bani-Sadr and his friends openly of deviation from the Islamic course, Bani-Sadr's paper, THE ISLAMIC REVOLUTION, failed to respond adequately or to go on the offensive. The journalistic battle continued in this fashion until Bani-Sadr, possessed by an illusion that he has "cornered" Beheshti, launched a campaign in which his party's paper accused Dr Hasan Ayat, head of Beheshti's Political Bureau, of plotting to overthrow Bani-Sadr. The campaign failed dismally. For, after all, what is the value of a tape recording in which Hasan Ayat's voice is heard inciting against Bani-Sadr in a political arena already reverberating with the din of clashing political armor in the best Iranian style? Bani-Sadr's unsuccessful campaign, however, provided Beheshti with an opportunity to call a press conference and to enhance his image further before foreign journalists.

Bani-Sadr's mortal error, the error that eroded his prestige and is bound to cost him his office in the near future, is that he failed to find a way to come to an understanding with Beheshti rather than confront him. For how could Beheshti and other clerics remain silent in the face of Bani-Sadr's last January's post-election announcement in which he vowed to impose restrictions on the political power of certain religious figures? Beheshti, of course, was the intended target of that announcement; nevertheless many members of the clergy found the announcement unacceptable. Had Bani-Sadr read the [new] constitution carefully, he would have realized that limiting the power of the clergy was impossible. On the contrary, they had the power to limit his own. They had in fact demonstrated that power earlier against nonreligious figures like Bani-Sadr and ultimately succeeded in removing them from positions of authority altogether.

Beheshti's wiliness and shrewd maneuvering trapped Bani-Sadr in the snare he was preparing for Beheshti. When the early results of the parliamentary elections began to show that Beheshti's party was winning, Bani-Sadr still harbored hopes of gaining the upper hand by appointing one of his supporters to the prime minister's office, one who would help him in confronting the predominantly Beheshti-controlled parliament. As Bani-Sadr sent name after name to parliament for approval to the prime minister's office, Beheshti's taunting response came back in the form of an insistence that not only the prime ministry, but the important ministries as well as the presidency of parliament must go to his majority party. The danger of becoming a puppet in Beheshti's hands, a fear that had constantly haunted Bani-Sadr, suddenly became real. He began to see the presidency of Iran as a decorative office, one whose responsibilities would be limited to presiding over the opening of flower shows. This spectre drove Bani-Sadr to despair. In a last-ditch--and, of course, hypocritical--effort to save the situation, he proposed to Imam Khomeyni to appoint his son, Hojjat Oleslam Ahmad Khomeyni, to the prime minister's office. Not only did Khomeyni reject the suggestion publicly, but he ruled out any of his relatives for public office. Following this development, Bani-Sadr announced that Mustafa Mir Salim would be the future prime minister. But this candidate was also turned down by the Beheshti-controlled religious majority in parliament. This is the situation today, but there will be no progress until Bani-Sadr nominates to the office a candidate acceptable to Beheshti.

Beheshti, however, is not easy to satisfy. He will settle for nothing less than the total islamization of all facets of life in Iran. His obsession with this objective is behind the recent dismissal of leftist university professors and students. Beheshti's "purification" campaign extends to anyone not totally committed to comprehensive islamization. The possibility that a few innocent people may fall victims will not deter Beheshti. Not only does he wield the reins of political authority through his majority in parliament and his control of the Revolutionary Council and the Republican Islamic Party, he has strong relations with Khomeyni as well. Furthermore, he exercises immense military power through the Revolutionary Committees and the Revolutionary Guard and enjoys the absolute support of the clergy in Qum and Tehran. His weekly press conference has made him a star of the international press. The Iranian newspapers quote his remarks and publish his pictures daily. His knowledge of both English and German enhance his image in the foreign press, which he knows how to handle. (He learned German while heading the Islamic Center in Hamburg from 1962-68.)

It is evident that nothing in Iran can stop Beheshti. When Imam Khomeyni dies, Beheshti will inherit the mantle of the "Supreme Religious Leader" (the de facto head of government of the Islamic Republic of Iran). Beheshti satisfies all the constitutional criteria to lead the nation and to insure that all governmental agencies and institutions will remain true to their Islamic responsibilities.

Beheshti exploits every political development, external or internal, to further weaken the secular [nonreligious] faction. The most dramatic example of this is his success in directing the anger of the Iranian populace against any leader advocating a moderate position in regard to the hostage question. Included in this list are Bani-Sadr and Qutbzadeh, and, before them, Mahdi Bazarghan and Ibrahim Yazdi. Beheshti has succeeded brilliantly in keeping the hostage issue "hot," one not admitting of easy solutions and not without conditions.

Even as Beheshti scrambles to wrest all political power in Iran, he continues to enjoy the complete confidence of Imam Khomeyni. He is the imam's special adviser and spends many hours with him every day. No one else enjoys this privilege. At the same time, Beheshti is said to have given Imam Khomeyni a few anxious days. It is believed that the heart ailment which afflicted Khomeyni a few months ago, and from which he recovered totally, was triggered by a letter from Hojjat Oleslam 'Ali Tahrani, a confidante of Khomeyni, accusing Beheshti of being behind the attempt to assassinate General Vally-Ollah Qarani and Hojjat Oleslam Mohammad Mofti. The letter is said to have absolved Forqan [an extremist group] of the assassination attempts as previously announced.

Beheshti is the kind of person who does not bend easily. His persistence was demonstrated in a pre-presidential election meeting with al-Khomeyni in which he spent 6 hours trying to convince the imam to support the candidacy of Jalaleddin Farsi. The attempt was to no avail. Farsi later withdrew from the race when it was revealed that he was partly Afghan and not 100 percent of Iranian stock as the constitution stipulates.

Beheshti is back again pushing Farsi for the office of prime minister. Bani-Sadr is opposed to this candidate precisely because of Beheshti's support for him. The confrontation between these two thus continues, and more fireworks are in the offing.

Beheshti is not a latter-day supporter of the Islamic revolution. He played a crucial role during the 12 months preceding the fall of the shah and the subsequent creation of the Islamic Republic of Iran. His efforts on behalf of the revolution have raised his political stock immensely and made him a powerful force to be reckoned with in Iran's political game.

Beheshti's maneuvers against the Bakhtiar government on the eve of the shah's fall are responsible for its fragmentation and for demoralizing Bakhtiar himself. Beheshti is said to have sent Bakhtiar a letter containing two items: the text of Bakhtiar's own resignation, and an announcement that he [Bakhtiar] would be leaving for Paris, to see the Imam al-Khomeyni at his residence in Neauphile-le-Château. (The letter was carried by Amir 'Abbas Intizam, then a spokesman for the government, and later imprisoned upon the discovery of documents in the U.S. Embassy linking him with some of its employees.) Beheshti's letter struck Bakhtiar like a thunderbolt. He announced his readiness to go see al-Khomeyni but declined to resign beforehand. Beheshti rejected Bakhtiar's offer and so did al-Khomeyni at Beheshti's urging. When Bakhtiar announced that he was ready to meet with al-Khomeyni, the latter announced that he would not see him. Bakhtiar's government soon collapsed without Bakhtiar's resignation or a meeting with Khomeyni.

SIGNIFICANT POLITICAL ISSUES DISCUSSED BY BEHESHTI

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 7 Aug 80 p 18

[Text] Ayatollah Dr Beheshti, Chief Justice of the National Supreme Court, spoke at a press conference yesterday morning, answering the questions of local and foreign reporters. He disclosed a planned propaganda plot and said cncerning this matter:

The problem is that according to information I have received, Imperialism and world Zionism have been putting all their energy during the past year and a half into destroying the clergy's image, especially those persons who have a firm and proper standing among the people, and they have tried to dissolve the trusting relationship between the people and the clergy. The revolution's detractors abroad also benefit from the cooperation and agreement of groups and individuals within the country, and moreover they are not without the cooperation of some counterrevolutionaries who live abroad. It is thus clear that this plan is for all the confederates and sworn supporters of the former regime both within and outside the country, to help them carry out this plot. Since this group will resort to any method or lie to further its aims, when it senses that the solidarity between the people and committed and responsible clerics is stronger and more deeply rooted than with the perpetrators of these plots, it immediately seeks to launch a propaganda campaign against them.

On the basis of information I have received recently, they are preparing a propaganda campaign both domestically and abroad, using altered tapes and retouched photographs. Therefore, people who feel that they will be taken out of the picture because of these persistent activities will also participate in the plot.

I have a number of their names, which I will not disclose now pending positive verification, but if these people want to waste our dear country's precious time and energy on these troublemakers and this psychological and propaganda warfare, I will expose all of them by announcing their names and characteristics. Doctor Beheshti then added:

I am warning them at this press conference to desist from their plotting, for the smoke of the fires they are fanning will end up in their own eyes.

Our nation will not leave them at peace, for some of them are people who have come to Iran after the revolution who lived abroad comfortably throughout those years. I say to them that our people have sufficient data at hand to identify them thoroughly, and if any new information concerning these plots becomes available we will turn it over to the people.

Reason for Releasing the Students

A reporter noted that American immigration authorities had announced the release of the students because they had given their names to that administration, and asked him if he thought this was the real reason for their release.

Actually, activities like this pose two dangers for America. One is that there will be a reflexive continuation of these heroic confrontations in American society, especially American Moslem society, which cannot benefit America. We can say that this episode was an epic song these young people sang in their relationship with Islam.

The second is that they wanted to end the disturbance as quickly as possible.

Helping Lebanese Shi'ites

Another reporter asked:

Now that the well being of the Lebanese Shi'ites is being threatened by the Iraqi Government, what sort of help can the Iranian Government offer at this stage of its development?

It is natural that they should receive political, social, and material assistance, for this is an Islamic duty. Any number of difficulties of various kinds will develop for us unless we give them substantial aid.

The Fate of the Pilgrimage

A question was asked as to whether Saddam Hossein's talks with the King of Saudi Arabia would adversely affect the Iranian pilgrimage to Mecca.

Beheshti answered:

I do not forsee such a thing happening.

The Madani Question

Another reporter asked:

What do you see concerning the fate of the case of Mr Madani, after the rejection of his credentials and the documents that have come to hand concerning him?

Beheshti answered:

This matter would be more under the jurisdiction of the Revolutionary Court, and Mr Qoddusi would be better able to express an opinion.

Differing Criteria

The question was asked: You have talked about differing criteria in your own speeches and you have mentioned that the Islamic Republican Party's criteria for choosing a prime minister differ from those of the President of the Republic. Could you possibly explain these differences?

Beheshti said: On the contrary, I stressed in that speech that after long discussions we came to the conclusion that we have no differences of criteria, and moreover these criteria were also written into the agreement of unity that was concluded between us and signed by those present. It is possible, however, that differences arose in recognizing these criteria, for example, concerning the person we have in mind, that Mr Bani Sadr might not consider him to be in accordance with these criteria, and/or vice versa.

It was said: Could you say that these standards are what you have stressed?

Beheshti answered:

These standards are the same ones that have appeared in party statements, as well as in the newspaper JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI, and our standards are the same ones the Imam has stressed.

Spy Trials

The question was asked: The Supreme Judicial Council will have responsibility for trying the American spies. Will the behavior of the American police towards our students have any effect on their trial?

Beheshti answered: You know that this issue cannot be allowed to influence the domain of justice. It is in a realm outside the issue of justice. In the realm of justice we cannot punish someone for another more serious crime.

The Jerusalem Question

The question was asked: Do you, as a policy making individual, have a plan for recovering Jerusalem?

Beheshti answered: This is an objective towards which we will have to struggle for a long time. In my view, one of the things we can do to realize this objective is to spread the Islamic Revolution throughout the Islamic world. At the same time, close cooperation between Iran and the Palestinian fighters can also be considered a very effective way to attain this goal.

Personal Conflicts

A reporter asked: Mr Bani Sadr said last week that personal conflicts are hurting the Islamic Republic. What did he mean by this?

Doctor Beheshti answered:

I did not ask him about this particular remark, but he was asked about all the issues he discussed and they told him that his view was pessimistic and reminded him that this kind of talk will create an atmosphere of ambiguity and misgiving among the people.

His answer to our friends was: I was not referring to you, because we are friends, and if we have differences we can resolve them through discussion.

The question was asked: Is the matter of the disappearance of Imam Musa Sadr still being pursued or not?

Doctor Beheshti said: There is no doubt that the issue of Imam Musa Sadr is important to us, whether from the standpoint of religion, politics, or emotion. This matter will remain alive and important for us, and we will seriously pursue the possibilities of the issues.

How much information have you obtained in connection with this?

We have not obtained any information that could be called significant.

Another reporter asked:

What new steps have been taken by the Supreme Judiciary Council?

The answer was given: We have had no new basic tasks. The tasks are outlined in previous statements.

Foreign Reporters

Foreign reporters also took part in this press conference. The answers to their questions appear below.

One foreign reporter asked about the clergy's relationship to the exercise of power within the country.

A: The relationship between the country's system and the clergy is shown in the relationship between Islam and the government.

Iran is an Islamic country. A clergyman's role in the system to a certain extent resembles the role of an ideologue (theorizer) in an ideological system. I don't think this is anything like an ecclesiastical system.

Q: Don't several of the people in the Majles patronize your party?

A: The number of party members in the Majles is around 70. Those who think along party lines, however, number perhaps 130. Therefore there is harmony between the party and the Majles.

Concerning the President of the Republic

Q: What do you think of the President of the Republic?

A: Our belief is that the President of the Republic must be strengthened to enable him to carry out his responsibilities.

Sometimes, however, this matter depends on following a line of harmony and like thinking, so that points of view in the country's administration can be perceived. Through this kind of mutual understanding we can create conditions that will be very useful for cooperation. We have tried and made efforts to create these conditions, and we have succeeded to a certain extent, but not entirely.

Q: Do you have a consensus of opinion on the prime minister?

A: Yes, we have exchanged views at our weekly meeting, and we hope to make an announcement concerning the prime minister within two days.

Anti-American Feelings

Another reporter asked:

Anti-American feelings in Iran are now pervasive and intense. Do you think these feelings will continue a long time?

A: As long as the American Government does not change its position, these feelings will continue a long time.

Q: Apparently the Americans want to meet some of the Iranian demands, such as releasing impounded funds, in order to free the hostages. Will this be useful?

A: We must see what the Majles will say about this. At the moment the Majles is involved with more important matters, such as choosing a prime minister and a cabinet. After that, it is possible that the Majles will take steps to discuss this matter.

Another reporter, concerning the same matter, importunately asked:

You have a lot of influence. In your view, if the American Government wants to meet some of the Iranian demands, will this result in the release of the hostages?

A: This matter depends on the decision of the Majles. All the issues will be discussed and deliberated in the Majles. It is not for us to say it will go this way or that way. The Majles representatives will study every aspect of ways to solve this problem.

Another foreign reporter asked about differences of opinion with Mr Bani Sadr, and Mr Beheshti answered:

The differences between myself and Mr Bani Sadr should not be regarded as differences between two individuals, but as differences between the thinking of the Islamic Republican Party and the thinking of the President of the Republic and a great many others in society. It is natural that all people in society think a certain way. They do not think alike.

One foreign reporter asked about Iran's economic difficulties. In answering, Dr Beheshti said:

We must study the Iranian economy as much as possible, for we do not want to follow the former economic path. We must lay down new plans based on new premises, and this is not easy. No matter how difficult it may be, however, there is nothing to prevent us from starting.

Throughout the past year we have sought to identify areas of difficulty in the economy, and we now have a better understanding of these problems. I hope we will solve the problems in the near future.

Some of the foreign reporters again asked about the prime minister and the cabinet ministers. Dr Beheshti answered: We have issued a statement, and I have said several times in interviews and speeches that the party has no difficulty in this matter. The most important point is that the prime minister and the ministers must be selected on the basis of Islamic criteria, they must be believing Moslems, revolutionary, active and decisive. They must be able to work as a group and get along with other members of the cabinet.

Q: Do you have anyone in particular in mind?

A: The Islamic Party has mentioned several people. I have nothing new to say. We do not mean, however, that the prime minister will definitely be one of these people. Anyone who has sound Islamic standards is acceptable for us. We only require that values and standards be upheld. Determining this is the responsibility of the Majles, not the party and not the President of the Republic.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS DISCUSSED BY DR BEHESHTI

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 14 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] Ayatollah Dr Beheshti, Chief Justice of the National Supreme Court, answered various questions yesterday from foreign and local reporters at a television and radio press conference.

In answer to a question regarding the existence of a plot, he said: We have received sufficient information concerning this plot. Those who should follow up on this information are doing so, in order to develop very clear conclusions. I am not at liberty to give any more details.

Priority Tasks

Concerning priority tasks in the Majles, Ayatollah Beheshti said: The basic task consists of extensive and effective efforts to increase the spiritual and moral content of the revolution, not merely with talk and writing, but through the use of practical and constructive methods. The second thing is to establish legal and social security. It is natural that the greater part of this responsibility is ours, and we are making efforts, but the military and law enforcement agencies, the radio and television media and other organs also have an effective role to play in this area. Thirdly, we are trying to get the economy on its feet and make it active, especially in the area of production and just distribution of wealth and necessities of life within the Islamic Republic of Iran, and to develop a decisive foreign policy, as well as to rapidly and decisively pursue a cultural revolution.

Establishing an Atmosphere of Mutual Understanding

A reporter asked him, what was discussed when you were with the Imam yesterday? He said: The Imam recommended that efforts be made by all officials in the country to create an atmosphere of peace and mutual understanding, stressing that the future government of Mr Raja'i should be established with the help of God on the basis of genuine Islamic standards and principles.

The Imam stressed: Every official in the country must try to bring about a greater atmosphere of mutual understanding and cooperation than we have had until now, and to stop every process that damages mutual understanding and cooperation between officials. He stressed that the officials themselves must be very careful in their interviews, and avoid saying things that could be misused by groups and elements with bad intentions. They must be cautious with their words and deeds. He also ordered that the newspapers must always write to encourage the people, not with false hopes, but with hopes that are real. They must report the positive accomplishments and activities of the revolution, the Majles of the President of the Republic, the government, and the different units, to the people. If they find some small discrepancy and exaggerate it, naturally the people will become anxious. He stressed that they must eliminate this distrubing atmosphere that creates needless apprehension.

The question was asked: It appears that Mr Bani Sadr does not have confidence in the activities of Mr Raja'i. What is your view?

I know Mr Raja'i to be a brother with faith, who is hard working, with outstanding moral principles and an outstanding revolutionary background. I think such a prime minister, more than anyone else, is capable of attracting genuine revolutionary forces and that he and the revolutionary forces will be highly efficient together. I pray that God will grant them success. Although Mr Raja'i is not a member of the Islamic Republican Party, he is one of our long time companions, coworkers and peers. I have known him for 17 years. Generally I see that there are two schools of thought concerning his recent service in the field of education and training. Some speak very highly of his work, and there are also those who criticize him. The truth is, I have not yet had an opportunity to collect the facts and evaluate this carefully to see which of these views is correct. Are his critics correct, his supporters, or actually both of them? In some respects his work was very good, and at times it was also open to criticism. In any case, the evaluation should be reopened. I can say that I am very optimistic about the future of this dear brother's work. God willing, the government chosen by the Majles will be a pious people's government, with faith in the character of the people, especially since he has stressed that his ministers will be chosen from groups crystallized by the Islamic revolution. I hope to see shining and successful programs and achievements during the period of his prime ministership.

Meetings of Saddam and Zia'olhaqq

Concerning Saddam Hossein and Zia'olhaqq's meetings with the King of Saudi Arabia, Doctor Beheshti said: The triumphant Islamic revolution of the Iranian nation has agitated and disturbed officials and temporal rulers who do not govern their people on the basis of Islam. Furthermore, the world devouring aggressor America is left with nothing to do in the area.

Enjoining Good and Prohibiting Evil

A reporter asked: Are there organizations in existence to carry out the (Koranic) injunction to enjoin what is good and prohibit waht is evil? The Chief Justice of the National Supreme Court said:

The matter of enjoining good and prohibiting evil has different aspects. One side of it pertains to the common people, another aspect of it concerns radio, television, and the press, another aspect of it concerns education, training, and higher education. Another dimension of it concerns national guidance, culture, and art, and an important part of that is the responsibility of the clergy, which is working freely in this area, and part of it is also the responsibility of the judicial branch. In having these two separate branches it was foreseen that each of these two powers would be responsible for one part of the task of enjoining good and prohibiting evil. One is monitoring the entire country, and one is the court of justice, and actually these two branches are each responsible for a part of enjoining the good and prohibiting evil.

Concerning the consolidation of the courts, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court said:

Even now the revolutionary courts are under the jurisdiction of the judicial branch, and they work under the supervision of the Supreme Judicial Council. Furthermore, for that matter the constitution has now been put into effect. As soon as the Supreme Judicial Council was formed the constitution was put into effect.

These days there is not a single court outside the control of the Supreme Judiciary Council. Every decision is subject to confirmation, rejection, and explanation, and the Supreme Judicial Council, which is responsible for Judiciary matters, carried out these things.

Student Demonstrations

Concerning demonstrations by Iranian students abroad, he said: On the basis of the absence of capitulation everywhere in the world, the courts there cannot do anything. This is a responsibility of our Foreign Ministry, which must be the protector of the rights of our citizens outside the country. If the courts are unable to do anything, it will act on its responsibility.

It is the job of the courts to give the necessary explanations to the Foreign Ministry.

Buying Wheat

In the matter of buying wheat, Doctor Beheshti said: According to the agreements we have made, we will not refuse this wheat, because we cannot be sure of our grain supplies during the next year.

Securing Employment

Concerning the issue of securing employment for young people who are unemployed or retired as a result of purges, Doctor Beheshti said:

There is no disputing the fact that work in harmony with the revolution must be created for those who are unemployed because of purges. The process of creating employment, however, will not be confined to forced labor camps. Fortunately, we live in a time when solutions are more numerous. Initially we must try to guide them towards suitable work by making use of their personal initiative. Naturally, if these methods are not effective or cannot be used, we must not rule out the possibility of setting up forced labor camps.

The Minister of Justice

Concerning the nomination of someone as minister of justice, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court said:

According to the constitution, this matter is in the hands of the Supreme Judicial Council, and the Supreme Judicial Council can even nominate two or three people. Then Mr Raja'i can select one of them as minister of justice in his cabinet. We will do this at the first session of the Supreme Judicial Council. We have some people in mind, but we have not as yet made a definite decision, because we wanted to see what the makeup of the Prime Minister's cabinet would be in order to be able to account for the necessary compatibilities.

Agitation and Chanting

A reporter asked about the agitation and chanting that had taken place at some talks. Doctor Beheshti said: There is no doubt that all responsible brothers must strive to prevent these abuses. This is not difficult to do, and they must not even be given an opening. We will succeed, just as I myself have always employed this method in all my speeches. Fortunately, I see that though the speech may be attended by a large crowd, there have been no such abuses, neither during the talk, not so far as I have heard, afterwards. I recommend this method that I have been able to employ to all brothers.

Confiscation of Land

Concerning the confiscation of land, he said:

Two tasks must be carried out simultaneously and in a parallel direction, in order to be truly effective. One is to write a law for implementing article 46 of the constitution. This article states: Persons who acquire wealth by selling dead lands, substandard constructions, by charging interest, by making profits on public property and other such methods must have this wealth confiscated by legal means.

We must act quickly to implement this article. Of course the major part of this task is the responsibility of the executive offices of the judicial branch, and we are also trying to empower the judicial branch to pursue this matter, to prepare the necessary laws, and submit them for legislative approval.

[Text] Dr Shakeri, a distinguished member of the National Democratic Front and a major opponent of the Shah's regime, during a press interview in London called for the union of all moderate and leftist democrats in Iran in order to overthrow the fanatic, pitiless religious regime of Ayatollah Khomeyni and to establish a democratic, multi-party republic.

Radio BBC said in this connection that it is totally clear that efforts are underway to revive the policy of the era of Dr Mosaddeq, meaning a government largely composed of secular persons and having a social-democratic policy. Dr Shakeri belongs to a front that has been founded recently. This front is hopeful that it can find supporters among the ranks of the National Front, the Mojahedin-e Khalq and Feda'i-ye Khalq guerilla organizations and other minorities.

What is noteworthy is that Dr Shakeri is utterly opposed to military intervention in Iran from abroad, and says that such an action would have grave consequences for Iran since such interference would doubtless lead to a civil war. Within the framework of this belief Dr Shakeri harshly criticized Shapur Bakhtiar, and said that Bakhtiar is in contact with Zionist supporters and General Oveysi. In the BBC's view, considering all the disputes between the groups opposed to the Islamic Republic, whether in Iran or abroad, there is small probability that a moderate, secular and democratic regime will replace the Islamic Republic in the near future. However, if it is said that the Islamic Republican control is lying in wait to exert influence throughout the country and alienate all other political groups from itself, it must also be said that at present it appears that the formation of a union of moderates and leftists could possibly attract the attention and support of the people.

In the past several weeks contacts have been made for a union of all moderate and progressive forces. Meetings in this connection were held outside Iran. These groups which were strongly opposed to the dictatorial Pahlavi regime and which played an extremely important role in its overthrow now desire the creation of a democratic regime in Iran without having opponents connected with the former regime, whether Oveysi's, Bakhtiar's or Nahavandi's, play any role in it.

RAJA'I'S CANDIDACY APPROVED AS PREMIER BY PARLIAMENT

Statements Made by New Premier

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 12 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Mohammad 'Ali Raja'i, the new prime minister, told reporters last night: Since friends wish to know me better, I will introduce myself in three sentences: I am a follower of the Imam, a son of the Majles, and a brother of the President of the Republic.

I am a follower of the Imam, and this is one of the pure qualities of the members of our cabinet, and we hope that these pure qualities will be able to establish a flow between the people, the executive organizations, and the revolutionary structures.

I am a son of the Majles for the Imam, because I never made any attempt to become prime minister, so that the Majles presented me as prime minister because of its encounters with me and its previous acquaintance with me. In this respect I regard myself as a son of the Majles, meaning I am actually a son of the people, because the Majles, in its most secluded lawmaking sessions, benefits from the decisive counsel of the people. In the kindness that my colleagues have shown in the course of all this I have benefited from very decisive counsel.

I am a brother of the President of the Republic inasmuch as we both have responsibilities and we hope to be the elected representatives of the people in the service of the people, and we hope our brotherhood will become closer every day. We will expend all our efforts in the service of the people and in alleviating their difficulties.

Concerning the government's program, Raja'i said: We have no specific program now whose aspects can be presented, except the belief of the people of Iran who made a revolution, shed blood, and delivered the nation and this country from the clutches of this regime. I hope to submit this nation, with its wealth, to the revolutionary people who shed blood at the crossroads of origin in Tehran and various other places. We believe they are the most worthy persons to administer the nation. We will prepare a program and submit it to the respected representatives of the Majles.

Concerning future ministers, the Prime Minister said: We will make use of all revolutionary structures, both their own people and their knowledge, and God willing we will introduce a cabinet that follows the line of the people and is with the people themselves.

Speech of Palestine Envoy at Parliament

[Text] Yesterday the Islamic Consultative Assembly, having been introduced to the Prime Minister by the President of the Republic, gave him a vote of confidence. At this session, which convened at 11:30 presided over by Hojjatoleslam Hashemi Rafsanjani, a vote of confidence was given to 'Ali Raja'i as Prime Minister, who had been introduced in a letter from the President of the Republic, in a secret balloting. With all 196 ballots counted there were 153 votes for, 24 votes against, and 19 absentions.

Participants in the Jerusalem Liberation Congress visited the open session. After their arrival Hojjatoleslam Hashemi Rafsanjani said during an address: On behalf of all the representatives of the Consultative Assembly, we extend a welcome to the brothers and sisters of the freedom movement of the Islamic sector to the presence of the Imam and especially to the Majles. On behalf of our brothers we announce that this Majles, which is the protector of the Moslem people of Iran, having taken the name Islamic Council, counts you foreign brothers and sisters among its own people.

He added: When the Imam proclaims one of the days of the blessed month of Ramazan "Jerusalem Day," this is the best indication of the protection by the people of Iran for the freedom movements of the Islamic sectors of the world.

Then a representative of free Eritrea, on behalf of participants in the Jerusalem Conference said during his talk and after praising the Imam of the nation, the oppressed people of the world, and representatives of the Islamic Consultative Assembly: The participating representative groups, in honor of the second anniversary of world Jerusalem day, observed the near readiness of the Iranian Moslem nation concerning Palestinian liberation and the participation of all sides in observing friday as Jerusalem day. This confirms for us that even our enemy's prime minister in occupied Palestine, who called the Iranian moslem nation an earthquake, is correct. The liberation of Jerusalem in the beginning of a day of transforming this earthquake to a volcanic eruption in the face of Zionism.

After that Hojjatoleslam Montazeri delivered a report to the Majles on the activities of the Jerusalem Liberation Congress and said: According to the order of Imam Khomeyni, who has declared world Jerusalem Day a day when the oppressed will stand up to the oppressors, we call this an honorable day.

Then Hani al-Hassan, representative of the Palestine Liberation Organization, during a speech, said that the Islamic Republic's recent announcement about freeing Jerusalem and occupied Palestine was cheering news for all Moslems of the world, especially Palestinian Moslems. The Palestinians were the happiest people, for we know that in the end it is the Islamic nation that must free Palestine.

In another part of his speech he said: The Palestinian people are a believing people, for a people who exist in the Masjedolaqsa (a mosque in Jerusalem) and in the Christian churches cannot fail to be a believing people. We are expecting you to come and participate with us in the liberation of Palestine, and when you participate directly in the war with the enemy, you will be able to implant your Islamic ideas there.

In conclusion he said: In the name of all the oppressed people of the world we wish you a happy Jerusalem Day, and in the name of the Moslem nation of Palestine we thank the Iranian people and Imam Khomeyni on the occasion of the declaration of Jerusalem Day and the extensive cooperation on this day.

At this session the committee to study the qualifications of the prime minister presented its report to the Majles. Initially Hojjatoleslam Yazdi reported the study committee's candidates for the prime ministership and the committee's consultation with the President, and he said this committee finally agreed on Mr Raja'i.

Hojjatoleslam Yazdi added: At the end we came to the conclusion that we should hold a meeting with Mr Bani Sadr and Mr Raja'i and investigate the matter thoroughly.

COUNTERREVOLUTIONARY ACTIVITIES BRING SECURITY MEASURES

Army on Guard Against Coups

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 17 Jul 80 p 12

[Excerpt] Gen Zahirnezhad, commander of the ground forces and supervisor of the National General Gendarmerie, described his views on other matters related to the army of the Islamic Republic of Iran in an exclusive interview with KEYHAN's political correspondent, while describing the army's countermeasures against attacks by the hireling army of Iraq on our country's border towns.

In response to a question on why the army of the Islamic Republic of Iran was not responding to these attacks, in view of the increase in Iraqi army attacks on our country's border towns, he said, "In this regard first I must inform my beloved compatriots that the Iraqi army has not yet carried out an attack which could constitute a military aggression inside the borders of our country. The Iraqi army attacks have so far taken the form of fire attacks which have been made by airplane and artillery, and thus the response to these attacks has also been given to Iraqi army installations and bases. In an attack some days ago, Iraq was drawn into fire in a counterattack on Iraq's border post. As has been announced numerous times, the Islamic revolution of Iran does not aim at territorial expansion, since, if it did, the revolution would lose its value. Secondly, we are at the present time occupied with the tyrannical imperialist countries of the world, and the people of Iran have driven them out and will drive them out with their will and their bare hands, by resorting to appeals to the creator alone. People who make attacks on this revolution in the form of powers outside other borders are without doubt or hesitation servants of these demonic international imperialist forces. These governments do not have a base among Islamic peoples, in particular the Islamic people of Iraq. We cannot fire on the homes and lives of a number of Moslem brothers in Iraq because of an attack by Saddam Husayn and some of his mercenaries against our country. We are trying to subject that place to attack by fire where the Moslem people of Iraq are not present. The order has been given that henceforth we are to respond to any Iraqi fire against our installations, though perhaps at much greater volume. It is clear that the goal of the army of Iraq in these attacks is nothing but to help its masters to dominate the lives, property and honor of a Moslem people and continue the dishonorable life of Saddam Husayn and the hireling regime of the Ba'th of Iraq, since it is not possible for a nation to establish tyranny of repression in one part of its border while a group of Moslem people are without knowledge, under the domination of satans, in another group.

"The Islamic revolution, if, God willing, it is realized in Iran, as it will be, will assuredly leave no room for Saddam Husayns."

The commander of the ground forces then referred to the conditions and role of leadership in the triumph of the revolution and to the conspiracy of the counterrevolution, especially American imperialism, to crush our Islamic revolution, and said, "In my opinion, the leader must possess three basic attributes in addition to the other attributes of leadership. First, the leader himself must present himself to the people as a model of opposition to the ruling apparatus, and the people must believe that this is a model of an element which is less frequently found in those opposed to him--otherwise, how could Bakhtiar and the likes of him, who have bowed down before this regime and sworn loyalty to it hundreds of time, not have become the leaders of the people, or those people who beat their breasts with the stone of the former constitution? The second condition is that the leader be the object of trust. The people must make the leader the object of their trust from the time they start to follow him, and this person must be the object of the people's support. If 36 million people do not have trust, they will not give up 70,000 victims. Who now can claim that he is the object of the people's trust to the degree Emam Khomeyni is? The third part of the condition of leadership is possession of material resources. Through a simple review of the history of the world's revolutions, you can see that every revolution which has taken place has been produced from some large financial source. Of course, many countries have held coups d'etat and have called them revolutions, but the material resources of the Iranian revolution were provided by the funds of the pure emams. Of course, this is my opinion, and perhaps many people will not be pleased by it, but the people of Iran, in accordance with their religious beliefs, under the supervision of Emam Khomeyni, spent their charitable alms on religious affairs; they put these funds to use eliminating the material needs of the revolution, and this is the only determining aspect of the Iranian revolution which distinguishes it from the other revolutions of the world--98 percent of which received material support from others." At that point, Gen Zahirnezhad referred to counterrevolution's role and the conspiracy of the superpowers, in cooperation with their domestic personnel, to weaken the revolution, and said, "In order to attain a new government, we have passed through some stages in which all the people were joined and coordinated on behalf of the goals of the revolution.

However, in the meantime, a number of people followed in the path of the revolution until the revolution triumphed, and then, following the course of completion of the revolution, disappeared for various reasons. In other words, they had no part of the revolution. From the ideological standpoint this did not create a problem for the revolution, but a group disappeared from the course of the revolution and stood against this revolution, and we can give them no name except counterrevolution. For example, people who stand against elections on election day and set fire to ballot boxes or disturb them, or try through armed uprisings to cause the Islamic revolution to deteriorate--who now will remove these people from the course of the revolution? Britain or America? No, the force of the revolution must remove them, the force of which the army of the Islamic Republic of Iran, the gendarmerie and the other legal armed forces are a part as well. When such a situation arises, all revolutionary forces and the army are obliged to remove the stone from the path of the people's revolutionary movement and, if they do not do so, they in fact will have betrayed the revolution and wasted the blood of 70,000 Iranian martyrs. Therefore the person who tells the army to go to the border must realize that the borders are here--the borders between the counterrevolutionary and the revolutionary. For this reason, we consider any obstacle before the movement of the revolution to be a counterrevolutionary obstacle, in accordance with the law, and we consider that striking down its agent, in this period particularly, is one of the lawful duties of all revolutionary forces." He then continued:" The counterrevolutionary movement by domestic enemies emerges in its hireling form at a time when the enemy's foreign forces are also protecting them. You can see the protection of the enemy's foreign forces in the faces of each individual opponent of the revolution. Ask them where these counterrevolutionary forces have obtained all these weapons, arms whose sale and purchase are entirely in the control of governments and whose trade is not permitted. Who is it who has been able in a short time to import 50,000 Kalashnikov automatic weapons into Iran? What superpower is it which has given these weapons to the counterrevolution, has provided its wages and has even defined its objective, whose goal is me and you? The Kurdish, Turkoman, Baluch or Turkish brother who has been deceived and once he gets his hands on a trigger and shoots off 30 rounds with a Kalashnikov, see where he gets his money from. The shell which is bought and sold in Kordestan for 20 tomans each, or the announcements which are published at least three or four times a week throughout the country in colored offset print--who provides these enormous expenses? Is it not truethat these weapons and materials are placed at the disposal of the counterrevolution by America, Israel or the other superpowers?"

Arms Smuggling

In our continuing discussions with people's representatives regarding recurring problems in their electoral precincts and the provision of appropriate solutions to alleviate the problems, we sat down for a conversation this time with Seyyed Mohammad Kazem Danesh, representative of Shush and Andimeshk. In part of his statement, describing the problems of the area, he said that counterrevolutionary agents are bringing equipment and arms into Iran from Iraq via the border at Shush.

At the start of his statements, Danesh said "Regarding problems in the electoral precincts, I consider it better to describe each one separately. It seems that all of Iran has been destroyed through the blessings of the phoney Pahlavi 'great civilization,' but around Shush, which is one of my electoral areas, some of which is also considered a border area, the problems are many times greater than in the town of Shush. There there are tribes and rural inhabitants who have a special affection for and interest in the emam and the problems which I am raising are the problems of this group of tribes. Their biggest need is potable water, which they lack. There the situation is such that women are sometimes forced to walk more than half a kilometer to fetch water. Of course since last year we have been sending that group a water tank truck so that it can provide some of its daily drinking water but this problem has not been wholly eliminated. In some areas deep wells have also been drilled, the drilling of some wells is also continuing, and, God willing, we hope that we will be able to exploit them as soon as possible. Other problems are the lack of highways, electricity, schools and so forth. As regards the schools, I must state that there is perhaps one school for 30 or 40 villages and again in some areas they even lack a teacher. The town of Shush itself is also faced with many problems and inadequacies, among the most important of which is the lack of a modern adequate communications system. In this town the Department of Communications just consists of two broken down rooms and a branch of communications lines, and this branch of lines is the only means of telephone communication with Andimeshk. Again, in some areas it is cut off. This problem must be eliminated as soon as possible by official parties and through the cooperation of the people, who certainly will cooperate. Of course, on account of the vastness of the area from the standpoint of agriculture and religious pilgrimages, and the fact that it is on the border, this problem possesses great importance. In addition, there are counterrevolutionary persons there and links between those persons and Iraq, and they import weapons and equipment into this town through various means and explosions have also taken place recently. The importance of this matter from the standpoint of communications equipment, especially communications, is apparent. For about 6 years the people of Shush have been trying to have a municipal and inter-city communications system established in this town but so far, since I have been here, no results have been yet realized through these efforts. Of course promises were made in the early part of the revolution and steps were also taken but unfortunately they have not been followed up on. In the Andimeshk area, which is another electoral district of ours, there are also problems in the same general area, some of which are connected to departments and are connected with the question of the purge in the Andimeshk railway. Recently a committee came in for the purge and unfortunately, instead of liquidating unfit elements, we witnessed the liquidation of good, fit people, which in itself caused problems and discontentment. In another area, the situation in the municipality is not an object of the people's contentment. Likewise the condition of the streets--in particular the fact that the town of Andimeshk has been broken up into two segments by railway tracks and these two segments are linked by a street which passes over the railway tracks. Severe accidents have always occurred and are occurring at that point. Another of the most important problems of the people of Andimeshk is the cultural problem, since the people of this town at the present time are deprived of the presence of an informed, committed, literate clerical figure and have not had a Friday emam for some time. It is necessary that the academic community or the teachers' society send a committed cleric and manager to this area both to perform the Friday prayer and engage in the religious affairs of the people, and also to be able to create a religious and cultural base, since little atheistic and receptive groups are now active there. Of course good committed young Moslem people are also there, and they must be nurtured."

Arms Cache for Coup

Large amounts of arms and materiel which were to have been used in a coup d'etat conspiracy, along with proclamations by the persons plotting the coup, were discovered in the basement of the home of a retired police colonel by the guards of the regional committee in part of Shemran.

This person, named Col Amir Hushang Nur, is currently in hiding. This person's son was arrested by the guards of Region One Committee and is being questioned.

In his speech which took place after the disclosure of the unsuccessful coup d'etat attempt, Emam Khomeyni referred to the large volumes of arms and equipment discovered and seized in a Shemran home by guards.

As the nation's emam described it in his statement, this event occurred when the guards of the Region One Committee of Shemran became suspicious that this house was a place of gambling, and went there to close the place of gambling down. Inside the courtyard of the house, a dog rushed at one of the guards, and that guard went into the basement of the house and in order to save himself from the danger of the dog and came up against large amounts of arms, materiel, other military equipment, and large amounts of announcements which had been signed by the Military Council of the Iranian Nation in the basement.

The text of the declarations obtained in the basement of that house is as follows:

"Beloved compatriots: the promised hour has come; the patriotic army of Iran has uprooted the filthy government of prelates and all the units of the army, the gendarmerie and the police have declared their solidarity. Any resistance will be severely crushed. Be prepared to receive orders.

"Military Council of the Iranian Nation."

Way in Which the House Was Discovered

In a conversation with KEYHAN's correspondent in Shemran, the guards of the Committee of Region One of Shemran described the way in which the site in which the arms were concealed with the abovementioned declarations was discovered as follows:

Some time before, the guards of the Committee of Shemran Region One became suspicious of the comings and goings of a group in the Za'faranieh area and then received information that some military uniforms had been taken into a house situated in Za'faranieh. In another area, questionable comings and goings at this house made the guards think that the visitors were not just going to the place to gamble. Finally they entered the house to investigate. At the beginning the son of the owner of the place opened the door and when the guards said they intended to investigate he guided them through the basement to the top floor of the building. During this period, as the guards were engaged in investigating the house, a dog suddenly attacked the guards and one of the guards withdrew to the basement window so that his clothes would not get in contact with the dog, intending through this act to investigate the inside of the basement from outside. He noticed weapons in the basement and informed the other guards of the occurrence after investigating the ground. The people present in the house were immediately arrested and help was requested from the other units of the committee. After the basement was broken into, a large number of items, hand grenades, military uniforms, three-colored flags and a large amount of declarations were discovered. All the materiel and arms discovered were handed over to the competent officials after an inventory of the session.

The figures on the weapons and objects discovered in this storage areas are as follows:

Eighty-one different items of weaponry, 18 hand grenades, 216 Uzi cartridge clips, 8,000 rounds, 500 military uniforms, 2,000 three-colored flags, 10,000 copies of a declaration, five large wire and cable cutting shears, 53 small flashlights, one infrared light, eight bullhorns and a package of dynamite.

Special Anti-coup Staff

Hojjatoleslam Fazlollah Mahallati, Emam Khomeyni's representative in the army of guards, participated today in an exclusive interview with PARS NEWS

AGENCY's correspondent and described the manner in which the latest plot was carried out and the status of the army of guards. He pointed out that the army of guards is the army of the Islamic revolution and that all Islamic rules must rule the army. Anyone who devictes from these Islamic rules will be expelled from the army.

Hojjatoleslam Mahallati said, "Following the assignment from the emam, we got in touch with various officials and members of the army and through the investigation I carried out in the course of a week I conveyed the inadequacies to the emam."

Reverring to the point that there are many chaste, self-sacrificing, devoted people in the army and that if they did not exist our revolution would not have borne fruit, Hojjatoleslam Mahallati added, "There is some lack of discipline in the army, and that is an important problem. Sometimes people are arrested without permission from the public prosecutor or official persons, sometimes some people in the army spend money or perform acts which are outside the limits of their duties, and this activity will be strictly combatted."

Referring to the point that the army sometimes acts alone and does not make use of the other armed forces, which sometimes results in the death of guards themselves, he added, "One thing I did in the west of the country was that we in the Province Insurance Council undertook to have no organ or body of the armed forces act alone. They would prepare their plan in advance and would break responsibilities down among themselves, and no one would depart from his duty. They also put this program into operation in the Central Security Council, in the attendance of the president; every act and struggle which occurs is to take place with the cooperation of the armed forces, and it was through this coordination that we were able to neutralize this dangerous plot, with God's will and the aid of our upright brothers in the air force and army, central council and Islamic council brothers. Therefore, this is our plan, that the army should cooperate with everyone and not depart from the limits of its duties and that no armed force should take any kind of selfish attitude. If a person or group carries out a program alone it will immediately be subject to prosecution and punishment."

In response to the question "It has been said that some members of the staff took part in the arrest of Mr Baqeri--what is your view on this matter?" Hojjatoleslam Mahallati said "I have not yet investigated this matter but, as they have informed me, the army did not arrest him; some members of the Islamic Society of the air force carried out this program."

Hojjatoleslam Mahallati added, "By orders of the president, a staff has been formed for this subject from all the security organs, one of which is the army of guards, the committee, the air force, and the others, and all information must be given to this staff. Any organ it is given to must give the information to the staff. It is the staff which will take a decision concerning the arrest of an individual. Regarding his arrest and that of Sadiqi, so far as I have heard, and I have got in touch with the staff, the staff had no information. Since this activity took place without the knowledge of the staff, they gave the order that they should not oppose them and if there is positive evidence regarding any person there will not be the slightest doubt regarding him. Therefore, in matters of this sort which arise, no guard, whether he is from the army, from the committee or from the Islamic societies, will have the right to arrest anyone unless an order is issued by that staff itself. If they do this, and even if they are right, they themselves will be arrested on grounds of committing a violation."

Governors' Powers Increased

Tehran JOMHURI-YE ESLAMI in Persian 5 Jul 80 p 14

The bill on the law on the powers of the governors general of the country was ratified by the Revolutionary Council on 19 June.

In accordance with this law, the governors general will be presented to the Council of State by the minister of the interior and, following appointment to the area of jurisdiction of their assignment, will be considered the highest representative of the state in their area of jurisdiction and will be responsible for carrying out the general policy of the government there. The text of the bill on the law on the powers of the governors general is as follows:

Article 1. As of the date of the ratification of this law, the governors general will be presented by the minister of the interior to the council of State and, following the approval of their appointment, a writ of governor generalcy will be issued by the cabinet, signed by the president, prime minister and minister of the interior.

Article 2. The governors general will be considered the highest representative of the state in the area of jurisdiction of their assignment, will be responsible for implementation of the general policy of the state in the area of their assignment, and will have full, supreme oversight over all the executive matters of the province.

Note 1. The governors general can engage in the investigation of government organizations and departments and, if they have opinions regarding the affairs of these units, may render judgment with the cooperation of the director of chief of the unit involved.

In the event the issue is not resolved in the capital of the province, the governors general may conduct discussions with the minister to whom the unit is subordinate and resolve the issue. The minister in charge will, after the necessary investigations into the governor general's report, implement the requisite measures.

Note 2. In the event the case is not resolved in the above manner, the governors general will submit the issue to the minister of the interior, the minister of the interior will raise the issue in cabinet, and the cabinet's decision will be conveyed to the governors general for implementation.

Article 3. In order to supervise and oversee radio and television programs in full, the governors general may appoint a representative to the radio and television organization of the province. This representative will be considered the representative of the government.

Article 4. In order to coordinate the measures of government departments and organizations, and the revolutionary and social bodies in each province, with the general policy of the state, and in order to strengthen these bodies, the governors general may, at any time they consider it necessary, form joint sessions composed of the relevant managers, chiefs and persons in charge and other persons they deem necessary. In case of need they will place the necessary information at the disposal of the people.

Article 5. Preserving the order, security and welfare of the people and general calm in every province through the Insurance Council will be the duty of the governor general. In addition to this, providing supplies, general provisions and careful surveillance over the implementation of construction, renovation and improvement programs in the towns, villages and so forth, through the councils of competent agencies, will be among the duties of the governors general.

Note. The governors general must encourage people and organizations to establish companies and engage in public works and similar matters.

Note 2. The purge of departments, organizations and companies belonging to the government will be carried out in accordance with the laws, through consultation with and surveillance by the governors general.

Article 6. The government departments and representatives sent out by the ministries and other government and national organs concerning issues which bear on general policy or have importance in terms of local policy must perform their duties with the knowledge and guidance of the governor general.

BAHRAIN LIBERATION FRONT MEMBER DISCUSSES RELATIONS WITH IRAN

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 19 Jul 80 p 4

/Article: "The Islamic Revolution Is Being Exported: Acquaintance with the Islamic Revolution in Bahrain"/

/Text/ The triumph of the Islamic revolution of Iran has had a great, profound influence on all the downtrodden peoples of the world, in particular the Moslem peoples of the region. Proceeding from Africa and Asia to Latin America, and from the Far East to the Near East and Middle East, from Afghanistan and Iraq to Saudi Arabia and Bahrain, everyone considers that this revolution is the vanguard of his victory and considers that its great leader and commander is his sole commander. Among them, a nation such as Bahrain, which has a very profound historic and cultural link with Iran, and until a few years ago was considered a member of Iran's body, enjoys a very large degree of acceptance and influence from our revolution. In this connection, in order to bring the voice of these deprived, tyrannized people to the ears of our Iranian brothers and sisters, we arranged an interview with two brother representatives of the Islamic Liberation Front of Bahrain, which you may read as follows:

/Question/ All in all, how do you view the current conditions in Bahrain and the conditions of the Islamic revolution of the people of Bahrain?

/Answer/ The conditions of Bahrain have not yet changed in any way, are just like the conditions of 200 years ago, since at that time, when it was under British colonialism, and later when it became independent so to speak, the same Pharaohs have always governed in Bahrain in the form of al-Khalifah and the family of al-Khalifah, but just in different forms. Fire and iron, killing and torture, and mass arrests have always been imposed on the deprived, tyrannized people of Bahrain. The only thing which has changed is that methods have changed and have become more advanced with the progress of time! The government of al-Khalifah, with the cooperation of America, the British, the bloody regime in Iraq and Pakistani, Jordanian and Saudi mercenaries, in addition to fugitive Savak members from the regime of the deposed Shah, are crushing every kind of liberation movement in the most severe way.

The slightest demonstrations meet with mass killing and arrests. Even a number of religious young people who are working in a benevolent fund by the name of the al-Husayn Social Fund are being kept in the worst conditions in prisons. However, in spite of all that, there is an intense revolutionary state among the people of the downtrodden nation of Bahrain. Demonstrations are constantly being held for any excuse. The demonstrations which were held on the occasion of the martyrdom of Ayatollah Sadr were very significant. Of course, a very large number were arrested, and one of the best active, religious young men of Bahrain was martyred. The people made an attack, removed the body of this martyr and took it to the mosque. The following day a splendid funeral was held for him.

/Question/ What is your opinion about the parties and societies which are active in Bahrain against the government?

/Answer/ Previously, about 15 years ago, there were some left-wing parties active on the scene in Bahrain, such as the Bahraini National Liberation Front, which was Russian, and the "People's Front," which was Maoist, because there was no Islamic thinking. However, they in no had a popular base, but, because of the political climate then, because of the presence of British colonialism, anti-popular activities, and the extreme poverty, suppression and pressure the people endured, attention was given to these two parties in very small measure. To some extent they managed to attract people's thoughts. However, after the people learned the nature of these parties, they turned back toward the true Islam. They became aware that it is only Islam which can achieve their proper demands at any time and in any place.

About 12 years ago an Islamic front was formed and began activity in a broad context. However, until the triumph of the Islamic revolution of Iran, this front's activity was hidden and the Islamic front for the liberation of Bahrain declared the existence openly immediately following the triumph in Iran.

/Question/ Bahrain openly declared its existence /sic/--who are the leaders of this front and how do they think, from the ideological standpoint?

/Answer/ The leaders of this front are Islamic and Shiite and the domin ant idea is the unificationist idea of Islam. Of course four committed Moslem revolutionary clerics are also in leadership positions in this front.

The ideological thinking of the people of Bahrain is totally Islamic, and leftist ideas and leftist parties have been entirely eliminated. About 95 percent of the people of Bahrain are Moslem, twelve Shiites, and a much more important fact is that the people possess a very high political development and religious differences are in no way at issue at the present time. Recently a society and movement by name of "The Islamic Society Movement," who are among Sunnite brethren, declared their existence and the aim of this society is also just to fight against the dictatorial regime of Bahrain under the flag of Islam. They also call for unity between Shiites and Sunnites, but the regime is trying to sow disputes between these two groups.

/Question/ What is the nature of cooperation between the Islamic Front for the Liberation of Bahrain and other parties, inside or outside your country?

/Answer/ We are ready to cooperate with all Islamic parties and groups which have deep-rooted faith in the path of genuine Islam, are fighting against satanic regimes and against oppression and tyranny, and are on neither an eastern nor a western path, and we are in cooperation with some parties. We wholly believe that all the downtrodden people of the world must believe in the leadership of Emam Khomeyni and accept this leadership in heart and soul. The Moslem people of Bahrain are among them, and this is wholly clear from the demonstrations and slogans they make. Therefore we cooperate with all peoples who are on this path and this belief.

/Question/ What is your opinion about Mr Qotbzadeh and the status of the Iranian embassy in Bahrain?

/Answer/ The visit by Qotbzadeh, as the foreign minister and representative of a revolutionary Moslem country, to the reactionary colonial country of Bahrain has had a very negative effect on the people of Bahrain.

Qotbzadeh made a visit to this country at a time when American airplanes were taking off from it to make a military attack on Iran and Israeli aircraft had also taken over all Bahrain's airports. Qotbzadeh, going by h's own statement, was bringing a message from the emam to the caliph of Bahrain, but in my opinion this subject is completely lacking in truth; the emam does not do such things. The news that reached us was that Mr Qotbzadeh's visit was cancelled after it had been ratified by the Revolutionary Council but he made the visit anyway.

The status of the Iranian embassy in Bahrain is still satanic. Agents of Savak and the Shah's regime are still busy there. Of course I am saying that Qotbzadeh's visit was cancelled, since we talked with Mr Ahmad Khomeyni and he promised that this visit had been cancelled. The Moslem people of Bahrain put glorious demonstrations in movement during those days to protest America's military attack on Iran.

/Question/ What do you say about the effect the Iranian revolution has left in Bahrain?

/Answer/ As I explained before, the Moslem people of Bahrain accept only the leadership of the emam. In our demonstrations, we gave the slogan "Khomeyni, go forward, go forward, for today is the day of the people." Any house you go to people have certainly put up the emam's picture. The prime minister of Bahrain, in a conversation with a British magazine, stated "The most important column protecting us has fallen;" he was extremely uncomfortable. Similarly, the prime minister of Bahrain has openly asked aid from Iraq, so that if the state of revolution in Bahrain progresses Iraq will immediately intervene.

/Question/ At present, what countries are helping the government of Bahrain crush the people?

/Answer/ The Ba'th regime of Iraq is cooperating intensely, to the point where Iraqi intelligence is free to do anything it wishes in Bahrain. Security officials of Bahrain and policemen are mostly Iraqi, Saudi Arabian, Jordanian, Pakistani and Israeli. Out of Bahrain's population of 500,000, we have 200,000 foreigners! Most of them are in the police, army and security agencies. The commander of the naval bases is an American.

After Iraq, the first country which fell under the influence of the Islamic revolution of Iran was Bahrain. Immediately on hearing the news of the triumph of the Iranian revolution, all the people poured into the streets and held demonstrations, parties and joyous celebrations. The state of absorption in news of Iran among the people of Bahrain is amazing. All homes listen to Radio Iran and Iranian television. Now all the demands of the people of Bahrain are Iranian demands. On Jerusalem Day many glorious demonstrations were held in Bahrain, unparalleled in any Arab or Islamic country. It is in these conditions that an American official said that Bahrain is in a complicated and overall fearful situation. For the same reason the emam's representative in Bahrain was arrested and then banished. Putting up pictures of the emam and listening to Radio Iran have been declared completely illegal. Anyone acting in violation is immediately arrested and tortured.

/Question/ Could you give a description about the economic conditions of the people of Bahrain?

/Answer/ Bahrain, because of its important geographical position and its strategic position, has considerable importance for America and Europe from the economic and political standpoint. In Bahrain, especially after the war in Lebanon, we have about 42 foreign and international banks. The regime is a capitalist regime in every sense. The Emir of Bahrain, members of his family (the ruling family), the ministers and a few limited individuals enjoy extremely great wealth, but the majority of the people of Bahrain live in poverty and squalor. There is downtroddenness in Bahrain in the true meaning of the word. Inflation is oppressive, unemployment has reached its peak, and the cutoff of electricity and water goes on for hours. Of course these things just concern the deprived people of the nation. Except for them, inflation has no meaning to people and cutoffs of water and electricity and similar matters do not in any way involve their families. Oil is plentiful in Bahrain and if the oil money were to be allocated it would be a thousand times greater than the needs of the people. Of course, it is all in the hands of the foreign companies. Pearls and coral used to be produced in large quantities and were a great resource themselves, but their production has been declared forbidden and they are gradually burying their marine sources.

From the standpoint of agriculture, Bahrain was famous as the land of life, but now all of our goods are imported. Bahrain is full of foreign goods, especially as regards cloth and clothes, which are exported to Iran in large quantities. However, the government recently prohibited Iranian launches from approaching Bahrain. This was out of fear of the entry of the Islamic revolution into Bahrain.

/Question/ What evaluation do you have on the triumph of the revolution of Bahrain and the overthrow of its regime?

/Answer/ Its regime is very flimsy. To the contrary, the will and desire of the nation is powerful and strong. The regime, which views the regime of the Shah as its guardian and lord and master, is a corrupt regime and, God willing, will soon fall.

/Question/ What is the number of prisoners in Bahrain?

/Answer/ The number of prisoners is greater than 1,200. Among them are religious scholars, 10 women, and the rest mostly committed, enthusiastic young Moslems who are subjected to the worst torture. Let me mention that imprisoning women in Bahrain, according to the customs they have, is a very serious, intolerable act for the Moslem people of Bahrain, though recently they have been putting women and girls in prison, including one committed, religious sister who is also a powerful speaker and has had an effective role in guiding girls, name of Sister Sadiqah al-Musawi.

/Question/ Could you describe military matters in Bahrain and the volume of American interference in these issues?

/Answer/ The Bahrain military bases, one in al-Muharraq (air and ground) and one in al-Junayr (naval), are both entirely American and all the personnel in them are American. There are about 15,000 military personnel in Bahrain, from soldiers to military advisors, and America made abundant use of the Bahrain bases in its latest attack on Iran. Four days before the military intervention, the prime minister held meeting and conversation with the commander of the naval forces, who is America, and also held talks with the commander of the vessels present in the Persian Gulf.

/Question/ In conclusion, what is your message to the Iranian people, as the representative of a fraternal people?

/Answer/ Our message to the Iranian people would be to consider that this nation has entered a great Islamic revolution and is considered a big brother which has acquired a very good experience for us. Our message is on the basis of the federation of nations. Our only message to the Iranian nation is to open its arms to the deprived, downtrodden peoples of the world, become acquainted with their conditions, conduct investigations into the oppressions they endure and show a decisive reaction. Our message to the beloved people of Iran is to build a bridge between Iran and the peoples who are rising up. Another message from us is that we request them always to commit themselves to the emam's leadership and never forget their emam, their leader, and their valuable revolution, not just through slogans but through deeds, so that they will be performing their mission. Another important issue which I would like to state to the Iranian people, as a request and message, is that they never weaken the officials. If they make mistakes, they should mention it, correct their views, insist to the officials and also try, themselves, to export the Islamic Iranian revolution, since it does not belong to them themselves, so that the hopes of downtrodden people may be realized through the leadership of Emam Khomeyni. Another matter which I want to mention to the Iranian brothers, is that the mass media not state the news of the revolution of Bahrain and other revolutions and if they do convey news or convey mistakes or deficient news, we hope that all the Moslems of the world will be united and victorious in attaining a single worldwide Islamic government.

BALUCHI RELIGIOUS LEADER ASKS TEHRAN RECOGNITION OF SUNNI LAWS

LD091025 Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 2 Sep 80 p 15

[Interview with Mowlavi Mosleheddin Salehi, Imam Jomeh of Sarbaz, Iranshahr by KEYHAN "Political Correspondent": "The Baluchis Will Defend The Islamic Republic to the Last Drop of Blood"; date and place not specified]

[Excerpt] "A number of evil-doers and bandits whose interests were threatened after the Islamic Revolution and who are in contact with agents of the former regime and foreigners on the border between Iran and Pakistan are creating unrest and disturbance and terrifying the people." "The people of Baluchestan want the military forces, including the gendarmerie and the guards corps, to go into action as soon as possible and extirpate these corrupt elements."

The above remarks were made by a theologian from Baluchestan, Imam Jomeh of a Sarbaz, Iranshahr, during an exclusive interview with the KEYHAN political correspondent. He continued:

"The people of Baluchestan have a particular affection for the Imam and the Islamic Revolution and they wish to apply the Imam's concept of equal rights for Sunnis and Shi'ites to the whole of Iran, particularly Baluchestan. Remember that Baluchestan has a special geographical situation. Imperialism is trying to inflict damage on the Islamic Republic by penetrating this sensitive area.

"In addition, since the Sunnis are in the majority in Baluchistan, foreigners wish to set the region ablaze by creating a climate of division, war and fighting between Shi'a and Sunni. For this reason, both the Islamic Consultative Assembly and the Islamic Republic Government must translate the Imam's concept of the constitution into action, and give consideration to supplementary provisions to Article 12 of the constitution, and submit this to public referendum.

"In accordance with a decree by the Imam, Dr Yazdi traveled to this area about a year ago to investigate conditions in Sistan and Baluchestan, and following his inspection of the region he submitted a report to the Imam, which both the Imam and the Revolutionary Council approved. The demand of the people, as reflected in the report, was that the laws of the Sunni religion be officially recognized by the courts, and that action should follow on that basis. As I said, most Baluchis are Sunnis and they wish to enjoy equal rights with their Shi'ite brethren. In order to implement this, our first request is that the Sunni religion be recognized as official by the constitution, and then for our religious laws to apply."

On the subject of the influence of foreigners in Baluchestan, Mowlavi Salehi said: "There is no doubt that certain persons are at work keeping Baluchestan in a state of unrest. These elements keep coming and going between Pakistan and Iranian Baluchestan, but rest assured that they will never achieve their shameful ends, since the Baluchis, men and women, young and old, will resist in defending the Islamic Republic of Iran to the last drop of their blood; and, anyway, we are Muslims and prepared to die as martyrs in the defense of Islam and the homeland. The Muslim people of Baluchestan are now on full alert to forestall any sort of adventurism on the part of counterrevolutionaries in the province."

As to how security might be established in the region, he said: "In order to bring about stability and security in the region, above all else, the forces of the gendarmerie and the guards corps should be reinforced in the border zone, so that they can stop the penetration of the area by elements supporting foreign powers. Everyone should know that most of the unrest is the work of evil-doers who come and go freely between Pakistan and Iranian Baluchestan. Therefore, if they are stopped, I can promise a 100-percent return of security in Baluchestan. Meanwhile, if good and experienced individuals are employed in the gendarmerie and the guards corps, they will be able to control the border zone by prudent and correct methods and to stop the insecurity which sometimes affects this area."

BANI-SADR'S OFFICE INFORMS PUBLIC ON OPPOSITION GROUPS

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 2 Sep 80 p 15

[Text] Tehran, PARS News Agency--The following statement was released by President-People Liaison Office last night:

"In the Name of God,

"Dear Muslim Brothers and Sisters,

"As you are aware, this is not the first time that when our nation is poised for making historic decisions under most sensitive circumstances, certain groups, factions and currents have attempted, by means of systematic, multi-faceted and far-reaching attacks and by salvos of aspersions and invectives, to drag us into disputes and counterattacks, but each time we have refrained from reacting to such set-up episodes.

Our silence, however, is not one of acquiescence and appeasement. When the enemy tries to cause you to cry, silence is the most effective weapon for combating that kind of enemy. It is the method with the Shi'ites emulating Ali [i.e. the first Imam of the Shi'ites and the son-in-law of Prophet Mohammad] have learned from him.

Lately, while the people, the Majles and the popularly elected president are entangled in efforts to select the cabinet ministers, a new uproar has flared up against us in the wake of the previous attacks and aspersions. As an example, we can cite the statement by the Sazeman-e Mojahedin-e Enqelab-e Eslami [The Islamic Revolutionary Militants Organization] about the cabinet. It would be appropriate here to remind that the said statement was broadcast on several occasions by the Voice of the Islamic Republic of Iran in tandem with a matching commentary written by the commentators of the "Knowing Time." Now it is open to question what was the underlying motives of the writers of the statement in repeating the themes which have already been harped frequently. It is our belief that they try to engage the people in such a way that the society will tend to neglect the right which is about to be usurped from it. The fact of the matter is that the nation has elected the president so that he may select the prime minister and the cabinet ministers in accordance with the express letter of the constitution. Of course, the constitution stipulates at the same time that these officials shall have to be approved by the Islamic Consultative Assembly so that the government is empowered to make provisions for the enforcement of the constitution by way of ensuring the required coordination among the various mechanisms. This is the fact that militates against their collective interests at any rate. The posing of any problem designed to draw a herring across the eyes of the public to detract them from watchful supervision over the implementation of the constitution would be considered by us to be the machination of the "malicious savants" or that of the ignorant stooges of the enemy. We assure you that we will preserve our aplomb and silence in this situation no matter how wildly they revile us.

In conclusion we remind that under the present circumstance and in such an atmosphere it is only natural for us to analyze their efforts, motives, schemes and actions. [According to the Koran] Blessed are those devouts who tread the straight path without haughtiness and those who merely utter greetings (Salaam) when accosted by the ignorant. Those who evince fortitude and perseverance shall be rewarded with a lofty position where they shall be hailed with greetings and well-wishing.

BAKHTIAR, GEN OVEYSI MEET NEAR VERSAILLES

[Text] The SUNDAY TIMES newspaper reported on its front page yesterday that confidential talks took place in the vicinity of Versailles between former Iranian Army Commander Field Marshall Oveysi and the Prime Minister of the ousted shah, Shapur Bakhtiar. The newspaper added that the basic subject of the talks was military strategy for overthrowing Ayatollah Khomeyni, forming a post-Khomeyni government, and returning monarchical power to Crown Prince Reza Pahlavi, the oldest child of the ousted shah.

After the defeat of the recent military coup d'etat plot, it was said that Shapur Bakhtiar aligned himself with General Oveysi's supporters, and his recent meetings with Oveysi are seen by observers as an indication of his total unity with Oveysi's group.

INTELLIGENCE SERVICE NETWORK 'REVEALED'

[Text] Radio Tehran announced that the Islamic Revolutionary Guards of Esfahan have uncovered a spy network in this city following comprehensive research and extensive activities. Documents and evidence have come to hand from this spy network, known as the Osqofi ring and having personnel in the cities of Yazd, Kerman, Shiraz and Tehran, which included Iranian military secrets and apparatus that denote the Osqofi spy ring.

In connection with the recent sinister coup d'etat, evidence has also come to hand that documents the transfer of 500 million American dollars to the Osqofi ring of Esfahan and 300 tons of TNT explosives for distribution among a number of Army personnel, the Bahai group and the counterrevolutionary groups. At the present time a number of members of this group who are foreign nationals, along with their Iranian colleagues in this network, have been arrested.

Radio Iran said it is necessary to remember that the Osqofi ring of Iran in Esfahan, under the command of Osqof Hassan Dehqani Farari, who is also in command of Osqofi of Jerusalem and the Middle East, has benefitted from the services of such veteran and long-time spies as Father Iraj Mottahedeh Yahudi, who came from the Anglican priesthood, and who is in detention now.

The aforesaid individual, after spending periods of time in Israel and England, spent 35 years in the service of the Osqofi ring, working in the cities of Tehran, Esfahan and Shiraz.

This center is regarded as one of the most important spy bases attached to the Intelligence Service, so that according to evidence that has come to hand, when the Islamic Revolution of Iran was victorious, the CIA spy organization extended an offer to help to the spies of the Osqofi ring in a letter, and it will be remembered that the CIA and the Intelligence Service are long-time allies.

RAFSANJANI: WE WILL HELP ERITREA LIBERATION ORGANIZATION

[Text] The representative of the Eritrea Liberation Organization met and talked yesterday with Hojjatoleslam Hashemi Rafsanjani. After referring to Hojjatoleslam Rafsanjani's election and wishing him well as Speaker of the Islamic Consultative Assembly, and after reporting on the situation in Eritrea, he said:

After the triumph of the Islamic Revolution of Iran, which is really considered a victory for the people of Eritrea, the people of Eritrea have the same feeling about the Islamic Revolution of Iran that the people of Iran have about their revolution, especially since the ousted shah had very close relations with the Ethiopian regime and the people of Eritrea suffered because of this. Even Iranian aircraft bombarded Eritrea during the time of the ousted shah. Our revolutionaries, after the occupation of the spy nest by the Moslem Students Following the Line of the Imam, upon the severing of Iranian-American relations by the Islamic Revolution of Iran, announced their readiness and were prepared to fight alongside their brothers in Iran against America.

Iran's victory over its problems and difficulties is a victory for us and our people. The people of Eritrea expect the revolution of Iran to defend and back their revolt and to stand beside the revolutionaries of Eritrea in order to liberate the land under Ethiopian occupation.

He said the Eritrea Liberation Organization is the only legal representative of the people of Eritrea, and the people are interested in it and back it. The people of Eritrea are not ready to submit to the domination or power of any ruler.

Then Hojjatoleslam Hashemi Rafsanjani, while thanking the representative of the Eritrea Liberation Organization for his good wishes, said: We are concerned about the people of Eritrea. We consider America, Russia and Ethiopia culpable and condemned, and despite great distance and separation, we are ready to help.

BBC CITED ON QOTBZADEH'S FUTURE

[Text] Last night BBC said that while the Islamic Republican Party continues to strengthen and consolidate its domination and political influence in Iran, one of the targets of their recent attacks, Sadeq Qotbzadeh, Iranian foreign minister, has again stated that he has no intention whatsoever to hold a position in the future Iranian government.

Sadeq Qotbzadeh, who has in recent weeks been attacked by the Islamic Republican Party for Iran's foreign policy and a lack of revolutionary zeal and excitement, yesterday strongly defended himself in front of the Majles. He said that in accordance with expectations, Iran's foreign policy during his tutelage was unwaveringly in Ayatollah Khomeyni's line and had tendencies neither in an eastern nor western direction. However, he added, unfortunately Iran, 13 months after the revolution, has still not chosen a clear and precise foreign policy.

Qotbzadeh then defended the statement which he made in Paris immediately after on the attempt on the life of Shapur Bakhtiar, former prime minister. In this statement he had said that the Iranian government neither had any information about the course of this assassination nor approved of it.

Qotbzadeh then came under harsh criticism from the Islamic Republican Party extremists for making this statement. He said yesterday in this regard that a law could be passed in the Majles which would give Iran the right to attack anyone in any corner of the world; however, if such a law were approved, foreign countries would then have to decide whether or not to continue relations with Iran.

The last declarations of Qotbzadeh and the Islamic Republican Party's implicit criticism of them, and Qotbzadeh's decision not to perform a role in Iran's new government and thus the Islamic Republican government, make it clear that he will not attain another position.

Qotbzadeh is not alone in this respect. One month ago Admiral Madani accused the Islamic Republican Party of planning to form a one-party country in Iran. At the beginning of the present week the Majles with a very noteworthy majority decided to reject Admiral Madani's credentials as a Majles member and now demands his arrest and trial. In reality Madani had decided to refrain from participation in the Majles. He had previously entirely rejected the procedure by which the credentials of Majles deputies who were freely elected by the people were subjected to investigation.

Admiral Madani resembles many politicians who in the first stage supported the Iranian revolution but who have gradually become discouraged by the direction that the revolution is taking.

RUMORS ON PLAN AND BUDGET ORGANIZATION DISSOLUTION DENOUNCED

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 16 Aug 80 p 3

[Article: "Plan and Budget Organization Deputy: Rumors on Plan and Budget Organization Dissolution Are for Destroying the Basis of Order and Equilibrium"]

> [Text] The Deputy of the Plan and Budget Organization, following some rumors concerning the dissolution of this organization, answered these rumors and some questions during an interview, and clarified the views of the above organization concerning the country's economic problems.

Deputy al-Sabahi, concerning the country's distressed economic condition, while alluding to our one-commodity economy, the lack of sufficient production, lack of capital investment, stagnation, unemployment and rapid inflation, and on top of everything, unjust income distribution, took up its most important feature, saying: A problem related to all these distress factors is the lack of unified management in the economic organization of our society. This stems from the multiplicity of power centers and special day-to-day problems, which leads us to the conclusion that our country's economic crisis cannot find economic solutions under current conditions before political solutions are applied.

Concerning 18 months of government revenues, he added that our country's revenues for 18 months have been based mostly on consumption and dependence. Due to decreased production and capital investment and greater stagnation, we satisfied all our needs with oil revenues. Even all our creative, ideological and religious movements began with a reliance on petroleum income. For example, the waging of the holy struggle began in practice with a reliance on oil wells, while to our minds a holy war is a religious and spiritual movement.

Continuing his remarks, while explaining the planning process and its importance for economic stability and health, he expressed regret that most ideas, suggestions and planning proposals have not been usable until now as expected and as necessity requires because of contradiction, conflict and fragmentation between executive powers. He added: Concerning the lack of planning discipline and putting a stop to it in the noble nation of Iran, we are reminded and we proclaim that "there is no way to move away from backwardness and dependence without comprehensive planning."

In one part of his speech he said: The act of weakening the Plan and Budget Organization through continuous strikes and attacks, and rumors of this organization's dissolution, are circulating for the purpose of sidetracking the last stronghold of order and equilibrium. He then referred to the role of the organization, saying:

The Plan and Budget Organization is a coordinator of proposals, plans, policies and methods. In short, it balances society's acceptable expectations and arranges for society's acceptance. Without this effort the load of problems will vastly increase beyond what it is now. The continuation of this crisis will put every plan in jeopardy.

STUDENTS EXPELLED FROM UK GREETED AT TEHRAN AIRPORT

[Unattributed Commentary]

[Text] The reason for the closure of the British Embassy in Tehran has been made public. Following the Iranian authorities' warnings to the British Government and after the expulsion of the first batch of Muslim students, the British Foreign Office recalled to London its charge d'affaires and all other diplomats in Tehran, except one. Now the British Embassy in Tehran is closed. The British authorities said: We have deemed it essential to recall our diplomats from Tehran because of the present difficult and unpredictable phase in our relations with Iran.

On the other hand, the Pars News Agency reported that the two Muslim Iranian students, accompanied by the 3-year-old child and British wife of one of the brothers, who had left Britain, arrived in Tehran at 0230. Thousands of Muslim sisters and brothers from Tehran, who had been given only a few hours notice of the arrival of these crusaders, assembled at Mehrabad Airport and chanted slogans in an extremely orderly manner, paying tribute to the students defending the Islamic Revolution who had been expelled from Britain.

The Islamic nation's auspicious rally, while sending greetings to Imam Khomeyni and backing the struggles of the Muslim Iranian students, identified the British police as the stooges of U.S. imperialism and world zionism. The British wife of one of the expelled brothers, who was carrying in her arms her 3-year-old child, told the Pars News Agency correspondent: The British police behaved inhumanly against us when we were demonstrating quite peacefully against the United States; and we reject any charges of assaulting the British police or of obstruction. This British Muslim, whose expulsion order had been signed by the British home secretary for the crime of defending the Islamic Revolution and backing Imam Khomeyni, then continued: At a time when several British policemen are caught committing the crime of burglarizing a department store one could draw one's conclusion about the truth of the depositions made by such safeguarders of law and order. She termed ludicrous the Western puppet press accusations that the students had received money from Iran in order to stage demonstrations.

In another part of this interview an expelled Muslim brother said: We will continue our struggle until our other Muslim sisters and brothers are released from the prison of the British fascist police. He continued: The British police are definitely unsuccessful and we will give a full report to the Imam of the Islamic nation and to our martyr-nurturing nation.

As to the British police's behavior toward the jailed students, the same expelled brother said: Their behavior was utterly brutal; we spent over 30 days in tiny cells in conditions of the utmost squalor and indignity.

The British wife of the same Muslim crusader then said that the British police had behaved in an utterly inhuman manner to her husband, that the demonstrators had never assaulted the police and that the charge of assaulting the police was nothing but a tissue of lies without foundation.

Another of our brothers, whose deportation order had been issued by the British puppet courts for the crime of taking photographs, said: In a cell where a number of us were detained we did not have enough room even to sit down and they kept pumping extremely foul and polluted air into our cells. So in order to make the surrounding air breathable we kept wetting our shirts in the toilet and wiping our faces with them. As to the accusation that we received money from the Iranian Government in order to stage demonstrations, the same brother said: What else could they say--thieving police, a number of whom, according to the guardian, were arrested a week ago for the crime of burglarizing--could they possibly say anything else to please their master, the United States? How else could they prove to the United States that they are good servants?

A Muslim brother who said that he had studied technology in Britain for 5 years added: In accordance with my Islamic convictions I deem defending the Islamic Revolution and its achievements one of my main duties. Referring to the fact that British fascist police and jailers had been instructed by the British home office to subject us to psychological torture, he added: We, the 57 student members of the Islamic association who are condemned to expulsion, contrary to the empty claim of the British authorities in no way had the right to defend ourselves in court. But we never gave the British the satisfaction of appealing against our sentences. We thereby condemned and rejected the competence and the predetermined verdicts of the made-to-order British courts.

This sister and these brothers, while chanting Khomeyni, om Imam and being showered with flowers as a gesture of welcome by the brother guards, left the airport in the midst of a vast crowd and joined the ranks of another assembly of brothers and sisters who had waited for hours outside the airport in an orderly manner. The crowd was composed of young and old, men and women, clergymen and students and others. The vast crowd of welcomers, chanting such slogans as the Muslim students are the manifestation of our faith; Khomeyni, Khomeyni, is our speaking Koran! And death to the British fascist police!, left the airport at 0330.

We would like to remind you that last month the British fascist police arrested 72 of our Muslim brother and sister members of the Islamic Association of Students, after orderly demonstrations in protest against U.S. imperialism opposite the U.S. embassy in London. These brothers and sisters, who were charged merely with defending the Islamic Revolution and Imam Khomeyni and professing hostility to the United States, were finally condemned by the made-to-order British courts and expelled.

NEW LAR DAM AGREEMENT CRITICIZED

[Text] Iran has agreed to pay a $500 million price increase to a group of Italian, German, Japanese and English companies for the completion of the Lar Dam project. In the view of economic experts this decision is a sign of renewal of developmental activities in Iran through foreign companies.

The new contract was signed in Tehran with a company affiliated with the Fiat corporation. Work on the Lar dam has remained almost at a standstill since the revolution's victory. Last spring foreign companies threatened that in the case of a failure to reach an agreement with the Iranian government they would drop the projects. This project, which began in 1974, will end in another two years. It is one of the limited number of projects in which members of the Pahlavi family did not receive a commission from foreign contractors for hits completion.

Simultaneously with the signing of this contract it was announced in Tehran that the Iranian government is prepared to enter into discussions with the main offices of those German companies whose branches were nationalized in Iran, regarding their future management. These two decisions are transformations in the economic policy of Iranian revolutionary authorities who in the past were opposed to any form of cooperation with western companies. The new dam is supposed to supply additional drinking water for thirsty Tehran, districts of which were without water for hours this summer. The Iranian Plan and Budget Organization undertook responsibility for the success of the recent negotiations. Officials of this organization expressed hope that other foreign companies whose cooperation would be useful to the Iranian economy and which had not cooperated with corrupt agents of the Pahlavis in the past would be able to continue their activities in Iran.

ISLAM HELD UNCOMPROMISING AGAINST FOREIGN 'INHIBITIONS'

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 26 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Kalim Siddiqui: "A New Phase in Islamic History"]

[Text]

The world pretends that the dynamism of the Islamic movement has taken it by surprise. The first reaction of the detractors of Islam, even before they try to understand us, is to give Islam a bad name. Hence, the string of emotional adjectives - resurgent, emergent, militant designed to evoke fear. Islam, as Muslims know, is none of these things. Islam is always the same - the truth as ordained by Allah subhanahu wa ta'la. Islam is not a movement by the choice of the Muslims. Islam came as a movement and has always been a movement. It is incontrovertibly linked with man's movement and progress. For centuries this movement was propelled by a succession of prophets in many parts of the world. As many as 124,000 prophets bore the message. The message, its method and its model were completed by the last of all prophets - Muhammad, upon whom be peace. Since Muhammad, the Islamic movement has always struggled to emulate him and his message in order to achieve the same result - the establishment of the Islamic State and the Islamic civilization. Only recently have some in the Islamic movement deviated from the direct and unambiguous message and the method of Islam. The result has been a 'subservient Islam', welcome and acceptable to our detractors. The link between the message, its method and the result has been dramatically re-established by the Islamic Revolution in Iran.

Islamic Iran has given a new edge to the Islamic movement, but no more. Iran has given us nothing new. If the leadership in Iran is transparently selfless, self-effacing and totally uncompromising it is only because that is the Sunnah of the Prophet; if the Islamic movement in Iran has a worldview free from secular inhibitions, it is only because that is the Sunnah of the Prophet; if Iran is determined to uproot all influences of alien values and culture, it is only because the Qur'an insists on it; if Iran is determined to eliminate capitalism and all traces of exploitation of the weak, it is only because Allah demands it; if Iran defies 'power' many times its nominal size, it is only because Allah is an active participant in the Islamic movement and He is the only superpower, or any power, recognised by the Islamic movement ..... In a sense, there is nothing new.

But in a very real sense there is much that we must take stock of. Perhaps the most important of all lessons we have to learn is that a geographical national identity is the very antithesis of Islam. All forms of nationalism must be eliminated from the Muslim consciousness at all levels. It is nonsense to suggest, as many 'independence' movements have done, that nationalism is essential for Statism. Islam itself is a sufficient identity and has its own view of State. The secular State has no place in Islam and Muslims do not need it. It follows, therefore, that all the post-colonial States and their regimes and political systems have little more than a transient legitimacy. The Islamic movement itself is a seamless garment without the familiar majority/minority distinctions. Muslims living in Canada and the United States, Europe and other areas are as much parts of the Ummah as those living in the heartland of Islam. The US and European wings of the movement in Iran have clearly demonstrated the role and power of the small 'expatriat' cells of the movement. Each local Islamic movement is part of a global Islamic movement. All parts of the Islamic movement must mobilise their resources and commit them to the defence of the leading exposed edge, at present in Iran. As and when similar stage is reached in other areas, the Islamic movement must concentrate its resources there.

In the case of Iran, unfortunately, even the voice of the Islamic movement was not heard clearly enough. While Muslims everywhere felt a close identity with the Revolution, their feelings found little open expression. Those who felt their interests threatened managed to manipulate the media. They were, as always, helped by the western media in distorting the image of the Revolution. They are still trying to contain the Revolution in Iran by having it branded as 'Shi'a' and by searching for 'conditions peculiar to Iran'. But the Islamic movement has absorbed the Revolution at all levels. The Muslim masses now know the essential conditions for an Islamic movement and State. They will not be deceived again by such palliatives as 'Islamic democracy,' 'Islamic socialism' and 'Islamic nationalism.' They will demand and they will get movements that break free of these inhibitions and legacies of the colonial era.

Muslim history has now entered a new phase. The seemingly relentless speed of our decline has been arrested, if not as yet reversed. The post-colonial nightmare is coming to an end. There is a new sense of destiny, direction and purpose. But the processes of recovery are going to be as painful as the processes of decline and defeat have been. There are no easy options. History extracts its pound of flesh in flesh and blood. While our recovery need not be at the cost of any other people, evidence suggests that we will not be allowed a smooth run. The experience of Iran since the Revolution is a case in point. Many among us will play the game of the external powers. Many of the post-colonial regimes will oppose the Islamic movement at every step. Many will put restrictions on even such small efforts as this journal.

In this situation we must keep a cool head. The tempers within the House of Islam must be kept within the bounds of Islam. The Prophet (upon whom be peace) never lost temper against his opponents. He was kind even to his enemies. In recent years many 'Islamic' journals and journalists have become intemperate in their language and presentation. This appear to have been influenced by the style of the 'fringe group' politics in western democracies. We in the Islamic movement must be very clear about who's who and what is what. We must state our views in plain and simple language But we must never become abusive towards anyone - be it the Saudi regime or the White House or others with whom we shall have more than one occasion to differ. But we must consistently, relentlessly and fearlessly expose the contradictions and hypocrisies of the modern civilisation and all its conceptual, philosophical and structural supports.

In the last two years Imam Khomeini's speeches have sketched out a new worldview for the Muslims and the Islamic movement. His style may appear to be old but his message has originality and freshness long missing from the Muslim political arena. He has decisively closed the era of apologetics, and yet his modesty at the hour of supreme achievement is a lesson in personal behaviour which few in all history can equal. The relevance of the Imam's message is the greatest to those of us who have acquired western education and absorbed western lifestyles and even culture and outlook. One basic characteristic of western education is that it makes the individual arrogant and egocentric. Witness the fresh graduate at the convocation. He walks on a cushion of intellectual air.

UAE CLAIMS OWNERSHIP OF THREE GULF ISLANDS

[Text] Correspondents have reported that the United Arab Emirates Foreign Minister has protested Iran's continued "occupation" of three islands in the Persian Gulf to the Secretary General of the United Nations. It must be remembered that these three islands, known as Abu Musa and the greater and lesser Tombs, are located near the Straits of Hormoz and were taken over by Iranian forces in 1971 after British forces departed from the Persian Gulf.

Rashid 'Abdollah, in answer to a letter sent this past May or June to the Secretary General by Qotbzadeh, Foreign Minister of the Islamic Republic of Iran, said that the UAE hopes that the problem of these three islands can be solved and settled through normal channels and that provocative acts can be avoided.

He called on the new government of Iran to solve the problems arising from the expansionist policies of the former shah's regime and to return these three islands to the UAE.

In conclusion, with repeated emphasis on the UAE's attachment to these three islands, Iran was called upon to take part in serious bilateral talks in order to demonstrate its sincerity in desiring good relations with its neighbors, and in order, through this process, by transferring the islands to their original owners, to put an end to this problem.

CONSEQUENCES OF DEFENSE BUDGET CUTS OUTLINED BY AIR FORCE CHIEF

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 16 Jul 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by the military editor of HA'ARETZ: "Air Force Chief Protests: Israeli Pilots Are Flying Fewer Hours than in the Arab Forces"; "Jordan a Serious Threat; Iraq Has Placed MIG-23's on its Border with Jordan; Problems in Tel-Milhata"]

[Text] In the wake of reductions in the defense budget, severe reductions have taken place in the Air Force, including flight hours for the fighting force. At present, Israeli Air Force pilots fly fewer hours than American pilots or pilots of many European air forces. For the first time, a number of Arab pilots are flying their fighter planes more than our pilots. The commander of the Air Force, Major General David Ivri, discussed this in a meeting with military correspondents in connection with Air Force Day.

With respect to Arab air forces, he said that Jordan has become a more serious threat because of new arms it has acquired which are aimed at vital targets in Israel. He revealed that the Iraqis have placed MIG 23's in the middle of their border with Jordan as well as a new control system in this area.

Major-General Ivri said that if it turns out that this affects the fitness of our pilots or the security of the Air Force, it will be necessary to give back flight hours to some of the pilots. This will, however, be at the expense of other areas. The budget cuts will also affect purchase plans. It is already clear that in the future, we will buy fewer F-18's than we had originally thought.

Problems in Tel-Milhata

A large sum was cut, he said, from the portion of the 1980 budget designated for the building of the third airport in the Negev at Tel-Milhata. At the moment, construction on site has not yet begun because of legal problems with the Bedouins. If the delay is a long one, the airport will not be ready by 1983. "It is a mistake to think that the cut in this area is economical. It is a budgetary savings but a waste from another point of view because the equipment will be stored outside and is likely to be damaged. The cost in the end will be greater."

In his opinion, a difficult phase can be expected when the Sinai air fields are evacuated. The new fields which are being built by the Americans are smaller, and, therefore, the third field at Tel-Milhata will be needed. There will be thousands of tons of equipment, and there is not enough storage space for all of it. It will cost a great deal to build new warehouses.

In answer to a question about accidents in the Air Force, he confirmed that this year, there was an increase in the number of training accidents as compared to last year which was the best in 16 years. What characterizes this year's accidents is that many of them are related to weather rather than to technical problems. The Air Force has established a special team to study this problem and new courses are being offered.

U.S.-Egypt Cooperation

With regard to changes in the Arab air forces, he said that we ought to look carefully at the strategic cooperation between the United States and Egypt. "I say this from a positive point of view as well. For example, there could be a possibility for Israel to join in this arrangement such as offering maintenance service to Egypt's air force."

Concerning the Jordanian Air Force, he said that it is becoming a serious threat because of their recent acquisition of 14 batteries of improved Hawk missiles the majority of which have already been made operational, and because of their acquisition of French Mirage F-1's. France plans to arm them with the most advanced "Magique" air missiles, and, in addition, will supply the Jordanians with [? word unknown] bombs and trajectory exploding bombs.

The Jordanians are setting up three new air fields, two of which are almost completed. One of them, Jaffar, is across from the Plains in the Negev. The second, Azrak, is across from the Dead Sea. They have also established a control system developed in America and a radar checking system which counts units from everywhere.

The Jordanian Air Force is at an advanced level, and its planes are 3-7 minutes flight from vital strategic targets in Israel. The strength of Jordan's air defense capability eliminates the argument of their non-participation in a war with Israel. "These developments necessitate that the Israeli Air Force be capable of a swift response against Jordan."

MIG-23 on the Jordanian Border

He said that the Iraqis are developing an air field base near the border with Jordan. A control and command system has been established there and brand new MIG-23's set up. The Iraqis are also about to receive the Mirage F-1 from the French, and a new and powerful MIG-24 helicopter from the Russians.

The Syrians made great strides by getting MIG-25 planes last year which are already in place in the field. They have also acquired a very large quantity of N.M. missiles, three times as many as they had in the Yom Kippur War.

FUEL SITUATION REVIEWED BY ENERGY MINISTER

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 15 Jul 80 p 3

[Article by DAVAR editor in the Knesset: "Modai: Israel is Being Strict about Stockpiling Fuel"]

[Text] The Minister of Energy and Infrastructure announced yesterday in the Knesset that in the area of liquid fuel, Israel will be strict about guarding the strategic supplies which exist within Israel's borders. The supplies are at a level such that a government resolution is required so that we do not allow the level to be lower than that which existed many years ago.

In an investigation of the activities of his department, the minister said that the planning and policy sections have completed their plans regarding what Israel would do if, for political, economic or other reasons, it were not to receive its full supply of fuel from outside of Israel. One of the means would involve activating the emergency law, similar to the emergency security law. The minister said that this subject would be raised and confirmed during this session.

Minister Modai said that as early as 1978, Israel reduced its dependency on Iranian oil by diversifying its sources and thus assured itself of alternate markets when the Iranian revolution took place. At present, Israel gets about 50 percent of its imported fuel from "spot" markets, but, in addition, has been able to attain acceptable purchase levels. The minister revealed that in the previous fiscal year, Israel's average purchase price did not exceed 24 dollars per barrel, and most of the deals were successful.

"In 1979, expenditures for fuel amounted to 1.5 billion dollars. This year, they approached 2.5 billion dollars. We have reached the point of spending 8.5 percent of our GNP on fuel, and this is an international record. This year we are likely to exceed the 10 percent mark," the minister said.

Modai reviewed Israeli accomplishments in the realm of utilization of solar energy and the setting up of solar pools for producing electricity, an approach which has gained economic respectability in the world. Plans have been started to produce electricity by means of a solar pool that would produce about 5 megawatts of electricity if its technical/economic advantages can be proved. He also noted that more than 400,000 solar hot water heaters have been installed in Israel for heating water and pools, and that in the next 2 years that number will be doubled.

Harish: Soviet Military Trouble

MK Michael Harish (Alignment) said during a debate about the Energy Department that the USSR is changing from being an exporter to an importer of oil. Due to the restrictions on foreign currency, the fuel shortage is likely to bring about political processes or even military intervention by the USSR in the Gulf states and in Iran.

MK Harish says that he is doubtful about the stability of the fuel supply from Egypt and Mexico. In his opinion, this is likely to become no less serious a problem, in the long run, than the economic problem.

MK Avtavi (NRP) said that we must continue to set up reservoirs in case of emergency. At one time, the United States promised to establish a fuel reservoir, but this promise has not yet been carried out. He advised not to raise fuel prices every month or two but, rather, three times a year. It is necessary that we conserve energy by greater use of solar hot water heaters. We need to make sure that the electric company is performing efficiently in order to reduce their expenses. We cannot afford to arrive at a situation where some of the population has to spend 20 percent of its income on electricity.

EXPORTS INCREASE IN FIRST HALF OF YEAR

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 16 Jul 80 p 8

[Article: "Exports Increase by 30 Percent During January to June"]

[Text] Net exports of goods, calculated in current prices in dollars, amounted to 438 million dollars in June of this year. Of that, 413 million dollars consisted of industrial exports and 25 million in agricultural exports. In comparison with June of last year, in which exports totaled 338 million dollars, there was an increase in June of this year of 30 percent. The net value of exports, excluding diamonds, ships and planes, seasonally adjusted, rose in June by 23 percent in contrast to May of this year. This data was presented by the Central Bureau of Statistics and by the Department of Industry, Commerce and Tourism.

During the first half of the year, net exports of goods totaled 2.65 billion dollars as compared to 2.09 billion dollars in the same period last year, an increase of 27 percent. Industrial exports, excluding diamonds, rose by 33 percent, diamond exports by 22 percent and agricultural exports by 15 percent.

Seasonally adjusted data show that the average monthly value of the net exports, apart from diamonds, ships and planes, was 315 million dollars during the second quarter of the year; this was a 3 percent increase over the monthly level in the last quarter and a 9 percent increase over last year's final quarter.

Retreat in the Second Quarter

Industrial exports (excluding diamonds) in the first half of the year totaled 1.48 billion dollars as compared to 1.11 billion dollars in the same period last year, an increase of 33 percent. This increase reflects growth in all the major industrial sectors: chemicals, rubber and plastic, and mining of nonmetallic minerals, 55 percent; textiles, clothing and leather, 46 percent; wood, paper, printing and the like, 20 percent; metal, machines and electronics, 20 percent; food, beverages and tobacco, 17 percent.

Seasonally adjusted data point out that in the second quarter of this year, industrial exports, excluding diamonds, amounted to a monthly average of 264 million dollars, a level which is slightly lower than in the previous quarter, but 12 percent higher compared to the monthly average for the last quarter of last year.

Export of polished diamonds (net) in the first half of the year totaled 723 million dollars compared to 593 million dollars during the same period last year, an increase of 22 percent. Seasonally adjusted data show that in the first half of the year, the monthly average of exports of diamonds (in dollars) rose by 9 percent as compared to the second half of 1979.

Agricultural exports (including citrus fruits) in the first half of the year totaled 528 million dollars, as compared to 373 million dollars in the same period last year--an increase of 15 percent. Exports of citrus fruits totaled 213 million dollars from January to June of this year as compared to 196 million dollars in the corresponding period last year--an increase of 9 percent. The rest of the agricultural exports totaled 215 million dollars in the first half of the year as compared to 177 million dollars in the same period last year--a rise of 21 percent.

REAL DROP OF 20 PERCENT IN 1979 INVESTMENTS REPORTED

[Article by the Economics editor of DAVAR: "Real Drop of 20 Percent in 1979 Investments"]

[Text] The number of investments approved in 1979 by the Center for Investments dropped more than 20 percent in real terms. Investments totaled 27.2 billion Israeli pounds as compared to 16.8 billion pounds in 1978 and 9.4 billion in 1977. According to the report from the Center for Investments, 1,531 permits were issued in 1979 as compared to 1,270 in 1978. Overall investment in Israeli currency last year amounted to 25 billion pounds as compared to 15.1 billion in 1978. Investment in foreign currency in 1979 was 111.1 million dollars as compared to 96.5 million dollars in 1978.

There was an increase in the number of permits for investment in industrial enterprises. The majority of these were permits to expand facilities. In the past year, 1,173 permits were issued by the Center for Investments for industrial enterprises as compared to 885 in 1978. In 1979, investments in industry were approved for the sum of 21.4 billion pounds in 1978. Out of that, investments in foreign currency amounted to 32.1 million dollars as compared to 14.7 million dollars in 1978.

A Drop of 50 Percent in the Hotel Industry

There was a drop of more than 50 percent in investments in the hotel industry last year. Twenty-nine permits were issued for a total of 847 million pounds. Out of that, there were 7.66 millions in dollars. This is in contrast to 60 permits for a total of 1.44 billion pounds in 1978 with 9.4 million dollars of that in foreign currency.

In property last year, 148 investments were approved for a total of 2.46 billion pounds, including 16.8 million dollars in foreign currency. This is in comparison with 138 investment plans for a total of 1.16 billion dollars approved in 1978. In the preceding year, investment in foreign currency in property was about 22.2 million dollars.

In agriculture, 16 investment plans totaling 87 million dollars were approved in 1979 as compared to 9 plans totaling 34.2 million dollars in 1978.

In other areas, the Center for Investments approved 160 plans totaling 2.4 billion pounds. The foreign currency component totaled 66.5 million dollars. In 1978, 173 plans were approved totaling 2.6 billion pounds. In that year, the foreign currency component amounted to 48.6 million dollars.

145 New Businesses

A look at the breakdown of permits in the area of industry shows that in 1979, permits were issued for the establishment of 145 new businesses for a total of 1.5 billion pounds, as compared to 124 new businesses for a total of 1.3 billion pounds in 1978. In addition, 272 permits were issued last year for the expansion of businesses at a sum of 8.69 billion pounds as compared to 221 permits for hotels at an investment of 892 million pounds [as published] in 1978.

As for hotels, last year permits were issued to build only 5 new hotels at an investment of 128.9 million pounds as compared to 18 permits for hotels at an investment of 892 million pounds in 1978.

Americans and Canadians in the Lead

In looking at the breakdown of permits for the establishment of new enterprises in which foreign money is involved, it is clear that the Americans and Canadians are in first place. Permits were issued for 52 investment plans for their participation, with the overall investment at 2.3 billion pounds. Britain and South Africa come next. Investors in those countries were issued 67 permits for a total investment of 555.6 million pounds.

Twenty investment programs involving investors from Switzerland, Lichtenstein and Luxembourg were approved last year for an overall investment of 235.5 million pounds. German investors were involved in 9 investment programs totaling 163.4 million pounds. French investors were involved in 5 programs amounting to 38.3 million pounds. Investors from Italy were involved in 5 programs totaling 3.9 million pounds.

SYRIAN COMMUNIST PARTY DISSIDENTS ATTACK PARTY CONGRESS

Beirut AL-NAHAR in Arabic 27 Jun 80 p 11

[Article: "Syrian Communist Party Wing Led by Yusuf and Qaysiyah Considers the Party Congress To Be Phony and Schismatic"]

[Text] The wing of the Syrian Communist Party led by Mr Murad Yusuf and Mr Nayif Qaysiyah has responded to the recent congress held by the party. In a statement distributed in Beirut and signed by "representatives of the organizations of the Syrian Communist Party," this wing of the party described the 5th congress as "a dangerous schismatic action undertaken by the opportunist right-wing leadership of the party." The congress is regarded as "phony, schismatic and not representative of the party," and its decisions are described as "not binding on Syrian communists."

It should be mentioned that Yusuf and Qaysiyah are two members of the Syrian Communist Party's Politburo who were responsible party officials in two important regions. The 5th congress announced that they had been expelled.

The statement issued by the "representatives of the party organizations" supported "the positions adopted by the eight comrades, members of the Central Committee, who had addressed a letter to the Politburo, dated 26 November 1979. The letter contained basic and practical suggestions to restore party unity and hold the 5th congress on the basis of dogmatic principles. These party comrades had been entrusted with the responsibility of conducting the party's work at the present stage and with taking the necessary steps to achieve this in the best possible manner, in cooperation with the regional committees and party cadres."

The statement extolled "the importance of the existing relationships of cooperation between our country and the countries of the socialist bloc, led by our loyal friend and faithful ally, the Soviet Union." The statement also praised "the work being done to consolidate, develop, and expand these relations in all political, economic and military domains."

In another statement addressed to all members of the Communist Party, the "representatives of the organizations of the Syrian Communist Party" accused the leadership of the party, headed by Mr Khalid Bakdash, of "violating basic documents of the party, including the important party document which was unanimously approved by the Central Committee in January 1978."

COMMUNIST PARTY SUPPORTS REGIME AGAINST MOSLEM BROTHERHOOD

[Article: "Support for the 'National Identity' of the Regime, in Spite of 'Negative Economic Phenomena'"]

[Text] Mr Danyal Ni'mah, member of the Politburo of the Syrian Communist Party, held a press conference at Hotel Beau Rivage yesterday. He talked about the agenda of the party's 5th congress, which was "unanimously ratified," and expressed "complete support" for President Hafiz al-Assad against "the Moslem Brotherhood and the imperialist-Zionist onslaught." He also alluded to "the dangerous negative economic phenomena" in Syria.

He said that the communists, when they are given weapons, are prepared to defend Syria's independence. He accused Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Iraq of supporting the Moslem Brotherhood.

The report which Ni'mah read said that "Syria is playing an increasingly important role in the battle against imperialism, the Camp David scheme, and Sadat's treachery."

The report considered it "necessary to strengthen the permanent relations of friendship with the Soviet Union, because it is our firm, loyal, true friend."

Confusion

The report distinguished between "the national identity of the regime, which has become clear to a great extent, and its domestic, internal identity, which is still confused. The confusion is attributable to negative developments in the social and economic situation, especially the dreadfully widespread and deep-rooted growth and development of the parasitic bourgeois phenomenon. This is the thing which constitutes the principal source of rampant corruption and bribery. The reason is that the strongest of these parasitic bourgeois groups, the bourgeois merchants, have direct ties with imperialist, capitalist monopolies and are striving to bind the entire economy of the country to the interests of these monopolies."

The report goes on to say: "The activities of the parasitic bourgeoisie, which cooperates and engages in conspiracies with bureaucratic bourgeoisie, have led to the appearance of a large number of millionaires." The report refers to "the growth of capitalist exploitation in agriculture and its effects on the peasant laboring class."

The report then notes that Syria's economic and social policy has "led to dangerous negative phenomena which have had a cruel impact on the standard of living of the masses as well as on the country's political mood and general situation. These negative effects have been exploited by bands of people who engage in conspiracies, sabotage and killing, and who are supported from abroad. It is only natural that the party's position has been, and remains, that of combatting these negative phenomena."

The Key Issue

The report then says that "the key issue is the fact that national and class conflicts are flaring up more and more in Syria." The report stresses "the importance of democracy, its orientation regarding the classes, and the importance of expanding and intensifying the role of the Progressive National Front, especially with regard to the workers, peasants and revolutionary intellectuals."

The report points out that "the policy of the Syrian Communist Party is strongly committed to these social and economic issues. It does not hesitate to support the position taken against the bands of conspirators, and to support the general policies expressed by President Hafiz al-Assad in his latest speech."

The report then emphasized the following points:

1. Affirmation of the soundness of the party's past policy, wisdom and farsightedness, and affirmation of the fact that the masses have come to understand this policy.

2. Affirmation of Syria's hostile role against imperialism in the area; the importance of the role which has been played, and will continue to be played, by the Syrian Communist Party; and the necessity to strengthen cooperation between it and the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party within the framework of the Progressive National Front.

3. Affirmation of the international orientation of the party and its deep-rooted friendship with the glorious party of Lenin, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

4. Criticism of shortcomings in work done by the party, including the performance of leadership councils and Central Committee bureaus; and the need for appropriate self-criticism of shortcomings on the part of this or that party official and this or that council.

5. Unanimous condemnation of Murad Yusuf and his party behavior, and unanimous agreement concerning decisions made by the Central Committee, especially those concerning Murad Yusuf and his supporters.

6. Demonstration of resolute determination to put an end to circumstances which have existed as a result of crises in the party, gradually closing party ranks, and rallying closer around the party leadership, the Central Committee, the Politburo and the party's secretary general, Comrade Khalid Bakdash.

The discussion period brought up the question of cooperation on various levels between the Communist Party and the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party, and the necessity to improve such cooperation.

It should be mentioned that Mr Murad Yusuf recently split off from the party, and that his supporters are Mr Nayif Qaysiyah and some members of the Central Committee.

The Lebanese Communist Party

After Ni'mah finished reading the report, he answered questions by reporters, and received help in this regard from Mr Nabih Rushaydat and Mr Ya'qub Karu, who are among the leaders of the party. He was asked why there were no representatives from the Lebanese progressive parties and the Lebanese Communist Party at the press conference. He was also asked whether or not these parties had been invited to the press conference, and whether or not there were differences with them. He answered: "Everybody was invited. Actually, I believe that this question should be directed to the Lebanese Communist Party." Ni'mah continued: "A representative has been sent to the press conference from the newspaper AL-NIDA' (the organ of the Lebanese Communist Party). Is he not here? Yes, he is here."

[Question] It has been noticed that, among the greetings received by your congress, there was no greeting sent by the Lebanese Communist Party. Why is this?

[Answer] The fact that the Lebanese Communist Party did not send a greeting to our congress is something which concerns only the Lebanese Communist Party. We strive to have good relations with all of the parties.

[Question] Do you have any differences with the Lebanese Communist Party?

[Answer] The purpose of this press conference is to present the results of the work done by the 5th congress [of the Syrian Communist Party]. However, with regard to this question of yours, it could be that there are such differences, but we usually bring them up at meetings usually held by the Arab communist parties.

[Question] Will there be a meeting of the Arab communist parties?

[Answer] I do not know.

[Question] What is your response to the Moslem Brotherhood's attack on your party?

[Answer] We call for action on a broader mobilization of national forces to confront the Moslem Brotherhood. We are demonstrating complete support for the resolute position against the Moslem Brotherhood. We call for more democracy and for taking economic and social measures which are more progressive. We are trying to clarify objectives. It is a national and class struggle, and it is being pictured as a sectarian struggle. The first action of the members of the Moslem Brotherhood was to burn down consumer establishments.

[Question] In your opinion, what is the difference between the Iraqi regime and the Syrian regime?

[Answer] The difference is in their attitude toward imperialism. In Syria, there is ever-increasing hostility toward imperialism and colonialism, whereas in Iraq we see that the opposite is true.

[Question] Who is giving aid to the Moslem Brotherhood organization?

[Answer] Sabotage activity is not conducted by the Moslem Brotherhood alone. This organization is only the shock troops which we see on the surface. There is confirmed information that members of the Moslem Brotherhood are being trained in Jordan and that they receive aid from Saudi Arabia and Iraq.

[Question] What is your position with regard to other leftist political forces in Syria?

[Answer] We consider that the principal and basic enemy is the black forces of reaction. As for other leftist forces, such as those of Jamal al-Atasi and the League of Communist Action, we feel that their work and orientation, in the final analysis, are grain for the mills of the forces of reaction. In fact, we have said this in our dialogues with them. Many times we have demanded that they ease their campaign of violence against us, and direct it against the forces of reaction. But we consider that their work and orientation are, if not collusive, then certainly shortsighted.

[Question] What is your position with regard to their joining the "National Front" in Syria?

[Answer] Our position will be determined on the basis of what position they take with regard to the front.

[Question] What is your position with regard to the regime in Lebanon?

[Answer] I believe that we have stated our support of the need to reach a national accord in Lebanon, and to affirm Lebanon's sovereignty and the fact that Lebanon is an Arab nation.

[Question] How do you feel about the people's militias in Syria?

[Answer] Distribution of weapons has started in some areas. When we are given weapons, we will use them to defend Syria's independence against the onslaught of the Zionist imperialists.

PLANNING MINISTER INTERVIEWED IN ATHENS

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 20 Jun 80 p 19

[Interview with Dr Salim Yasin, Syrian minister of planning by Muhammad Mustafa Mahmud, in Athens; date not given]

[Text] The Syrian minister of planning, Dr Salim Yasin, tells AL-QABAS: "Economic cooperation between the Arabs and Europe is based on an inadequate concept of our potential." Dr Salim Yasin defines the premises of the forthcoming 1981-1986 5-year plan in light of previous experience and within a framework of long-range development guidelines affecting the remainder of the 20th century.

In Minister Yasin's interview with AL-QABAS in Athens, where he led the Syrian delegation to meetings of the joint Greek-Syrian Committee for Economic Cooperation, he clarified the goals of current economic activity in Syria in all fields.

He said that right now, the Fifth Five-Year Plan is being prepared, since four 5-year plans have already been implemented. Each one of these 5-year plans had its own particular goals, strategy, regulations and procedures.

He added that work on the Fifth Five-Year Plan began with an analysis of Syria's economic development from the year 1961 until today. Particular emphasis in this analysis was on a thorough study of the current economic situation, that is, of the Fourth Five-Year Plan which comes to an end at the end of 1980. Ideas began to jell for the next 5-year plan in light of this analysis and study of the current situation. This was done within the framework of outlines for long-range development for the nineties, all the way up to the year 2000.

It could be said that there are a number of premises for the Fifth Five-Year Plan which have been defined on the collective level and on the individual level. There are also other premises which right now are in the process of being defined. These premises include:

1. Stressing increase in production through increasing productivity by making optimum use of the projects, installations and other facilities which are currently being utilized. This also applies to projects which have been started and not yet completed. They too should be put into operation.

2. Stressing the growth of agriculture and development of the rural areas.

3. Stressing the development of services in order to meet the needs of growing economic activity, on the one hand, and the needs of Syria's citizens, on the other.

4. Stressing broader application of the concept of comprehensive planning. This is planning which includes economic feasibility studies for all projects, and studies of their direct and indirect effects not only on the sectors of the projects themselves, but also on other sectors of the national economy. This also includes defining the requirements of each project in terms of human, material and other resources, and securing them at the right time and at the appropriate place. This is something which could overcome economic bottlenecks and avert anticipated difficulties in the implementation and operation of such projects.

Minister Yasin went on to say that this, of course, requires the utilization of modern planning methods which began to be used in the Fourth Five-Year Plan. Likewise, it requires the existence of integral partial plans which must be interlocked with the general overall plan. These include, for example, the labor force plan, foreign trade plan, money transfer plan, etc. Right now these plans are being prepared along with the 5-year plan.

The Status of Cooperation Between Syria and Greece

[Question] What is the status of cooperation between Syria and Greece?

[Answer] There is economic and technical cooperation between Syria and Greece. This cooperation takes place within the framework of a number of agreements, some of which have been signed and ratified. Others are still in the planning stage.

There is a joint Greek-Syrian Committee for Economic and Technical Cooperation which meets periodically. Its next meeting is expected to take place in Damascus in the third quarter of this year. It will be chaired by the Greek minister of coordination and the Syrian minister of planning.

The agenda for this committee's forthcoming meeting will include a draft agreement concerning maritime transport, a juridical draft agreement, a draft agreement regulating maritime labor, and other such draft agreements between the two countries

Assessment of Arab-European Cooperation

[Question] How do you assess economic cooperation between the Arabs and the Europeans?

[Answer] In my opinion, the principal benefit from [contacts with Europe] is that we become familiar with the point of view of Europe's intellectuals with regard to problems which concern the Arabs, and the causes of these problems. We also hope to learn what methods they feel can be clearly defined and utilized to deal with these problems in the framework of Arab-European cooperation. There is no doubt that a great many benefits could be derived from Arab-European cooperation, if it were based on principles of mutual interest and benefit for both parties.

There was cooperation in the past, during numerous periods of time, but it was on conflicting bases. The appropriate thing is that such cooperation be based on realistic premises and an objective knowledgeable perception of the reality of the issues which confront each of the two regions. A healthy diagnosis should be made of the causes of problems and how to deal with them.

For example, one of the opinions which has surfaced is that the Arab world faces a problem of food supply. Europe is able to satisfy the needs of the Arab world in this regard. This view is based on computing current increasing demand and current supply, and projecting these calculations into the future.

My belief is that an opinion such as this is based on inadequate computation. Computing both current and future supply of foodstuffs in the Arab world should take place not only on the basis of the current situation and its projection into the future. On the contrary, one should compute these things on the basis of calculating the Arab world's agricultural potential, especially the potential which so far has not been utilized. One should also compute how to make optimum use of modern technology in agriculture in the Arab world. The costs of doing this should be estimated and compared with the actual costs of importing foodstuffs from the European countries. In light of all this, and in the framework of the theory of relative costs in foreign trade, a report should be rendered about whether or not it is beneficial to continue to import foodstuffs from Europe or whether it would be better to develop, modernize, and utilize the Arab world's own agricultural capabilities. [end of answer]

Doctor Yasin concluded the interview by saying that there is another opinion which has surfaced concerning the export of technology to the Arab world, and which technology would be beneficial for it. This is in addition to importing machines and equipment, learning how to operate and maintain them, etc. This opinion favors effort to create advanced industry based on the Arab world's own technological capability. The reason is that this approach would mean designing and developing machines and equipment which would be better adapted to the economic and social realities of the Arab world. Consequently, they would be more productive.

OIL MINISTER DISCUSSES SYRIAN ENERGY RESOURCES

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 6 Jul 80 p 34

[Interview with 'Abd al-Jabbar al-Dahhak, the Syrian minister of oil and natural resources, by Randah Taqiy al-Din; date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] What is the situation in Syria today with regard to energy resources?

[Answer] Syria is still a young country as far as the field of energy resources is concerned. Our energy production is limited, and does not exceed 10 million tons [of oil] per year. However, we have had our own particular experience which differs from that of the other Arab countries. This is because in Syria the exploitation of oil takes place on the basis of geological survey operations and refining undertaken by Syrian experts using Arab labor.

We refine part of our oil in Syria, because our oil is of the heavy type. It is necessary for us to blend it with light-weight oil in the two refineries at Homs and Baniyas. Also, we have agreements for importing gasoline and mazut.

[Question] Where do you buy your light crude oil from, and in what quantities do you buy it?

[Answer] We sometimes buy light crude oil for our blending processes. For example, the production capacity of the refinery at Homs is 5.2 million tons a year. The oil it refines is 50 percent Syrian and 50 percent Iraqi. This means that we buy about 2.75 million tons of Iraqi oil per year. As for the refinery at Baniyas, it is still in the experimental stage, and its maximum production capacity is 6 million tons per year. The oil it refines is 20 percent Syrian, and 80 percent Iraqi and sometimes Saudi oil. This refinery sometimes refines oil for some European plants.

[Question] Do the OAPEC countries lower their oil prices for you?

[Answer] We buy their oil at official OAPEC prices.

Gas Projects

[Question] It is said that Syria has asked (?Abikurb), a French firm, to help in the extraction of gas in Syria. What are your expectations in this regard?

[Answer] As far as the production of gas is concerned, we are still in the initial stages. We have an estimated 11 billion cubic meters of gas associated with oil. And we have reached an agreement with the French firm (?Antribu) to build a plant in the city of al-Hasakah, in northern Syria, to liquefy this gas. This project will be completed 2 years from now. We also have natural gas, and it comes in two types. There is the gas in the gas caps of the oil wells. We want to keep it there to maintain the pressure level necessary for the extraction of oil. As long as we utilize these oil wells, we do not want to extract this gas. We have also discovered some wells which contain only natural gas. This is the gas which we were thinking of extracting in cooperation with the World Bank, which was going to finance the initial stages of this project, including making an estimate of the gas reserves and a study of its economic potential. In initial studies, experts have concluded that there are about 50 billion cubic meters of gas. We are making every effort to study and assess these reserves in preparation for processing and utilizing the gas in the production of electricity and in other fields.

[Question] What do you anticipate in the way of reserves?

[Answer] There are 90 billion cubic meters. It is believed that 50 billion cubic meters are pure gas, about 30 billion cubic meters are in gas caps, and about 10 or 11 billion cubic meters of gas [associated with oil]. Of course, there are not big quantities. But in view of the importance of all sources of energy, we are devoting a great deal of attention to this subject.

Limited Aid

[Question] Is the financial aid which Syria received for oil and gas exploration from the OAPEC countries and the World Bank sufficient?

[Answer] Up till now the amount of aid received has been limited. At the present time, we are relying on concluding contracts with foreign companies to prospect for oil in Syrian territory, on condition that the Syrian Government will not suffer any financial losses if these companies do not find oil. If they do find oil, they can recover the costs by selling 40 percent of the oil which is discovered, at world market prices. But the rest of the oil, that is, 60 percent of it, goes to Syria.

As far as OAPEC is concerned, it has a Petroleum Services Co. with headquarters in Libya, which does drilling for oil. But we have our own geophysical expertise in this field. Even foreign companies that do oil exploration in Syria draw on this local expertise. For this reason we have so far not asked for any services from Arab countries, bearing in mind that the Petroleum Services Co is able to offer its services throughout the Arab world.

[Question] Are there any joint projects with Arab countries in OAPEC in the field of oil exploration in Syria?

[Answer] We are working together with them in the field of searching for alternative sources of energy. There are national energy committees which are interested in questions of solar energy, wind power, water power and the generation of electricity to conserve energy resources. Initial studies have also been made concerning the setting up of a petrochemical industries complex in Syria. However, a final decision has not yet been made about this. But talks are going on with investment companies in the Arab countries concerning the building of industries in the Arab countries. We could benefit from them in the field of fertilizer production. Relevant negotiations are going on right now, and we hope that they will result in a formula by means of which we could make use of the potential of the Arab countries.

POSSIBLE OPEC MOVES TO COUNTER OIL GLUT DISCUSSED

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 19 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Algiers (APS)--We have been informed by a reliable source that some member countries of the OPEC are concerned over the situation on the world oil market and are considering a special meeting of the petroleum ministers of the member countries of this organization to examine the oil supply situation prevailing in the consumer countries.

We know that the industrial countries since the beginning of this year have accumulated stockpiles of oil previously unattained.

The record stockpiles thus established are a means of destabilizing the oil market which the decisions made at the Algiers conference last June were to have stabilized by the adoption of a reference price of US$32 per barrel and a ceiling differential of US$5.

We do not understand the levels of production of some member countries of the OPEC which are continuing to pour oil into the world market at a rate not justified either by their customary and reported level of production or by their financial needs and even less by the normal supplying of the world market.

And we wonder about the objectives pursued by these countries which are maintaining excess production which can be harmful only to the other members of the OPEC.

In this regard, we know that the great majority of the latter lowered the level of their exports last year and during 1980 to regain the conditions of a normalized market. That is the situation with Kuwait, Venezuela, Nigeria, Algeria, Libya, the Arab Emirates and Qatar. All of these countries together represent two-thirds of OPEC exports and are the majority of the exporting countries.

We fear that the situation which now prevails on the oil market may be the apple of discord at the meeting which has been scheduled in Vienna on 15-16 September and which is to examine the questions to be submitted to the second OPEC summit set for the beginning of November in Baghdad and may run counter to the efforts exerted to develop a strategy of dialog with the industrial countries.

Regularization of Oil Market

[Text] Algiers (APS)--In this summer season, the world oil market is experiencing an excess of supply over demand, in spite of the energy crisis which has recently prevailed. This paradoxical situation, apart from certain local considerations, is explained by the stockpiling policy being pursued to the extreme by the Western countries during the past few years.

This policy of establishing so-called security stockpiles is really a kind of blackmail in the hands of the Western countries against the OPEC countries which already is beginning to weigh heavily upon the oil market. If in the past the capitalist games, although still in force, consisted in relying fully upon inflation and the devaluation of the dollar to erode oil revenues and weaken the purchasing power of a barrel of oil while at the same time attempting to freeze the price of the latter, today, on the other hand, these games increasingly consist in ensuring surplus production serving to swell the so-called security stockpiles and thus to inundate the market to create confusion over the prices of a barrel of oil.

We observe that in addition to the methods used regularly to keep oil prices at the lowest levels other methods adapted to the present situation have been added to better exploit oil without concern over its conservation.

With regard to the so-called security stockpiles, the Western countries have in mind not just transfers of the equivalent of reserves of certain large deposits but transfers of the equivalent of the entire reserve of a medium-size producing country.

At present, about 2 million barrels of crude oil coming in particular from certain large producers of the OPEC which have not yet decided to reduce their production are being used to feed these stockpiles daily.

To permit the oil price-setting mechanism to fully play its role in the safeguarding of the purchasing power of a barrel of oil and the protection of oil revenues from capitalist inflation, the producing countries must give serious consideration to the question of the energy balance and the reduction of their production to a level compatible with their development needs and to a level which eliminates all waste and constraint which could backfire against them.

The price-setting mechanism as proposed by the OPEC strategy committee; i.e., a mechanism which takes into account inflation in countries of the OECD [Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development] and the evolution of their GNP, a mechanism whose content can in the meantime be improved, could have its effects nullified if the energy balance between supply and demand is distorted by a frantic exhausting of the reserves and an oversupplying of the market.

The question of reduced production which was lightly touched upon at the Algiers meeting will, in this regard, be of greater concern to the producing countries and will give them another opportunity to tighten the bonds existing between them to establish a balanced relationship with the consuming countries.

SAUDI CAMPAIGN FOR ARAB SOLIDARITY, COORDINATION SEEN

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 1 Aug 80 pp 20-21

[Article: "Amir Fahd Takes On a Task Which Has So Far Been Impossible to Handle"]

[Text] Late in June, Amir Fahd spelled out Saudi Arabia's position regarding the Middle East and the Palestinian problem. His statement emphasized 6 points:

1) The need for Arab solidarity;

2) The Palestinian problem is the central issue of the Middle East conflict;

3) The only solution is contingent upon Israeli withdrawal from all Arab lands occupied in 1967;

4) East Jerusalem must be returned to Arab control;

5) Peace in the region may be achieved only if the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to return to their homeland and to establish their own state, are recognized; and

6) Saudi Arabia rejects any negotiated settlement or initiative independent of the Arab nation's will.

It is evident from this statement that the first and last points, i.e., Arab solidarity and the insistence on a solution acceptable to the Arab people, form the foundation of Saudi Arabia's approach to the Middle East problem. The other 4 points follow immediately as inescapable consequences of these two major points.

The truth is that Saudi Arabia's position sums up the convictions of all Arabs. For, if anything, the summit conferences of the past 2 years, not to mention prior ones, have convinced the Arabs that what these conferences needed most was unanimity. And unanimity means solidarity and unified action regardless of the differences in the structure of Arab governments and irrespective of regional, party, and even doctrinal disputes. To begin with, these disputes are essentially insignificant. They are no more than minor differences in approach and aspirations and squabbles over national interests. But, with respect to the Palestine problem, there are no differences. All Arab countries are in agreement with the Saudi position. The achievement of peace, in their view, is contingent upon the fulfillment of the same conditions laid down by Saudi Arabia. The problem lies not in differences over the goal, but on a plan of action for achieving that goal. The unfortunate aspect of this problem is that the rift over a plan of action is intensifying gradually, and this despite all protestations of solidarity and mobilization for facing the Zionist enemy.

The 1978 Baghdad summit conference raised hopes that the Arab states had finally agreed on a sound course of action. While it is true that they did ostracize Egypt as a renegade and seemed resigned to its loss, it is equally true that they did agree on a unified position. Unfortunately, that agreement was not translated into concrete action. The conference was referred to as the "rejection" summit, or the summit of the states opposed to the Camp David accords. In retrospect, however, rejection alone was apparently not enough. The rejection summit ultimately spawned the "steadfast front." The list of adjectives did not stop there, but in all cases the designations referred to those countries that were opposed to the Camp David accords and determined to remain steadfast in their opposition to Israel. Any Arab state outside the rejectionist front was seen as a renegade and not representative of the Arab will. The consensus among the rejectionists was that opposition to the Camp David accords inevitably implied continued confrontation of the Zionist enemy, who, in the rejectionist view, appeared undeterred in defying the Arab will, in ignoring the rights of the Palestinian people, and in his determination to annex occupied Palestinian and Arab territory.

It was further recognized that the actions of the Zionist enemy were backed by a military apparatus that was sustained by and had the absolute support of the United States. On the other hand, the rejectionist front was also aware of a developing support for the Palestinian and Arab cause among certain East and West European nations. That support, however, it was felt, had not yet been expressed openly.

It was evident, furthermore, that despite the Zionist enemy's complete economic and military dependence on the United States, he persisted not only in rejecting a military alliance with that country but in refusing to knuckle down to any demand conflicting with [Israel's] interest. On the contrary, the Zionist enemy's obstinancy went as far as compelling the United States to support, or at best to refrain from criticizing, Israeli policies that under other circumstances would be unacceptable to that country.

This was the background that would serve as the springboard of the rejectionist challenge. But what form was the challenge to take? Who would take the first step? Should a single Arab country, a group of Arab countries, or all Arab countries together take the first step? It is at precisely this moment that the principle of Arab solidarity was born at the Baghdad summit. The principle, however, is not new. It had been echoed at a number of summit conferences since 1948. It would be put to the test once more. But how? Many questions were raised. Precisely what did Arab solidarity mean? Was it to be limited to a kind of boycott of Israel, or would it encompass other measures in which all Arab countries involved would participate? What were the ways for resisting the Zionist enemy? Would the resistance be passive as has been the case for the past 30 years, or would it be active as it should be? How would the means of this resistance be provided?

In answering these questions, some said the Palestinian revolution should serve as the starting point of this resistance. But it must be remembered that the Palestinian revolution is divided into two fronts: one operating within Palestine and the second outside it. The former is faced with a relentless and bloody enemy, a terrorist enemy devoid of respect for moral and human values. The latter is operating under restrained conditions; its path is strewn with obstacles, even explosives. For a while the entire burden of the Palestinian revolution was borne by tiny Lebanon, whose military might cannot stand up to a single division of the Israeli army. Lebanon, as was inevitable, finally exploded, and that explosion generated a new problem for the Arabs, one no less ominous than the Palestine problem.

Some advocated a united stand against the Camp David agreement in an effort to scuttle it. Some wondered whether that strategy was sufficient. "Even if we succeed in scuttling the Camp David accords," they asked, "what then?" Do we continue to wait and seek ways to confront Israel and its supporters, or do we take immediate action? If we opt for immediate action, what action do we take? Who will set the broad outlines for such an action? Who will set the details? Will the burden be placed on the confrontation states, or will it be shared by all members of the solidarity pact?

Another question: What will be the common ground which could provide the launching point for a positive resistance, a resistance with well-defined goals and established priorities? To put the question another way, let us first consider the following. Israel plans for every one of its actions. Its plans are usually very long-range, for generations to come. Furthermore, Israel's plans encounter no opposition or protests. Any opposition, external or internal, is most frequently perfunctory; often it is a part of the plan. With this in mind, what are the means for countering Israel's plans? Do we simply react, or should our opposition be based upon our own independent planning, planning that is consistent with the Arab will and guided by Arab goals? Should we opt for war as a last resort, are we willing to make the necessary preparations. Furthermore, will our preparations be sound?

I once discussed this very point with an Arab leader. Here is what he said: We Arabs are accustomed to viewing things simplictically, to underestimate things and to overestimate our ability to get things done. We even make it sound easy to die. Others do not see death in such a non-chalant manner. Unfortunately, some of our informational media are responsible for this. They drown our people in a make-believe world. They pay little heed to the effects this has on people who ultimately wake up to reality. When people sober up to face reality, at best they become frustrated and bitter; at worst they turn to revolution.

He added: "Let me review candidly some aspects of our situation. Until the recent past, our disputes were kept secret. We managed to solve our problems quietly. Today, at the first sign of a difference, we rush to our guns. Often, our disputes are over trivia. I have attended most of the conferences and meetings held since the 1978 Baghdad Summit conference. What have we accomplished so far? Let me give you an example. At the Baghdad summit it was resolved to set aside $9.00 billion to assist the confrontation states, those that would form the spearhead in any confrontation with Israel. Five billion dollars were to go to Egypt in the event it repudiated the Camp David accords. Egypt showed no such inclination. But instead of giving the Egyptian share to the remaining confrontation states, that provision of the resolution was withdrawn. Even worse, some of the states that had promised to cover the other $4.00 billion have not yet paid their shares. Why? Because certain regional developments were not to their liking. Now, as we approach the 11th summit conference to be held in Amman next November--Amman has asked for a postponement of the conference till after the American presidential elections to give the Arabs a better view of the American position--our situation has not changed very much. A quick glance at the map of the Arab world will show that in some instances our position has deteriorated. In North Africa, for example, Mauritania is occupied with its own affairs, oblivious to all else. It is a country engulfed in crises. Morocco is in a state of undeclared war with Algeria over the Polisarios. Libya backs Algeria with the support of the 'Steadfast Front.' The problem, in my opinion, is not difficult to resolve, provided good will prevails. Ever since the Qafasah episode, Tunisia's relations with Libya have been smoldering, ready to explode. Libya is massing troops on the Egyptian border. It has created a defense line similar to the old China wall. Egypt responds by massing troops on its side of the border. Egypt, the most populous and powerful country in the Arab world is completely isolated from that world. Will this isolation resolve our dispute over the Camp David accords? I will not even attempt to answer this question for I cannot correct what time has wrought. Relations between Syria and Iraq, and even between Syria and Jordan are not exactly consistent with the principles of Arab solidarity. The smoldering situation in Lebanon bodes ill for the entire Arab world. The Gulf states are at a loss on how to counter the threats surrounding them. Neither the Soviet Union nor the United States have their best interest at heart. This is even true of the European countries, especially Great Britain. The Gulf states rightfully reject any interference in their internal and defense affairs, but what will happen should the situation explode? Not even the wisest Arab diplomat can answer this question. The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), accepted by the Arabs as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, is having a rough time reconciling the contradictory Arab policies and providing a suitable environment for launching its revolution properly. What has become of Iraq's national declaration that all inter-Arab disputes must be resolved peacefully? When we renounce the use of force and resort to dialogue, sincere dialogue free of exaggeration, we will be able to resolve our internecine economic and political disputes. But we have not so far accepted negotiations as a replacement for ths use of force. We are still prone to violence. The Iraqi national declaration also called upon the Arabs to mobilize and use all their resources in confronting the Zionist enemy. We have been tentalized by this dream since the early 50s, more specifically since the July, 1952 Egyptian revolution. But the 28-year old revolution has been oscillating from one extreme to the other, and this lack of stability that has been at the base of its retreats and defeats. Neither Egypt could rely on the Arabs and their resources, nor they on her. Egypt was always a controversial topic among Arab leaders, who neither assessed her position correctly nor defined clearly their position with respect to her. This brings us to the Camp David accords, which, according to Egyptian officials, were entered into not enthusiastically but with the sad realization that the Arabs could never agree. Egypt's 'weakened faith' in the Arabs was thus a factor in her decision to enter into the Camp David accords."

Having finished his quick review of our situation, the Arab leader went on: "We must wake up one day--we haven't yet--to the reality of our situation. If you ask me about a solution, I have no answers. The only thing I can say is what everyone else is saying: We must unite; we must set aside our disputes and concentrate on the struggle with Israel and its supporters. This, in my view, is where we have failed all along."

Has Crown Prince Fahd of Saudi Arabia decided to take up this challenge? It seems that his planned tour of the Arab world is calculated to resolve disputes and unite the ranks of the Arab nations to give the forthcoming Amman summit a chance of success. Press reports from Riyad indicate that Saudi officials during the past 2 months have become certain of 2 crucial trends: 1) Because of internal developments or in response to changes in relations with the non-Arab world, inter-Arab disputes will be on the increase; 2) Israel will exploit the Arab fueding to create a series of new realities, ranging from driving the largest possible number of Arabs from Palestine through pressure and terroristic measures as a preliminary to declaring occupied Arab territory, including East Jerusalem, an indivisible part of the Zionist entity, to the implementation of a plan to occupy southern Lebanon. The latter measure might encompass a series of lightening raids on some of the neighboring Arab states.

Based on this information, Saudi Arabia is convinced that Arab solidarity may soon undergo its most critical test. The Saudis further believe that these impending developments may be behind the weakening of European support for the Arab cause and the Palestinian problem, as well as for turning the attention of the United States exclusively to Israel. Like any other nation, the danger of rift and possibly armed conflict within the Arab world is likely to propel the United States to seek a stable ally in the region to help safeguard its interests. The manifest unity of the Zionist enemy, unlike our so-called solidarity is bound to speed this switch in U.S. policy.

In a recent talk, Prince Fahd questioned the intentions of the major powers regarding the Arab region and appeared skeptical about their announced declarations to defend the area, its oil and shipping lanes. He expressed apprehension about conditions in the Gulf region, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and the [apparent] weakness of Europe in the face of Russia's might. But his greatest fear was over the disarray in Arab ranks. He described the lack of Arab unity as posing a greater danger than that posed by the major powers, and appealed for unity and an effective Arab voice in world affairs. Prompted by these apprehensions, Prince Fahd had decided to visit the trouble spots in an attempt to bring about negotiated settlements of Arab disputes. The Prince's example had immediate effects. Following the visit of Dr Rif'at al-As'ad, commander of Syria's defense forces and a leader of the Ba'ath party, to Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Government announced that it would no longer require Arab nationals to procure visas before entering Syria. Visas, according to the announcement, could be obtained from offices on the Syrian border. The abolished requirement had been interpreted as a sign of poor relations between Syria and her Arab neighbors, whom the Syrian Government had accused of helping members of the "Moslem Brotherhood" enter Syria. The imposition of the visa requirement had earlier resulted in turning thousands of Arab visitors from the Syrian border. Syria's abandonment of the visa requirement was a signal that the country would no longer adhere to a policy of reciprocal treatment with other Arab governments, who continued to adhere to the prior-to-entry visa requirement. Syria's example is but a simple example of the initiatives that could be undertaken to advance Arab solidarity.

The question, of course, is whether Prince Fahd will succeed in his undertaking. Will he be able to break the self-imposed bonds which shackle the Arabs and restrict their freedom of action, the bonds that have led to their splintering and immobilized their case?

There is reason for hope. Things have so deteriorated that we have only two options: success or further immobilization of every Arab case. In any event, success is contingent on agreement by all parties and on determination to achieve it.

Success is also contingent on actions, not on words. Excess words is not what is needed. What we need is action. A negligent smoker who causes a fire with his cigarette butt does not mean to start a fire. On the contrary, a worker who plants dynamite in a stone quarry knows what he is doing and produces a calculated result. We believe that Prince Fhad is trying to get the Arabs to be more like the dynamite planter, to deliberately undermine their disputes and to achieve a goal that has eluded them much too long.

FATAH LEADER WARNS OF DIFFICULT TIMES, EXPRESSES MILITANCE

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 3 Jul 80 p 3

/Article: Khalid al-Hasan at a Press Conference: The Arabs Are Venturing on Crucial Times Which Might Scorch More Than One Country in the Area"/

/Text/ Mr Khalid al-Hasan, member of the Central Committee of the FATH movement, declared the Palestinians' rejection of any monopolization of the region by any major power in the world. He said that the Middle East issue must be solved with the participation of all major powers in the world, including the European countries. He described the European initiative as having been "drawn up" in an obscure manner, out of diffidence. He expressed his hope that Europe would have the courage to establish a clear friendship with the Arabs, as it previously had the courage to fight them and be hostile to them.

At a press conference he held yesterday at the headquarters of the FATH office in Kuwait, Khalid al-Hasan called upon the Arab countries to draw up their policy in accordance with the requirements of their national and domestic interests. He said that the Arabs were venturing on difficult and crucial times and that more than one Arab country could be badly burned if it was not in solidarity with the Arabs in their policy and their struggle.

Khalid al-Hasan declared that a delegation from the European Common Market countries would make a tour of the Middle East in which contacts would occur with all parties, including the Palestine Liberation Organization.

He said that the Palestinian resistance's information indicated that King Husayn was still adhering to the resolutions of the Baghdad and Tunis summits and that Carter had not been able to push him into joining the "Camp David" axis.

The Palestinian Delegation's Tour

At the start of his press conference, the member of the Central Committee of the FATH movement talked about the Palestinian delegation's tour of Europe, which took 45 days, and stated that this tour took place in order to carry out two separate missions, first to participate in the meetings of the International Parliamentary Federation in Oslo, second to attend the Strasbourg Conference of the Society of European Parliamentarians.

Concerning the former meeting, Mr al-Hasan said that that was held to prepare for the basic general conference meeting which would be held in Berlin next September. At this meeting, the issues and drafts of resolutions were spelled out which would be presented to the general conference.

He stated that the task of the Palestinian delegation to this meeting, which comprised parliamentary delegates from 85 countries, was to add the issue of the Palestinian cause to the conference's agenda. He stressed that the delegation succeeded in this task without difficulty, since all parliamentary delegates except the representative of the Zionist enemy agreed to that.

Mr Khalid al-Hasan mentioned that another matter connected to the Palestinian cause was discussed at this meeting--the draft of a resolution to deal with the problems of refugees in the world in general.

An Israeli Draft!

He said that Israel presented a draft on this subject in the context of giving refugees passports from countries to which they had taken refuge and giving them some social and political facilities so that they would be able to express their cultural and political goals. Mr al-Hasan declared that this Israeli position arose from Israel's opposition to the return of the Palestinians to their homeland and their homes.

He mentioned that the draft of a contradictory resolution was presented to the conference with explanatory memoranda critical of the draft Israeli resolution. The opposing resolution stressed that solution of the refugee problem would occur when they returned to their homelands. The result was that the draft of the resolution opposed to the Israeli one won.

He added that after the conclusion of the meeting of the International Parliamentary Federation in Oslo the Palestinian delegation moved on to attend the Strasbourg conference. That was originally founded by the European Parliamentary Society and contained five parliamentarians representing France, Britain, The Netherlands and Germany. This society just includes the members of parliament of the nine European Common Market countries in its membership. It now consists of 350 parliamentary members. It has relations with the Arab Parliamentary Federation. Since Arab fragmentation has afflicted the Arab Parliamentary Federation with paralysis, and since the Palestinian cause is the vital one on the international stage, there are relations between the Organization of European Parliamentarians and the Palestine National Congress.

Mr al-Hasan said that in the light of these circumstances, the European organization recommended that a meeting be held between it and representatives of the Palestine National Congress, and the date was set last April. The agenda of this meeting contained a number of major issues, including a description of the reality and manner of operation of the Palestine National Congress.

A Welcome for the European Initiative

As regards the European initiative, he said that the Palestinian resistance would welcome this initiative, if it set forth from a principle of sincerity and seriousness. He pointed out that this principle must proceed from the usurped rights of the Palestinian people. He added that Europe, which had a prominent part in planning the establishment of Israel, must know full well what the Palestinian people want.

The member of the Central Committee of the FATH movement stressed the Palestinians' rejection of monopolization of the region by any major power in the world. He said that the Middle East issue must be resolved with the participation of all the major powers in the world, including the European countries, which have common interests and a political geography linking them with the Middle East.

He then focused on the demands which would enable the Palestinian people to look upon the European initiative with confidence. He said that the European position is not clearly hostile to the Arabs but is not a friendly position either and has not reached the desired level; rather, it has been drawn up in an obscure manner, with obvious diffidence. He expressed his hope that Europe would have the courage to establish true friendship with the Arabs, as it had the courage to fight them and be hostile to them.

He stressed that the first basic steps to guarantee that a sound atmosphere was provided for Arab European friendship would be recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization as a sole ligitimate representative of the Palestinian people, then the establishment of cultural and educational relations and the provision of aid to the palestinian people and their revolution inside and outside the occupied territories. He pointed to a deficit in the budget of the Refugee Aid Agency (UNRRA): if this deficit, which came to more than $18 million, continued, that would lead to depriving many Palestinian people of an education.

Mr al-Hasan declared that the Palestine resistance has a number of observations on the European initiative--first that it must be clear and not entail interpretations and explanations, and that it must contain a practical content for implementation, including economic punishments for Israel.

Mr Khalid al-Hasan added that after the conference ended the Palestinian delegation split up into three delegations visiting parliaments of European countries; their meetings were at the level of parliament members and and foreign affairs committees, and there were meetings at the foreign ministry level.

Mr al-Hasan characterized Palestinian-Jordanian relations as being governed by the results of the Baghdad and Tunis summits. He said that the Palestinian positions change in accordance with change in the Jordanian positions.

He then said that the Palestine National Congress at its next meeting would stress the political program approved at the former meeting and that a new executive committee would be elected which would contain two representatives from each detachment of the Palestinian resistance. A working program for the next stage would be set out in the light of the political and organizational program approved by the former congress.

Flames Will Scorch More Than One Arab Country

Concerning conditions in Lebanon, he said that talk has proliferated in Washington about information indicating that Israel would soon launch a war against Lebanon and Syria this summer.

He expressed his belief that this war would be aimed at creating a new situation which would change the political course in the region.

He warned the Arabs of this dangerous situation, and said that they would be venturing on very difficult days if they did not return to a true combative solidarity accompanied by material action within a clear plan of action. He called on the Arabs not to content themselves with the resolutions they have become accustomed to issuing or else flames would scorch more than one Arab country.

The Resistance and Lebanon

On the subject of partition in Lebanon, he said that that was an Israeli goal and point of departure and that the resistance was on the side of the unity of Lebanon, land and people.

He mentioned that the resistance's new measures had not just been in Lebanon, but that it had started to intensify the struggle in the occupied territories, then worked to eliminate the armed phenomena and aggressions and conduct which do not become revolutionary morality and the customs and traditions of the Lebanese and Palestinian peoples. He said that these aggressions had reached the point where they were stirring up the Lebanese popular base against the resistance and that that was to be considered one of the most serious things the revolution faced especially if it continued.

Mr al-Hasan expressed his regret over the clashes which occurred with the Amal organization. He stated decisively that Iran had no relationship to these problems.

He said that the Palestinian leaders had done everything in their power to eliminate the causes of these disputes.

Mr al-Hasan concluded his press conference by saying "Any Arab political link with the events going on in America or Europe should be considered ignorance of the laws of political action, the conduct of anyone practicing them is subordinate, not independent, and the Arabs must come to understand the need to set out their policies in accordance with the requirements of their national and domestic interests, foremost among them the Palestinian cause, and deal with others from the premise of this policy."

PARLIAMENT, SUPREME COURT PROPOSED TO UNITE ARAB NATION

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 2 Jul 80 pp 1, 6

/Article by Ibrahim Abu Nab: "The New National Charter"/

/Excerpt] When the Conference of Arab Foreign and Economic Ministers meets in Amman to prepare for the 11th Arab summit conference, which will be held in the Jordanian capital next November, it would be best if the ministers of defense also join the foreign and economic ministers, because the military danger of Israel has not lessened--rather, it has multiplied many times over and has been increased by other military dangers in the Gulf region. It would be best if all these were joined by the ministers of the interior in the Arab countries, and the ministers of education, the media, economy, culture and all the other types of ministers, if there still exist people like unity ministers in some Arab countries! It has been said that there are ministries in some Arab countries which do not exist in others, such as the Ministry of Cultural Legacy and the Ministry of Refugee Affairs; it would not be bad if these attended also.

Were it not for the fear that this talk of ours would be taken more in a spirit of jest than in a spirit of seriousness, we would recommend that an Arab parliamentary conference be held in conjunction with the Ministers' conference, in spite of the fact that Arab parliaments in the true meaning of the word do not exist and are closer to municipality councils, district councils, gathering places for old sheiks or royal seals!

Fortunately, or by the mockery of fate, I do not know which, a meeting of the sort which I am talking about actually took place in the Jordanian capital in April 1979 and lasted 4 days, from the 11th to the 15th of that month. However, it was not under the supervision of the Arab League or at its initiative, but was at the initiative and under the supervision of the international research institute of New York City. For this symposium, the institute assembled Arab and foreign experts, from all Arab countries and some foreign ones--specialists in all affairs, regardless of their position of responsibility. They met to discuss the state of this "Arab world in the transition stage." As for "transition" from what to what, I do not know, but what is proved is that this world is heading toward a state which is different from that it is in now. How I would have liked it if our ministers who are to meet, then our kings and presidents afterward, were to be guided by the conclusions of this symposium and did not abandon them to the benefit of the Aspen Institute alone, which is the name of the international research institute in New York City!

In our opinion, the Arab countries which are meeting must set forth a general, comprehensive plan for Arab development, because balanced, integrated Arab development is a basic, necessary thing for true regional development and is also very essential for preserving the natural development of every country and keeping Arab disputes, which in reality reflect economic disputes, from flaring up.

Speed of development must be in harmony with human absorptive power in economic, material, and social terms. What has happened in Iran offers an economic explanation of revolution besides the other political and religious justifications. The Shah wanted to achieve more than was possible in all fields at exceptional speed and he thus gave room for social and economic "takeoff" and the development of obscenely rich classes, wretchedly poor classes and classes of parasites and middlemen. "The lack of balance between major industrial development, the construction of towns and military development, on the one hand, and rural agricultural development on the other, was to some extent responsible for the economic problems and popular unrest in Iran. Achievements in specific sectors of Iranian society created deficiencies and grumbling in other ones."

However, foreigners consider, as we ourselves do, that the need to deal with the Arab nation as a single economic and social unit is still urgent. If this is not happening now through Arab unity, let it happen through real integration, so that every king or president will remain in his seat, provided that he paves the way for the growth of intrinsic Arab power. It is this integration which will give every Arab country the power of the entire Arab group. It is this which will prevent any of them from being weak and falling apart because of its particular conditions.

Perhaps the national charter which President Saddam Husayn recommended will be somewhat of an attempt in this direction, as an alternative to the National Action Charter which existed between Syria and Iraq. Let us recognize that the National Action Charter between Syria and Iraq had the aroma of an axis which could have turned the Ba'th, after it was united, into a major revolutionary force exerring pressure. However, the national charter now seems closer to reality and more likely to get all regimes respond to it, in view of the guarantees it offers them. The greatest of these guarantees is the fact that no country will attempt to resolve its problems with another country by force. Internal Arab struggles, as we have stated above, use up three quarters of Arab strength. Every Arab country, including Iraq, Syria and the Sultanate of Oman, for example, needed the power of the entire Arab group in order to stand up to various pressures.

Perhaps Iraq felt the need for stronger guarantees in the national charter than a mere meeting of kings and presidents and agreement on that. It called for a popular conference in Baghdad in which many Arab political organizations and personalities took part. It is noteworthy that among the things this conference called for was the issuance of a charter on Arab human rights.

The Correct Start

Perhaps this will be the correct start. A charter for the rights of Arab man: his human, social, political and economic rights. Arab man everywhere, so that the rights and privileges of Arab man will be no greater in any country than they are in any other country. To embody this in practice, the Arab League should be transformed from a league of states to a league of states and peoples, through the creation of a united Arab parliament in which the representation of peoples will be achieved through free election by numbers and in which representation of governments will be achieved through equal numbers.

We have in mind, for example, two national assemblies (one for Arab representatives elected by free direct election under the supervision of the Arab League and the second for senators to which every country will appoint three or four representatives). The assembly of senators will have the right to abrogate any decree taken by the assembly of representatives which might diminish the sovereignty of any state. Thus balance between the desires and interests of peoples and the wishes and interests of regimes will be achieved.

A supreme Arab court of justice within the context of the league is essential. This court, which has been one of the league's dreams, has not yet been realized. The supreme court of justice would be composed of a number of senior Arab judges representing all Arab member countries, on the stipulation that they be appointed by election through judiciary committees in every country as a guarantee of the independence and impartiality of the judges. The decrees of this court will be decisive in basic disputes arising over the interpretation of the "national charter," since this charter will be tantamount to a federal constitution of the Arab nation.

As for the kings and presidents of the Arab states, or the Arab summit, they will be the collective leadership of the nation and the supreme political authority which will adopt its decisions by majority; these decisions will only be valid following agreement by the assemblies of representatives and senators. It will be possible for the summit to elect every year for a period of 1 year a president who will have the honor of representing the whole nation in international gatherings and of speaking in its name concerning all matters which arise.

To this end, I said at the beginning of the article that it would be best when the Arab foreign and economics ministers meet next July in Amman if the ministers of defense and education and the ministers of labor, information, culture, interior and all ministers also attended, because, if the national charter is to be a real national charter, political and economic affairs cannot be conducted apart from defense, security, education, finance and all other matters. If Arab man attains his rights in the national charter, Arab wealth will be a common national resource whose affairs will be managed by a central Arab monetary bank, the Arab Monetary Fund--which, by the way, the Aspen symposium considered a pressing need which one could not ignore.

Therefore, until this kind of charter which we are talking about is realized, a country like Libya which proceeds to build a reinforced concrete wall 300 kilometers long at a cost of $3 billion will not have been the first Arab country to do so. The walls which exist between these countries are stronger than reinforced concrete and are making Arab disputes bear fruit.

PRIME MINISTER EXAMINES INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION PROBLEMS

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 1-2 Aug 80 pp 1,3

[Excerpt] As part of a program of visits of inspection and working sessions, Prime Minister Ben Ahmed Abdelghani and Minister of Agriculture and Agrarian Reform Salim Saadi went to the wilayas of Annaba and Guelma the day before yesterday, Thursday. The prime minister was also accompanied in his visit by Mr Benblidia, from the Ministry of Planning, and by Khalfa Mameri, director of studies in the Prime Minister's Office.

After being greeted by Bouhedja Said, national party commissioner for Annaba, and by Abdelaziz Madoui, wali of Annaba, the prime minister went directly to the Les Salines area to look at the pumping wells and installations built to alleviate the problem of water supply for the town of Annaba and for the steel industrial complex of El-Hadjar. Immediately after this, the prime minister went to the port of Annaba to see the progress made in the construction of the mineral port and, in more general terms, to assess the conditions under which the port is being used and managed.

Next, the prime minister and accompanying delegation went to visit the El-Hadjar steel industrial complex where after being greeted by Ait Hocine, director general of the SNS [National Steel Company], by the director of the plant and by the chairman of the Plant Workers' Assembly, Abdelghani expressed interest in the various problems connected with the expansion of the industrial complex and with the social situation of the workers, problems which were explained to him by the ATU [Plant Workers' Assembly] chairman.

In the industrial district of Annaba, the prime minister stopped to visit a cooperative where they process the sugar beet crop from the area of Bou-Namoussa. During his visit to the wilaya of Guelma, the prime minister went to the SOGEDIA [Food Industries Management and Development Company] plant which processes the sugar beet crops grown in the two wilayas visited as well as imported brown sugar. The tour of the plant was followed by a working session during which the wali and the plant officials had a chance to explain the operational problems of the plant.

Expansion Problems in the Industrial Zone of Annaba

On Thursday, Abdelghani, member of the Central Committee and prime minister, went to Annaba and Guelma where he spent the day making tours of inspection and holding working sessions. He was accompanied by Salim Saadi, member of the Central Committee and minister of agriculture and agrarian reform, by the secretary general of the Ministry of Planning and Land Development and by the director of studies in the Prime Minister's Office.

After being met at Les Salines Airport by civilian and military authorities form the wilaya of Annaba, Abdelghani and Salim Saadi went to the pumping station located near the airport where local officials gave them detailed explanations concerning the project to develop water resources in Annaba and its region. The project consists of two dams, the dam on the Chiffia with a reservoir of 95 million cubic meters and the dam on the Mexena with a reservoir of 150 million cubic meters, both of which will supply water for agricultural, industrial and domestic use. The project also includes nine pumping wells. The Annaba-Les Salines pumping station, almost completed and already pumping 1,200 liters per second, is 3 years behind schedule. The dam on the Chiffia already holds a volume of 34 million cubic meters of water which can be used.

It has been estimated that the town of Annaba requires 1,742 liters of water per second. Right now the town is only getting 1,490 liters per second but if all goes well, the town will receive 1,970 liters per second by April 1981 and 2,260 liters per second by 1982.

Therefore the problem of the town's water supply will be solved for several years to come although in the long run it is absolutely essential to build the dam on the Mexena, the wali said.

It must also be pointed out that a substantial portion of the water now available--some mention the figure of 50 percent--gets lost in the distribution network which is very old. From what the prime minister was told, it seems that the SNS [National Steel Company] requirements are being satisfied but nothing has changed as regards the volume of water allocated to agriculture and the population continues to suffer from water shortages. This is why people are impatiently waiting for the reservoir volume of the Chiffia dam to increase from 34 million to 95 million cubic meters, for the pumping wells to be fully operational and, above all, for the construction of the Mexena dam (150 million cubic meters).

After this, the ministerial delegation went to the port of Annaba to inspect the extension work being done on the southern pier of the mineral port where 83 percent of the construction work has been completed. They have already built 174 meters of the 322-meter long pier. When the project, where work has been going on for 4 years, is completed, the port will accommodate ships of between 50 and 70,000 tons. In its present state, the mineral port receives 10,000 tons of coal a day and has storage yards holding 90,000 tons. After explaining to the prime minister how work is progressing and the goals of this phase of expansion, the local authorities mentioned long-term expansion plans without which some of the port traffic will have to be diverted to other ports.

Shortly after this, the prime minister and his party went to El-Hadjar where they visited the facilities of its large steel industrial complex.

Before touring, among others, the coking-plant, the blast-furnace number 2 and the 225-cubic meter silo which collapsed last May pulling down two conveyors, an extractor, a weighing machine and a coal hopper sprout, (...) Abdelghani listened to reports presented by the director of the complex and the ATU chairman on the situation in the complex and did so in the presence of the SNS director general.

The El-Hadjar industrial complex, Boudraa said in substance, employs 17,000 (seventeen thousand) workers in its own facilities and 15,000 (fifteen thousand) more in its by-products plants.

The prime minister asked the director of the industrial complex to tell him about the incident which took place last June, about environmental problems and about general problems in the industrial complex.

The Belgian construction firm, Casse Sambre, is fully responsible for the incident in early June, Boudraa replied.

Abdelghani wondered about the silence which had surrounded the incident in contrast with the outcry that such a negligence would have provoked if Algerian cadres had been the ones responsible for it.

He also reiterated the need to trust Algerian cadres as the president of the republic and secretary general of the FLN has advised time and time again.

To launch its second phase, Boudraa went on to say, the industrial complex requires 200 liters of water per second above its current water allocation (of 350 liters per second). In the final phase, the centers' requirements of water for industrial use will jump by 50 liters per second until they reach a total volume of 800 liters per second. But what is badly needed is drinking water. The industrial complex gets less than half of the drinking water it needs and the workers are forced to drink water which is not potable.

Going down the list of problems in the plant, Boudraa mentioned the problem of bringing products and raw materials to the complex and the problem of carrying the finished product to the consumers. In this matter he said, we are concerned thinking of what will happen in the next 4 years.

Finally, he emphasized the need to increase the number of ways of access to the complex by rail, especially the need to build a double track for the Ramdane Djamel-Constantine railroad line now under construction and the need to redevelop the coupler circuits of the Annaba region.

"As regards accommodation, Boudraa said, we need 9,000 apartments. Of course, we could build them outselves as agreed with the Ministry of Housing and with the wilaya but our engineering company requires financial aid to become adapted to housing construction." (...) Speaking about the problem of transportation for his personnel, the director of the complex reported on the efforts deployed in that sphere. We have, he said, 60 buses traveling 14,000 kilometers a day on 28 routes. Given their high rate of use, the condition of the roads and the lack of spare parts, the average life of a bus is less than one year. The SNTF [National Railroad Transportation Company] is not an alternative solution. This company tends to give priority to the transportation of freight and is not convenient for the workers who must walk several kilometers from their homes to the station and from the station to the complex. Nonetheless, 1,900 workers commute to work by train every day.

The director went on to talk about administrative problems mentioning, among others, the large amount of paperwork, the lack of spare parts, the rejection of aid contracts because they are too costly, for reasons of renewal or licenses (...) saying that all these difficulties are a heavy burden on the day-by-day running of the complex. For instance, the work of the shop which repairs and manufactures spare parts and units and which was created to cut down on imports, is being jeopardized by the cuts in technical assistance and by the rejection of contracts with the result that the number of assistants in that shop has dropped from 30 to 15.

When the prime minister asked about relations between management and the ATU, the director of the complex said that relations are generally good and are marked by a frank dialog, by an effective cooperation in the implementation of a number of tasks which are important for the complex (...). However, some differences of opinion exist as regards the main working methods, social matters and so on. ATU chairman Dehmi said at this point that, indeed, they still have differences of opinion on the issues of working methods and working conditions in the complex.

"We insist and, in fact, will not compromise on the subject of democratization in the activities of the industrial complex. We believe that the workers have something to say regarding all the problems of the complex regardless of their nature. (...) They are asked to produce and have done so with courage and dedication. In exchange, we are asking that they be heard on matters of work organization, management, working conditions and others, since these questions affect the stability of the work force, the tempo and rate of production and the health of the plant's workers. (...)"

The ATU chairman gave a list of the major points of friction (health and safety, transportation, social medicine, housing, restoration and democratization of activities in the plant) between the workers' representatives and management. Stressing the question of working conditions, the ATU chairman mentioned fatal accidents--4 in 1978, 8 in 1979 and 3 during the first 6 months of 1980--, inadequate infrastructure, shortcomings in the amount and quality of restoration work, water shortage, lack of means of transportation and so on. Then, the director of the complex spoke about the working areas where they have had a higher number of accidents and said "that apart from those resulting in fatal casualties, accidents in the complex are less frequent and less serious than in the rest of the SNS plants or in steel plants in foreign countries. He then explained the measures taken to reduce the number of accidents particularly in some sectors (working areas with the highest accident rates, automotive traffic inside the plant).

Finally, the mentioned the difficulties created mostly by the Ministry of Planning when they try to implement social programs (nursery schools, holidays and resting centers, medical and social centers, sports grounds and so on), programs prepared in collaboration with the workers' representatives...

During the discussion and throughout his visit to the installations, the prime minister showed that he was very interested in the problems of the industrial complex asking questions on the use of the equipment, on production methods, on working conditions and on the technical supervisory staff. He congratulated the plant workers (management, ATU, cadres and groups) for the progress which they have made in all spheres and assured them that the government is aware of the difficulties which they are still facing.

After visiting the El-Hadjar industrial complex, the prime minister and his party went to the sugar beet cooperative grouping some 40 agricultural exploitations and covering a total area of 1,300 hectares. Sugar beet farming--which is not encouraged and requires a large labor force apparently not available in the Annaba region--seems to be having problems. Producers only do this type of farming when they are compelled or forced and even then it is done marginally over very small areas. The yield per hectare is also very low. The yield for the 1973-74 season was 12 tons per hectare; on the following season it was 8 tons per hectare; in 1975-76, it was 10 tons; in 1177-78, 12 tons; in 1978-79, 6 tons and in 1979-80, 8.568 tons.

The farmers' reluctance is obvious if one compares the area actually planted in a case in which the target was to plant 2,025 hectares. Only 1,798 hectares were planted during the 1977-78 season and on the following year they planted 131 hectares less. In this same example, the yield was 19,660 tons for the first season mentioned and 13,954 tons for the following year.

After touring the cooperative installations, the prime minister asked about the reasons why the farmers refuse to grow sugar beet, what causes the low yields, and what would be the consequences of reconverting the cooperative and of abandoning such risky farming. In their answers, local officials were unanimously in favor of reconversion.

PRIME MINISTER REVIEWS PROBLEMS IN CONTEXT OF 5-YEAR PLAN

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 8-9 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[APS article: "To Strike a Balance Between the Targets and the Ability to Meet Them"]

[Text] The Prime Minister Visits Oran and Mostaganem

Prime Minister Abdelghani was in Oran on Thursday on a visit of inspection and work. He was accompanied by Minister of Housing Ahmed Ghazali and Minister of Education and Scientific Research Abdelhak Bererhi, both members of the Central Committee, by senior officials working on the plan and by the ministers' close assistants.

Abdelghani and the ministerial delegation accompanying him arrived in the western capital in the morning and were greeted by local authorities, notably by the wali of Oran, the deputy CNP [National Party Commissioner], a representative of the ANP [People's National Army] and the directors of the wilaya's external departments.

Abdelghani chaired a working session, held at the wilaya headquarters, to discuss matters of housing and education--particularly university education--and problems related to supplies. This preliminary conversation enabled the participants to take stock of the situation, assess the needs and review the difficulties. Abdelghani presented these questions mostly in the context of the various development plans and more particularly of the 5-year plan. In this respect, said the prime minister during the discussion, our efforts must be directed towards striking a balance between our means and the list of development projects which can be carried out in each wilaya. The prime minister underscored the fact that officials must be careful in the selection and management of the tasks which they want to undertake so as to be able to carry out the projects needed to make their regions prosperous. This is particularly important, he said, in view of the fact that two-thirds of the 5-year plan consist of activities intended to complete many projects and tasks started under previous plans.

This is why he asked officials to show precision and a correct sense of evaluation when they work out their programs. "One should not present proposals which, from an economic viewpoint, are not directly based on the realities of the region and which cannot be carried out. What should be done is to take into account the human factor, the material elements likely to turn these proposals into a reality within the required time span to avoid falling behind schedule time and time again, to avoid having to reassess costs and unnecessarily wasting energy and resources..."

A New Town Will Be Built in Bethioua

After outlining the spirit and substance of the national development effort, the prime minister opened the dialog between the local authorities and the ministries involved, in this case, the Ministries of Housing and Higher Education. In this framework, the wali of Oran reviewed the housing situation in his wilaya where there had been a very rapid economic and social development, and accelerated population growth with the resulting migration. The large industrial plants built in Arzew and Oran have created huge housing requirements. Consequently, the housing deficit, which in 1977 was estimated to amount to 89,700 dwellings, will start at more than 56,000 dwellings by 1984. More than 27,000 housing units were built under programs included in previous plans or under private initiative and the theoretical deficit projected for 1984 has been cut down to 29,000 units. The 12,000 housing units scheduled to be built under the 5-year plan will eventually be substracted from that figure. In terms of land, 1,000 additional hectares of developed land will be required. With this in mind, the wilaya of Oran has established the following targets: to grant permission for the urban development required to meet the citizens' applications; to build integrated housing; to protect agricultural land with high yields and to cut down on the commuting time between the place of work and home. To achieve this goal , there have been studies dealing with regional development, with projects of general urban development for the areas of Oran, Arzew and Oued-Tlelat. They have also conducted detailed studies on the ZHUN [expansion unknown], on communal lands, on the renovation of older districts and of industrial districts. A renovation of the housing stock is also underway.

A new town, Araba, will be built near Bethioua to alleviate the housing shortage mostly in the industrial area of Arzew. It will add 10,000 units to the region's rural housing. But construction work in the wilaya is affected by the lack of resources, of adequate studies and of certain materials. Based on these facts, Minister of Housing Ahmed Ali Gazhali spoke about the need to restructure the construction companies on a local and national level to achieve better results. The minister also noted that studies must be carefully drawn up and must offer every guarantee of being practicable. Therefore, a better balance must be achieved between resources and targets in the sphere of housing.

In the wilaya of Oran, the minister would like, among other things, to see the ZHUN becoming a reality, to have more building lots and to renovate the older districts.

As a first measure to solve the problem of the lack of auxiliary industries in the housing sector, the prime minister announced that 1,000 carpentry shops and 1,000 flooring plants will be created all over the country to supply the housing industry. Abdelghani also stressed the need to finish building the University of Science and Technology in Oran where work seems to be way behind scheduled since it did not start seriously until April 1980. The discussion of problems related to education were to continue mainly between the minister of higher education and scientific research and local representatives.

The subject of the new university city, which has been closed since they had an accidental fire there, was also discussed. Unfortunately, its facilities cannot be reopened for safety reasons. That university city will remain closed until an alternative solution is found. Several proposals have been put forward by the local authorities. On this point, the prime minister called for this problem to be resolved since the beginning of the new academic year is approaching. He also hoped that the wilaya will be allocated a quota of accommodations in the University of Oran. The infrastructure for higher education is developing from year to year in the region but remains insufficient in the spheres of student accommodation and teachers. Solutions were put forward to solve these problems.

The working session went on to discuss the problems of supplies which are not too serious in the wilaya of Oran.

Towards the end of the meeting, marked by a frank and constructive dialog, the prime minister urged the local authorities to do their best to ensure a harmonious development in their wilaya.

Next, the ministerial delegation headed by Abdelghani visited the working site of the USTO [Oran University of Science and Technology] and then went to Mostaganem where it arrived in the afternoon and proceeded to visit the SONIC [National Cellulose Industries Company] paper plant, the SOGEDIA [Food Industries Management and Development Company] plant, the harbor, the wilaya construction company and the university city. During these visits, the prime minister and ministers accompanying him discussed the problems which the wilaya authorities are facing.

Mostaganem: Problems of the SONIC Paper Plant

Immediately after being greeted by the wilaya authorities, the ministerial delegation went to the SONIC paper plant. The prime minister was told about operating conditions in the plant and particularly about water supply problems and electricity outages which cause costly disruptions in production. A 3-hour cut in their water supply results in a 24-hour stop of production. If the water cuts last 24 hours, production stops for 3 days to which must be added a great deal of work to get the machinery back into working order.

The SONIC plant requires 2,200 cubic meters of water per hour. In most instances, the water cuts are due to the low-water season of the Cheliff and to the conservation requirements applying to the ground water reservoir which feeds the plant. But sometimes the water cuts are the result of electricity outages which prevent the SONADE [National Company for the Distribution of Drinking Water and Water for Industrial Use] facilities from operating. Production, which at the moment stands below the plant's capabilities, can only be increased if the difficult problem of water supply is solved.

During the year of 1979, water cuts resulted in 3,519 hours of production stoppages. Also, these difficult conditions of operation in the plant have affected the stability of the qualified personnel. Out of 104 trained staff members, 42 have left.

Profitable Investments

As regards marketing, it must be pointed out that the price which the producer gets for 1 kilo of paper, which is 4.50 dinars, has not changed since 1975, while the consumer has to pay as much as 11.50 dinars today. Large profits are made by the retailers. Also, there have been considerable increases in the prices of all the raw materials and products used to make the paper.

As for the harmful effects on the environment, the plant officials have given reassurances that as soon as production goes back to normal, pollution will fall down to tolerable levels. Right now, the evacuation of residual waters into the sea and the smoke coming out of the plant chimneys are harmful. Very heavy investments were necessary to build the plant and it must show a profit all the more so since the project is part of the policy of increasing the value of the country's raw material to make a product as important as paper.

In the SOGEDIA sugar refinery, which the prime minister visited next, the situation is slightly better as regards production. However, the results achieved so far must be consolidated and developed. This plant transforms imported brown sugar into lumps and sugarloaves of white crystallized sugar.

Most of the specialized staff working at the SOGEDIA refinery was trained on the job which is why the ATU chairman told the prime minister about their need for training programs. The removal of the output is also a problem and affects workers' productivity. The ONACO [Algerian National Marketing Office] faces problems of transportation and cannot ensure the regular evacuation of the finished product.

Port: a Dredger Out of Operation for 3 Months

Next, the prime minister paid a visit to the port of Mostaganem where traffic has increased considerably in recent years. In addition to the ships calling there regularly, the port also accommodates ships initially going to the ports of Oran and Algiers. Dredging operations are needed in the port and although work started it was not completed because the dredger broke down several months ago. The port of Mostaganem is not congested thanks to the hard work of the port employees. Of all the Algerian ports, Mostaganem seems to be the one with the highest productivity.

At Mostagenem university campus--which was built by SOTRAMO [Mostagenem Construction Company] in the amazing short time of 15 months--the prime minister visited various buildings and was told about current and future projects of extension. The same company is now building a 500-bed residential university city.

The SOTRAMO offices and yards were the last stop in the minister's tour. SOTRAMO makes an important contribution to the development of the wilaya and since it was created, it has done over 170 millions worth of business. Its main field of activities is found in the sphere of the agrarian reform. Being well organized, the SOTRAMO finances its own machinery which maintains its value. In addition to doing projects, the company produces construction materials and supplies goods used in construction work. The company owns a tile factory, a briquette manufacturing plant and a carpentry shop.

COUNTRY'S AGRICULTURAL SITUATION ANALYZED

Meeting of Wilaya Coordinators

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 24 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] Algiers (APS)--A meeting of wilaya coordinators of the National Union of Algerian Peasants (UNPA) was held yesterday morning at Party headquarters (Place des Martyrs), in the presence of Mohamed Djeghaba, Ahmed Sebaa and Aissa Nadjem, members of the Central Committee and respectively president of the Party's general organization commission, department mass organizations official and UNPA secretary general.

During this meeting, the participants presented their thoughts on three important problems in the agricultural sector. The topics included the organizational situation at the level of the various wilayas, the results of the harvesting-threshing season and the problem of commercialization after the recent measures taken by the ministry of agriculture and the agrarian revolution.

The last-named topic aroused great interest on the part of participants. In fact, the delegates of the Algerian peasants were slightly in agreement with the ministerial decision to liberalize the market, while at the same time expressing a great number of reservations.

The coordinators were especially apprehensive about the seizure and control of the market by the president [mandataire]. They wanted to know most particularly whether the latter will not take the opportunity offered to him to create situations of shortages and thereby even speculate on prices.

The meeting continued throughout the afternoon.

Signs of Change in Agricultural Sector

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 24 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Said Mouas]

[Text] Oran--Agriculture is to the Ain-Temouchent region what the sea is to the fisherman. The region draws its wealth from agriculture just as the fisherman draws his from the sea. The land makes demands; and it is here that the fellah, as everywhere else, is faced by problems which are as difficult as they are varied.

In this vast daira, one of the country's largest, agricultural activity has experienced many disruptions which have led officials at certain times to rethink their actions. It was precisely for this purpose that a meeting was held recently in the daira offices which assembled all the authorities involved in agricultural questions.

A report summarizing the principal aspects of the situation was presented on that occasion.

With a view to better defining the situation and examining the problems down to their smallest details, the debate at the meeting covered all aspects inherent in the agricultural sector: social and organizational techniques. Before taking up the problem in-depth, it seems useful to provide some specifics about the structural and ambient framework of the region.

In this region, there are 64 self-managed entities, 2 CAPAM (Moudjahidine Production Cooperative) and 149 CAPRA (Agricultural Production Cooperative of the Agrarian Revolution) sharing about 114,927 hectares with 3,404 small fellahs.

Naturally, the self-managed sector has the lion's share. With a total land area of 77,365 hectares, it employs 7,367 laborers, including 1,902 seasonal workers. However, its output is far below the expected yield. This year's production was described as low in this section despite the fact that resources seemed relatively sufficient. Thus the average yield per crop was as follows: 6 quintals of grain per hectare, 3 quintals-hectare of dried legumes, 20 quintals-hectare of wine grapes and 25 quintals-hectare of aboriculture.

The agrarian revolution sector covers an area of 25,928 hectares and has 149 CAPRA. Most of the CAPRA are concentrated around El-Amria (Hassi, 58; El Ghella, 28, Ain-Temouchent, 15; and Ain Tolba, 6). Some 1,321 assignees of the agrarian revolution are attached to these structures.

Improper Production Techniques

As for the private sector, it is now handling 10,366 hectares. The profitability of this sector is slightly higher than that of the other sectors (8 quintals-hectare of grains; 40 quintals-hectare of wine grapes and 35 quintals-hectare of aboriculture). These results reveal at least one thing: the agrarian revolution and self-managed sectors are basically able to greatly exceed their present productions. Problems of all kinds can be cited which are keeping the socialist sector from reaching production levels worthy of its possibilities but how these problems are to be resolved continues to be a question of the commitment and the awareness of their responsibilities on the part of the workers.

This indoctrination effort is the responsibility of the Party and the mass organizations. Of course, this point alone should not be used as a pretext for the kinds of dismissals being manifested.

There are three kinds of objective restraints:

--In the first place, techniques! The financing of some projects requires sizable credits which the production units do not always obtain. As we know, the BNA [National Bank of Algeria] makes loans on the basis of the situation of these units. By facilitating the procedure for the granting of loans to interested parties as much as possible, the Bank would in part resolve their problems.

A second point relating to the expansion of water resources construction work would permit recovery of large expanses of land. Of a total of 270 watering sites noted throughout the daira, only 107 are equipped for the irrigation of 1,135 hectares. In the communes of Hassi, El Ghella and El-Amria, land development work has been delayed for lack of credits. There are also soil protection and restoration activities through reforestation and the installation of traversable roads [banquettes] through fertile lands and at higher elevations in Ain Tolba and Aghlal, in particular, and repair of local roads whose poor condition is the cause of many breakdowns of agricultural equipment, etc.

Uncultivated lands cover an area of 16,974 hectares. The size of this area, principally at the level of the production units, permits intensification of sheepraising, up to 3,000 head. For the moment, livestock production falls within the jurisdiction of the self-managed sector with a total of 5,215 head (4,318 sheep and 897 cattle). Also, supplies of fodder (4,055 quintals the past season) are large enough to permit the installation of sheep and cattle fattening areas.

The opening of poultry centers, "chickens for meat and egg production" would respond to a necessity: the need to check the price rises affecting the sale of these products which have become the preferred target of all kinds of speculators who abound in the urban centers and who have succeeded in setting up veritable full-blown poultry "industries" on their own property or elsewhere. Judicious control of this parallel private poultry market and an increase in the number of production centers in the state sector would have the immediate result of isolating the phony poultry raisers who are getting rich at a breathtaking rate following the sharp rise in the price of meat.

Among the reasons for low yields, it is worth noting the insufficiency of high-powered tractors, climatic hazards and improper production techniques.

15 Socialist Agricultural Villages Scheduled

Added to all these technical problems there is a no less important factor affecting the workers' standard of living. The housing program in the self-managed and agrarian revolution sectors, once completed, will very appreciably change the social environment of those who work the land. Fifteen socialist agricultural villages will be built in the next decade, including three in Aghlal, two in El-Amria, two in Temouchent and two in Terga. These four localities, therefore, share a total of 10 projects. This grandiose program will complement the one now being carried out in Aghlal, Ain-Tolba, Terga and El-Malah, where about 100 housing units per agricultural village are scheduled. Let us state parenthetically that the construction through self-financing of the socialist village of Messada Ben-Badis (El-Malah commune) which was started about 5 years ago is still having problems.

For its part, the self-managed sector has 626 housing units of which 19 are in the completion stage in Chaabat El-Leham. The needs of this sector have also increased.

Along with housing, education presents another problem which is facing students who are having difficulty getting to their respective schools on a daily basis.

An increase in old-age pensions and standardization of family allowances vis-a-vis other sectors are also the aspirations of the fellah group in the daira.

Production and productivity cannot be disassociated from these problems. Moreover, there is one problem, which because of its implications, impacts upon production. In this instance, the problem is one of the technical environment; i.e., the entire chain of structures which support the farmers and condition the attainment of their objectives. We will mention three of these structures:

--the ONAMA [National Agricultural Equipment Office]: this office is not entirely fulfilling its responsibilities vis-a-vis production centers which are poorly supplied with spare parts and which are complaining of not being assisted technically in matters of mechanical breakdowns and the drilling of wells.

--the CAPCS [Communal Multi-Service Agriculture Cooperative]: this office is marking time at present, particularly as regards anything having to do with supplies and commercialization. The problem of transportation and packaging continues to have an impact on the producer-consumer cycle.

--the COFEL [Fruit and Vegetable Cooperative]: the Temouchent branch supplies that of Sisi-Bel-Abbes in the amount of 50 percent, in conformance with a not-too-rigid circular, which does not in any way take into consideration the needs of the daira itself. We wonder why the COFEL of the wilaya administrative seat would not do the same thing.

The wilaya director of the organization in question apparently made commitments to equip the Temouchent COFEL with trucks and packaging equipment. Not only was nothing done but what is more the packaging equipment sent to Sidi-Bel-Abbes was not returned. In any event, the COFEL is not doing its job of regulator; and the difficulties observed in the flow of products derive in large measure from these contradictions.

Agricultural development in the Ain-Temouchent daira has never experienced a more favorable situation. The decisions made in this regard by the second meeting of the Central Committee, the many ministerial debates which are taking place in this period and above all the installation of communal delegations of the agrarian revolution are as many encouraging signs and the precursors of change. It is time for agriculture to recover the position which belongs to it in the national economic configuration.

Improvement in Skikda

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 22-23 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Rachid Souilah]

[Text] In the Skikda wilaya, the harvesting-threshing season is progressing satisfactorily, with account taken of the efforts made by the wilays services and the directorate of agriculture, on the one hand, and the material resources utilized, on the other hand.

The season is scheduled to end on 25 August, while last year it ended on 15 September. This appreciable saving of time is due to the preparation in the materials sector which took place in an organized manner and which thus was able to respond favorably to the needs of agricultural exploitation for equipment; e.g., harvester-threshers and baggers. In fact, with the purchase this year of 20 harvester-threshers, the wilaya of Skikda found itself equipped with 128 pieces of agricultural machinery. This permitted an enormous speedup in harvesting operations. What is more, the timesaving is already permitting the start of work on the preparation of the soil for the next plowing-sowing season.

As for production, it is estimated that there is an appreciable production increase which ranges from 5 and 10 percent, depending upon the crop, compared to the last season. Thus the overall forecasts for harvests are on the order of 355,000 quintals compared to the 320,000 quintals obtained in 1979; i.e., an increase of 35,000 quintals.

We should point out that this improvement in production is not only due to the quality of the work done, particularly in the weeding operations, but also to the good distribution of rains which were favorable this year to grain crops.

Moreover, the objectives of the 1980 season which set their sights on a total surface of 41,834 hectares permitted the recording of per crop production which breaks down as follows:

--Hard wheat: 31,000 hectares, soft wheat: 7,400 hectares; barley: 1,500 hectares; oats: 1,394 hectares.

As can be noted, hard wheat represented 70 percent of production, followed by barley, 22 percent, oats, 7.5 percent, and finally, soft wheat, 0.5 percent [as published].

Availability of Spare Parts

In the equipment sector, it is worth noting the improvements registered both in the inventory of machinery area, which was bolstered by 26 harvester-threshers, and in the breakdown area that improved considerably compared to last year which had a 30 percent breakdown rate for the entire season.

This year the rate of breakdowns did not exceed 15 percent. This improvement was possible thanks to the much improved availability of spare parts at the ONAMA level, which is providing regular supplies. The situation is the same as regards bagging machinery, fuel and lubricants which covered all the wilaya's needs during the season.

In the technical sector, the directorate of agriculture installed a technical team which was responsible for monitoring the harvesting-threshing operations and the ONAMA sent two teams of breakdown mechanics equipped with vehicles containing the tools needed for the on-site repair of machinery.

These teams did a fine job, and their efforts produced the excellent results which we cited earlier. Nevertheless, it continues to be desirable for these teams to be beefed up by the ONAMA in the future; this would make it possible to give coverage to all the communes of the wilaya.

As regards the collection of grain production, this is handled by the CERECOOP [? Grain Cooperative] which is exerting great efforts, particularly through the establishment of a motor park for trucks which are dispatched to meet the demand of the producers. Because of this arrangement, the collecting of the harvests is accomplished regularly to the great satisfaction of the fellahs.

Finally, the problems encountered are to be found principally in the sector of inadequate storage facilities. In fact, it is estimated that for lack of warehouses in sufficient number unwarehoused grain will total 20,000 quintals this year.

However, the CERECOOP, alerted by the directorate of agriculture, apparently has already taken steps to handle this situation by building suitable storage sites, according to the conclusion reached by officials responsible for the management of agriculture, the agrarian revolution and the forests.

As can be readily observed, thanks to the concerted efforts of all parties (local authorities, offices, cooperatives, farmers), the harvesting-threshing season has been crowned by excellent results in the Skikda wilaya. It is to be hoped that the satisfactory results obtained will be multiplied in the coming years, and this in response to national needs in the grain sector.

HARVEST PROGRESS, PROBLEMS REPORTED

80 Percent of Crops Harvested

[Text] The harvesting and threshing campaign, which started on 15 August, is in progress all over the country. These activities should be completed by 15 August. Eighty percent of the crops have been harvested by now. Many farmers would like to finish the harvest before the Aid festivities. But to do so they must work even harder to overcome obstacles of a material and human nature. In addition to the insufficiencies arising in the sphere of transportation of the grain, which at times force the farmers to stop their harvesting and threshing activities to take care of that transportation, the harvest has raised the problem of a shortage of manpower.

As the labor force gets older, there is no younger generation to take over. Temporary solutions have been tried out to meet this shortage but they are only stopgap solutions. Pensioners and seasonal young workers have been recruited to bring in the grain harvest for daily wages of 35 Algerian dinars.

Also, when the harvest is finished, the land is not allowed to lie fallow. With the practice of transhumance, the fields are subjected to overgrazing which has very bad consequences.

However, it is acknowledged that while adequate, the 1980 harvest is not an exceptionally good one. Self sufficiency in grain production is still a goal to be achieved and Algeria continues to import large quantities of grain. To be selfsufficient, serious problems must be overcome.

Harvest Progress in Mascara Wilaya

Algiers LA NATION in French 6 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] Mascara (APS)--Harvesting and threshing activities, going on at a brisk pace in the wilaya of Mascara, are coming to an end since 80 percent of the crops have been harvested. So far, 859 quintals of grain have been harvested, of which 445,000 quintals came from the socialist sector, 95,100 quintals from the agrarian reform sector and 319,500 quintals from the private sector. These figures represent crops harvested in an area of 78,495 hectares out of the total area of 95,444 hectares planted throughout the wilaya. The harvest is expected to be over by the middle of August.

The DARAW [expansion unknown] officials reckon that by the end of the season the wilaya will have produced over 1 million quintals of grain. If this figure is reached, it will set a record in production since last year's yield was 582,692 quintals and the previous year's production was in the order of 342,103 quintals. The current harvest is taking place under very satisfactory conditions thanks to the mechanized equipment which includes 236 combine-harvesters.

The difficulties arising at the beginning of the harvesting season, which were due to the shortage of manpower, since the workers were busy with other crops such as potatoes and onions, were solved in good time by recruiting seasonal workers from neighboring regions.

It must also be pointed out that the hay harvest ended a short while ago in the wilaya. This harvest involved 24,831 hectares of fields where 495,000 quintals of hay were harvested: 223,000 quintals from lands belonging to the selfmanagement sector, 51,000 quintals from lands belonging to the agrarian reform sector and 221,000 quintals from privately owned lands. This volume of production will be enough to meet the wilaya's requirements of livestock fodder. This crop registered a significant increase being 174,614 quintals in excess of last year's crop which amounted to 320,386 quintals.

INADEQUATE STORAGE FACILITIES REPORTED

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 1-2 Aug 80 p 2

[Report: "Constantine: Inadequate Storage Facilities; Two SNNGA [National Construction Materials Company] for a Population of 500,000"]

[Text] Constantine (APS). Wednesday, at 1030 hours, inside the Galeries Algeriennes (formerly Magasin du Globe), everyone was in his assigned position, waiting with apprehension for the store to open. Since the beginning of Ramadhan this has been, for the employees of the unit, the beginning of their daily Calvary.

The employee in charge of raising the store curtain was cautious, for a huge and impatient crowd had been waiting for over one hour in front of each of the three doors.

Even before the curtain was completely raised the first customers had already rushed inside. Released, the human flood poured into the hall. In less than one minute the food products area became packed. Hundreds of people were crowded in a hall for a capacity one-twentieth of their number.

As of that point no one could move freely. Gripped in the cog, the consumer could only follow the movements of the human tide.

Access to the exhibited goods becomes a challenge and the consumer could spend a great deal blocked in front of the shelf with spices whereas he would have liked to buy some cheese. Then, after having surmounted thousands of difficulties, should he succeed in making his purchases, he is faced with the most difficult trial of going through the cash register. One could wait for hours on end in line. It is there that a high percentage of clients give up, unable physically to withstand the ultimate trial.

The six cashiers of the "general foods" area were literally besieged and crowded from all sides. Si Ahmed, the most courteous of the cashiers, the one who answers with a smile to the bad mood of the customers, is totally confused. Yet, the situation is simple: He could do his job properly only if the customers line up. This would speed up things and everyone would be served. Si Ahmed leaves his booth and tries to make order. After repeated requests for civil behavior, discipline, and reason he gives up. . . .

Anyway, this would be impossible, for even if the most disciplined among the customers would like to line up "decently," they would be unable to do so because of lack of space.

Every day is the same, one clerk in the unit points out. "In a normal period we just about managed. Now, in the midst of the Ramadhan season, the people have to come here. There is no other food outlet. Two SNNGA units cannot serve half a million people," another clerk added.

Some 100 meters away the same situation prevails in the second unit (the old Monoprix) of the SNNGA. Furthermore, let us point out the small size of the two stores which could barely accomodate the population of a big district.

Being the only ones, the two SNNGA units are subjected to strong pressure throughout the year.

The Need for a Souk El-Fellah

The same type of crowding in purchasing fruits and vegetables takes place in the enclosed market, the market on Boudjeriou Boulevard, or the "Souk El-Fellah." Here again the citizen is still harassed.

Possibilities in the area of the marketing and distribution of food remain rather slim. In a period in which big marketing areas are increasing in number throughout the country, the idea of a peasant market in Constantine has not even been considered. The city is, therefore, awaiting the implementation of a plan for small SNNGA units to be opened in the outlying districts in order to reduce the concentration in the center of the city.

Yet, even though a dozen or even more such units would be needed, the plan calls for no more than four, only one of which is under construction. It will be completed by the end of the year. Implementation of the four units planned should be seriously undertaken.

Considering the difficulties which companies and agencies directly involved in the implementation of the imports program in this first half of Ramadhan have encountered, several actions should be implemented before the market could be controlled and prices stabilized.

Thus, if substantial amounts of goods are allocated to Constantine, shipping them from the ports of Skikda and Annaba would be a major hindrance.

Most of the national companies have no transportation facilities and the wilaya has not as yet set up its own enterprise. Furthermore, the SNTR [National Road Transportation Company], the main transport organization, has only one agency in Constantine. Therefore, use has been made of private transports. This is not an advantageous solution, for the cost of such transportation is very high. Private transportation is insufficient and cannot be efficiently used.

Other problems include the lack of storage capacities. Currently there is a shortage of refrigerated areas and systems.

The volume and pace of arrivals do not always correspond to the desires of the importers. One could easily imagine, therefore, the mess which could possibly result by such insufficiencies.

Once again this year, despite the abundance of products and goods, the condition of the Constantine consumer remains quite unsatisfactory. Massive imports can resolve only part of the problem. Therefore, imports alone are insufficient.

Since the goods are available, their purchase by the citizens should be made easier. This is the first requirement if the imports program is to succeed. To achieve this, this aspect of the problem should be considered on the local level with the proper amount of interest and permanent concern should be displayed to satisfy the interests of the citizen.

FREEDOM, PROGRESS UNDER ISLAM DISCUSSED

[Article by K. B.: "Islam, Liberation and Progress"]

[Text] All young Algerians who draw moral comfort and motivations from contemporary Islamic society would find this a proper turnaround. Despite the regained freedom, following one-and-a-half centuries of oppression, and the return of the land and social justice to their legitimate beneficiaries, one age-old dimension which has molded the historical character of the Algerian people was lacking: Islam, which was one of the most powerful barriers to attempted depersonalization carried out through foreign invasions, colonialism, and feudal collaborators.

Today, Algeria with its National Charter, is clearly aware of its affiliation with the Islamic world. The only issue facing this world is "to go beyond reformism and take the way of the social revolution." Unquestionably, socialism is well within the historical perspectives of Islam.

The Algerian people follow a militant Islam, moved by a sense of justice, equality, and exposure to the benefits of knowledge and the sciences. We have nothing in common with the foggy messages of some fishermen in muddy waters who abuse the faith of the Algerians leading them into an aberrant moralism, a withdrawal within themselves, and a conditioning which has never been consistent with the ideas of the Revelations of the Holy Book, starting with that famous night of Leilat el Kadr which was celebrated Thursday by the entire Algerian people.

Islam has never been a party of clandestinity. The fact that it triumphed and won the peoples over was certainly not due to chauvinistic concepts which today quite poorly conceal the intentions of their authors, to restore anachronism in a world which escapes them and, for the sake of purification and moral virtues, rally within the same ranks the last vestiges of our traditional feudal lords and big merchants who hate socialism and progress.

The type of Islam supporting a socialist revolution is credible because it has impartially analyzed the historical reasons for the decadence of the Islamic world, because it has no sectarian visions of Islamic thinking, and because of its lofty concept of human dignity.

Islam, which will brilliantly shine on our society, will be the creation of our children, the heirs of revolutionaries who are pursuing a project far greater than assimilation through "the goat and the djellaba:" the total resme!ting of the society through decisive changes which will put a definitive end to obscurantism, despotism, and feudalism. To be a worker for the agrarian revolution, a promoter of social management, a student, or a researcher in an Algerian university does not mean any reduction of the faith in Islam.

This would be a modern, just, and nondemagogical way of serving it. It basically opposes the divine powers which some militant faithful and other conquerors and lords ruling at the expense of their peoples have attributed to themselves.

The Algerian people have neither complexes nor lessons to receive, particularly in terms of its Arab nature and faith in Islam: All the attributes of our religion have been actively restored with the regaining of independence.

The broadening of knowledge, thanks to schools and universities, was paralleled by an increased deepening of Islamic faith in a path of progress and justice. This faith, anchored for centuries in the heart of every Algerian man and woman, must be protected from factionalist and fraudulent elements who are trying to undermine the joint efforts of the revolution and Islam in Algeria by exploiting insufficiencies and some contradictions which have appeared within the society.

The spiritual nature of despair had some validity under colonialism. Today the Algerian is a free person. He is the master of his own fate. He does not need in the least the help of his opponents of yesterday or for the methods of those addicted to the past, applied on shores less forebearing than ours.

IMAMS URGED TO FOCUS ON ROLE AS EDUCATORS

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 25 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Cherif Haddad]

[Text] Abderrahmane Chibane, member of the Central Committee and minister of religious affairs, who took a work trip to Constantine on Saturday, accompanied Mohamed Benahmed Abdelghani, member of the Central Committee and prime minister, on a visit which the prime minister made to the work sites of the Islamic University and the Emir Addelkader Mosque.

In the afternoon, the minister of religious affairs, with Ahmed Hamani, president of the Islamic Superior Council and his close colleagues at his side, chaired a work meeting which included the imams from the wilaya of Constantine.

Opening the meeting, the wilaya director of religious affairs welcomed the minister and the delegation accompanying him and took this opportunity to assure him of his full cooperation in the accomplishment of his mission.

In turn, Ahmed Hamani stressed the purpose and meaning of the Imam's mission as the propagator of the Islamic religion. The president of the Islamic Superior Council described the social-cultural training which should be given to every imam so that he will be able to master all the Koranic laws and in turn be able to engage in Islamic instruction in a social spirit, in accordance with the recommendations of the hadith.

The minister of religious affairs presented the broad lines of force which in the future will govern the working relations between his ministerial department and all the other ministries, based on the spirit of understanding and the complementariness in the action of building the country in conformity with the recommendations of the FLN Party's extraordinary congress and the last meeting of the Central Committee.

As he brought out the prestigious past of the capital of the East, its cultural and religious influence throughout the territory, the minister emphasized the importance of the homage which he was rendering to the venerated Sheikh Abdelhamid Ibn Badis by making his first visit outside Algiers to the city of Constantine.

Examining the history of the mosque's participation in the fight for national liberation, the minister of religious affairs called upon the imams to have a better understanding of their role as educators of Islam and asked them to draw as near as possible to the citizen wherever he may be.

Recalling the rights and duties of the imam, Abderrahamne Chibane described "religion as the cement of peoples" and called upon the imams to leave their mosques and to draw nearer to all the authorities (Party, APC, Administration).

"An imam should preach by example in the accomplishment of his mission as an Islamic educator," he concluded.

Profitable debates were then begun on several topics concerning social problems and the training of imams. Clarifications were presented for the imams by high officials of the ministry of religious affairs, and a plan of action was drawn up to breathe new life into the imam's mission throughout the country.

NEW ISLAMIC UNIVERSITY OPENS IN OCTOBER

Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 24 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Cherif Haddad]

[Text] Yesterday Mohamed Benahmed Abdelghani, member of the Central Committee and prime minister, made an inspection and working visit to the eastern part of the country, accompanied by Abderrahmane Chibane, member of the Central Committee and minister of religious affairs.

The first stop of this tour was made at the Islamic University and the Emire Abdelkader Mosque, which is under construction.

Received at the Ain El-Bey airport by civilian and military authorities of the wilaya, the ministerial delegation, after several minutes of relaxation in the airport's lounges, traveled to the construction sites of the Islamic University and the Emir Abdelkader Mosque.

The prime minister chaired a limited work meeting on the site of the Emir Abdelkader Mosque. During this meeting, two topics were discussed: the state of advancement of construction work and the housing construction situation in the wilaya.

After having listened attentively to the reports given by the regional delegate of the DNC [?National Directorate for Construction], the organization responsible for the construction of the Islamic University-Emire Abdelkaer Mosque complex and by the wilaya director for housing and urbanism, the prime minister placed particular emphasis on the awareness which should motivate every leader, wherever located, to leave the beaten paths and redouble his efforts to hasten the building of the country.

Fully acknowledging the problems being encountered by those engaged in building the Emir Abdelkader Mosque and the Islamic University, the prime minister assured them of his active support in the completion of the ambitious project in the shortest time possible and called upon them to make better use of the potentialities existing in the country and to assure closer cooperation among all parties responsible for execution of the project.

The idea of building a grand mosque in Constantine originated in 1968. Faced by the magnitude of the project, Abdelghani, who commanded the Fifth Military Region at that time, was personally interested in this work of art. Excited by this project, the late President Houari Boumediene took it to his heart; and it was under his aegis that the mosque project was broadened to include an Islamic university.

The bureau of technical studies of the SONATRACH was then made responsible for the [feasibility] studies, while the execution of the project was placed in the hands of the DNC.

Made up of an immense prayer hall with its annexes and the Islamic University, the complex whose construction work was started in 1972 is far behind schedule because of a shortfall in financing. Added to this is the specificity of the products needed for its completion, which must harmonize with its architectural configuration.

At present, the credits needed for reactivation of the work sites are on the order of 13,961,250 dinars.

This situation, after having being brought to the attention of the prime minister, was the subject of a work meeting including the minister of religious affairs, the president of the Islamic Superior Council, representatives of the minister and the operators (DNC and SONATRACH).

At an early stage, solutions were offered in the financial sector. For his part, Abderrahmane Chibane, minister of religious affairs, assured the builders of his personal support, to speed up construction work on this imposing project.

Taking into account all of the measures approved during the work meeting, the DNC regional delegate assured the minister of religious affairs of the mobilization of all DNC personnel to deliver the Islamic University to the students next October.

Before traveling to Skikda, the prime minister familiarized himself with the status of housing construction in the Constantine wilaya. The DHUC [expansion unknown] report indicates that the wilaya which on 31 December 1979 had a financial package for the construction of 25,731 urban housing units programmed during the two Plans had taken delivery of only 6,050 housing units as of 31 December 1979 and 739 units during the first 6 months of 1980.

Accounts payable incurred during the first 6 months of 1980 totaled 131 million dinars.

The housing program of the educational sector is suffering from a cost overrun, and 792 housing units remain unfinished to this day. Rural housing and the self-managed sector have registered an appreciable rate of advancement.

In a related connection, construction of the socialist villages continues to be uncertain. The village originally planned at Djebel Ouahch, consisting of 100 housing units, could not be built, since the locality involved did not have allottees [attributaries]; and a request for the relocation of the village was addressed to the minister of planning.

This first stage of the prime minister's trip in the eastern part of the country was highlighted by a status report on construction in the housing sector across the wilaya and reactivation of the construction sites for the Emir Abdelkader Mosque-Islamic University complex.

NEW PARTY CELLS SET UP IN TLEMCEN ENTERPRISES

Algeria EL MOUDJAHID in French 14 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The process of setting up of FLN Party cells in enterprises and economic and administrative entities which was started a few months ago is continuing. The development of an organizational action plan was the subject of a meeting held by the first three enterprise cells established in the Tlemcen SONELEC [Algerian National Company for the Manufacture and Installation of Electrical and Electronic Equipment] and in the APC Hospital Center.

The workers' principal concerns with respect to the cell's operation were compiled by bureau members of the three enterprise cells.

The participation of FLN cells in the management of enterprises will permit the harmonizing and coordinating of actions designed to strengthen this important state sector on the one hand and the making of decisions on the other hand aimed at invigorating work in all its aspects, as set forth in the statutes.

The other enterprise cells which will be installed in the enterprises and economic and administrative entities of the Tlemcen wilaya will in turn extend this important operation implemented by the FLN Party to all the communes.

The installation of these cells the principle of which was established by the Fourth Party Congress falls within the framework of application of the decision made by the Central Committee to set up enterprise cells.

As a new structure, the Party cell has the role of broadening the Party's field of action and thus permitting it to better exercise its responsibilities in the sectors of planning and control of the country's general policy. The installation of these cells also translates the Party's desire to organize all sectors of national life and to be present in industrial entities, in agricultural exploitations and in socioeducative, cultural, administrative and service institutions. As stated by Articles 7 and 8 covering the organization and operation of this structure: "The enterprise cell takes care of the ideological and political training of workers and farmers in the work sites."

Its role is also "to orient the enterprise's policy within the framework of application of the National Constitution and the execution of every development plan, to evaluate and control the management organizations of the enterprise, as well as the schedule of activities within the framework of the development plan..."

Depending upon the size and importance of the enterprise, one or several cells can be set up, whose membership will range from 10-50 activists. Let us remember that several Party cells have already been installed in the production entities of various sectors.

COORDINATING COUNCIL STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF COMMUNES

[Article by Rachid Souilah]

[Text] Continuing the cycle of meetings with elected officials of the rank and file organizations, members of the Skikda CNP [National Party Commission] council traveled to Tamalous and Collo recently where they held work meetings with the executive councils of the kasmas and APCs of the communes of Tamalous, Ain-Kechra, Oum-Toub, Collo, Ouled Attia and Zitouna.

During the meetings-debates, organizational, socioeconomic and cultural problems were examined at length and concrete solutions were advanced to make up for the inadequacies existing here and there, whether in the sectors of education, housing, transportation or water resources, agriculture, fishing or trade.

A region which is basically committed to agriculture, with a modest fishing activity, the Collo daira is facing problems of enclavement which places a rein on its economic and social development. The problems, therefore, are sizable when one knows that this cradle of the armed revolution suffered a great deal from colonization which caused serious damage and when one measures the size of its population, the largest in the wilaya.

This daira is the subject of very particular attention on the part of the local authorities, notably through implementation of its special development program and its various plans for modernization. The execution of the ambitious projects which were granted to it will most certainly permit the daira to make up the cumulative shortfalls in all sectors and in the near future to experience a considerable economic upsurge. Of course, constraints of a material and human kind (particularly technical cadres) are present, and officials at all levels are aware of them.

Moreover, it is in this sense that the speech by Lakhdar Ouazzani, Party national commissioner [CNP], was oriented. He asked the officials elected by the rank and file to unify their actions and to work without letup within the framework of the mission which was entrusted to them by the people for the economic and social promotion of the region.

After having reassured them with respect to the continuing help which will be given them by the political and administrative organizations of the wilaya, the CNP did not fail to call their attention to the application by deeds of the recommendations of the Party's extraordinary congress and of the directives of the political directorate. What is more, he also recalled the objectives of the Third Development Plan and the results expected in the next 5 years.

In Tamalous, the CNP also spoke about the importance of such meetings. After having called the attention of the elected officials to the need for a proper analysis and understanding of the major lines and objectives envisaged by the Plan to assure its application and success in all sectors (education, housing, water resources, fishing, health, etc.), the Party's national commissioner recalled that political independence has need of economic independence and that it was necessary to work for the liberation of the country from foreign dependence. To successfully attain harmonious, national economic balance, to assure restoration of national revenue, therefore, the standard of living the awareness and mobilization of all the living forces of the nation are necessary, as they also permit the thwarting and eliminating of all the dangers which are threatening our political and economic independence.

The CNP stressed the dangers created by internal and external reaction and its activities which are inimical to the revolution and its achievements, and also called for the strengthening of the FLN Party's ranks and vigilance.

Ouazzani emphasized the explanation and understanding of the recommendations and resolutions of the Party's extraordinary congress. He also defined the mission of the new communal council for coordination and cited the responsibilities which envisage the economic and social development of the commune. Finally, he invited the officials to rise above local problems and to concentrate all their efforts on tasks of national development.

During the debate which ensued, officials of the executive councils of the six communes described with great frankness and clarity the problems they are encountering in the sector of implementation as well as the shortfalls experienced in various sectors which are the cause of the development delays in their respective localities. These shortfalls particularly involve education, health, water resources...

Finally, Said Hamrouche, deputy CNP, provided guidelines to be followed to overcome and resolve the problems encountered. In this regard, he invited the elected officials to be aware of national realities to objectively analyze the total package of problems and to find suitable solutions for them. "For the responsibility falls principally upon elected officials who must keep ahead of problems and avoid confining themselves to a position of wait-and-see or fleeing from their responsibilities." He also called upon the elected officials to be responsive to the aspirations of the people for the satisfaction of their needs. Finally, he cited the role of the elected assemblies in the materializing of the objectives of the National Development Plan.

PEOPLE'S ASSEMBLY DISCUSSES GOVERNMENT, PUBLIC SECTOR EMPLOYMENT LAW

Cairo AL-'UMMAL in Arabic 7 Jul 80 p 5

[Article: "Law No 83 Before the People's Assembly"]

[Text] In a few hours, the most famous Egyptian bill affecting the working class will be submitted to the People's Assembly--the final bill to eliminate all the effects of Law No 83 of 1973.

A report on the law has been prepared by the Manpower Committee of People's Assembly, which is chaired by Husayn Washahi. Continual meetings inside and outside the committee had been held with People's Assembly President Dr Sufi Abu-Talib and with Deputy Prime Minister Dr Fu'ad Muhyi-al-Din.

There had been discussion among the representatives of the people and officials of the finance ministry about some of the abolished provisions to be covered by the new law, which led to the law's not being included in the budget discussion. However, a number of People's Assembly representatives and government officials have agreed to consider the workers' and employees' demands for total equality, especially since President al-Sadat, when he decreed the payment of allowances equal to 6 months' wages on the occasion of the workers' celebrations of May Day, did not discriminate between state and public sector employees.

A meeting was held last week, attended by Deputy Prime Minister Dr Fu'ad Muhyi-al-Din, Committee Chairman Husayn Washahi, Vice President of the Labor Federation Mukhtar 'Abd-al-Hamid, People's Assembly Members Rajab al-Sa'di and Ahmad Idris, President of the Central Agency for Organization and Administration Dr Hasan Tawfiq, and First Deputy Finance Minister Muhammad 'Abduh.

During the meeting, agreement was reached on a number of principles and bases which were subsequently approved by the committee, which began preparing its comprehensive report on the law. Agreement was reached on the following points.

1. The law includes all professionals in the government and public sector, unskilled clerical personnel, and those employed in auxiliary services, who have previously-issued certificates of acceptance and degrees received at the end of a 5-year study period.

2. The law must benefit experienced workers, for whom a special bill will be prepared, which the government will submit for debate along with Law No. 83.

3. As for pension-holders, it has been decided that those retired as of 1 July 1980 will benefit from Law No 83, in light of the privileges the law grants the workers. As for those who retired prior to 1 July 1980, the government has decided to submit a bill increasing their pensions by 5 percent, the minimum being one pound and the maximum 3 pounds. However, the Manpower Committee has reservations about this law, and feels that for the sake of fairness the minimum should be increased to 3 pounds.

4. It was agreed that the government would immediately submit a bill increasing the minimum for state and public sector workers, so that all the workers in service will benefit by about 3 pounds. This will be achieved by granting them a so-called gradual allowance.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER JUSTIFIES HOLDING COMPANY CONCEPT

[Article by 'Atif Husayn: "The Public Sector Won't Be Eliminated"]

[Text] Deputy Prime Minister Dr 'Abd-al-Razzaq 'Abd-al-Majid has announced that it is a crime to say that President Anwar al-Sadat's government will eliminate the public sector, for the government has allocated one-quarter of the national income to strengthen it. President al-Sadat's government has not fired anyone and will not fire anyone, and the workers' rights are maintained everywhere. This remark was made at the conference of the General Union of Commerce Workers, which was attended by Deputy Economy Minister Ahmad 'Abd-al-'Aziz, all the presidents of foreign trade companies, and a large number of their board members, not to mention the leaders of the commerce union and the union committees of foreign trade companies.

Dr 'Abe-al-Razzaq 'Abd-al-Majid explained, "There is no trend towards eliminating the public sector; the trend is to support it. The public sector is a major socialist gain, and we cannot do without the gains which the public sector has won for Egypt and the Egyptian people. It is a safeguard for all of us, and we must support it."

The deputy prime minister went on to say that the industrial public sector companies have not modernized their equipment for a very long time, and that the government of President al-Sadat has allocated 3.2 billion Egyptian pounds to the public sector for investments. He explained that he came to the General Union of Commerce Workers to congratulate the workers of the foreign trade companies on the improvement of their material conditions since the application of financial laws similar to those of the investment authority, which will double salaries, as a decisive result of the establishment of the national export-import bank. He also explained that he had not expected that he would be accused of wanting to eliminate the public sector.

Replacement and Renovation in the Public Sector

The deputy prime minister announced that the only guarantee that the public sector will remain is to spend every millieme allocated to support the public sector on replacement and renovation of this sector's plants, not on expansion into other new installations. It is essential that public sector investments be spent on what they are allocated for.

Dr 'Abd-al-Razzaq 'Abd-al-Majid explained, "When we established the National Investment Bank, some people believed that it would eliminate the Planning Ministry. But it has actually strengthened the Planning Ministry, because it gave it follow-up powers.

"The battle for prosperity and development needs a strong apparatus, and the Planning Ministry is not enough. The establishment of the National Investment Bank was unavoidable, in order to strengthen planning in Egypt."

Dr 'Abd-al-Razzaq 'Abd-al-Majid reviewed the history of the public sector over the past 5 years, saying, "After the abolition of state organizations in 1976, the ministries began oppressing the public sector companies. It became clear to us that the state organizations had been better, because the abolition of state organizations had been aimed at liberating labor but labor was not liberated. The public sector companies came to be at the mercy of the ministries."

The Idea of Holding Companies Did Not Come Out of Nowhere

He explained that today's thinking is heading in the direction of combining a number of companies under the banner of holding companies, which no one, no matter how strong, could dissolve in the future. This idea of holding companies did not come out of nowhere. For example, some of the workers in industrial zones or complexes, such as Shubra al-Khaymah and Hulwan, would be treated fairly, while others would be wronged, when the profits were paid out. Profits basically depend on the prices of the goods which these companies sell, and in the case of some basic commodities the state steps in to lower their prices to bring them within the reach of the struggling classes of the people. Natuaraly, the companies which produce these goods will have limited profits, as opposed to the companies which do not produce these profits and which are therefore free to set their prices. Consequently, their profits are much more than the others. Therefore, we find a great disparity in profit distribution among the workers located in a single industrial zone, for in some companies the workers' profits amount to 15 days' salary, and in others 2 months' salary. The question which pops up is: What is the crime of the workers in the companies producing basic goods subject to state intervention in price-fixing?

He went on to say, "Establishing a holding company bringing together the Hulwan companies would enable the elimination of this phenomenon. If we assume for the sake of argument the establishment of a holding company called the Hulwan Development Company, to which all the Hulwan companies would be subject, then surely the holding company will make an effort to reconcile the gains and losses, and will distribute profits equally to every worker in the entire Hulwan zone."

The deputy prime minister confirmed that the present system governing the public sector companies will ultimately lead to the collapse of the public sector, for it will be unable to stand up to the private sector. He explained, "When we say 'holding company,' there are many forms of holding companies. There can be holding companies comprising one kind of company; for example, there can be a holding for all the fertilizer companies nationwide. There can be a holding company for a group of companies working in a group of integrated industries, such as the oil and soap companies and the like. There can be holding companies representing entire industrial zones like Hulwan and Shubra al-Khaymah. In short, our thinking must not be rigid, for every sector has its peculiarities, and there is some kind of holding company that will be good for it."

Foreign Trade and Finance

Then Dr 'Abd-al-Razzaq 'Abd-al-Majid spoke of the foreign trade companies, saying, "Some people are saying that each sector of these companies will have its own holding companies, but the question is: How can all the foreign trade companies be grouped under one holding company? The foremost problem of the foreign trade companies is their indebtedness. The foreign trade operation is primarily a financing operation. Without this, it cannot carry out its work. Getting loans from banks is nothing but trouble, and perpetuating this situation will lead to the public sector's collapse in the foreign trade sector. Commerce cannot proceed without funds, and the private sector is strong in this respect. There must be a strong public sector to stand up to it. If we do not have the financial strength to import basic commodities, we will not be able to function in the foreign trade field."

He explained, "The idea of establishing the national export-import bank was an alternative to establishing a holding company, because holding companies are no good for importing and exporting. What is good for this is a bank. During the coming phase, we need nothing more than intellectual openness, not petrification. We cannot watch the public sector collapse before our very eyes while we stand by with a petrified mentality until it actually does. The idea of such a bank has been carried out in socialist states like Romania, Czechoslovakia and others, as well as in western states. Therefore, the idea of establishing this bank has no ideological connotations."

At the end of his speech, Dr 'Abd-al-Razzaq 'Abd-al-Majid expressed his hope that the picture had been made completely clear. He explained that Egypt, in the coming stage, would need all its combined expertise. It would need experience in all fields in order to comprehend the method of managing holding companies, and these holding companies would need expertize to manage the people's capital.

The National Press and the Elimination of Trade Companies

President of the General Union of Commerce Workers 'Abd-al-Razzaq al-Sharbini delivered a speech at the beginning of the meeting in which he voiced the welcome of the commerce workers, represented by their general union and union committees, for Deputy Prime Minister Dr 'Abd-al-Razzaq 'Abd-al-Majid. He explained that the presence of the deputy prime minsiter at the union headquarters was a good initiative and a commendable procedure, definitely proving the sound democracy which President al-Sadat has anchored.

The union chief reviewed the reason for this meeting with the deputy prime minister--the apprehension among worker and leadership circles within the domestic trade companies that the government was intending to eliminate the public sector, and the foreign trade companies in particular. This apprehension stemmed from national press coverage of the establishment of the national export-import bank as part of the decision to try to wipe out the financial debt of those companies operating in the foreign trade sphere. This press coverage made it seem that these companies would lose their identity through their absorption into the bank, and aroused a certain amount of mental anxiety among workers and company presidents alike.

PROFITS TO BE DISTRIBUTED TO INDUSTRIAL WORKERS 'NEXT WEEK'

[Article: "Profits to be Distributed Next Week; 600,000 Workers in Industrial Companies To Receive Profits; Industry Minister Requests Preparation of Lists for Paying Profits to the Workers"]

[Text] Industry Minister Engr Taha Zaki has decreed the preparation of lists for disbursing profits to factory workers, so that disbursement can begin next week.

The minister's instructions require the profits to be figured according to a minimum not less than the amount paid out last year. The amount would be higher according to how far each company fulfilled its goals.

An AL-'UMMAL correspondent has learned that the minister's instructions provide for granting profits to the workers at those companies which realized a profit.

It has been decided that this year about 600,000 workers at 116 industrial companies will benefit from the profits.

The profits, up to a maximum of 75 Egyptian pounds, will be paid to workers at some companies, including the Kima Fertilizer Company, the Egyptian National Chemicals and Plastics Company, the Sugar Company, and the al-Mahallah Textile Plant.

Workers in Non-Industrial Sectors

Furthermore, steps are now being taken to disburse profits to workers in non-industrial companies, now that these companies budgets have clearly shown that they realized a profit and exceeded their goals as set in the plan.

Flour Mill Workers

It was decided to pay periodic raises and realized profits to the 28,520 workers at flour mill companies. This decision was made after it became clear that these companies had realized an estimated surplus of 3.83 million pounds, with total production amounting to 157,510,119 pounds.

Al-Ma'murah Workers

It was also decided to pay a bonus equivalent to 5 months' wages to the workers at the al-Ma'murah Company, and a maximum profit share, as well as a periodic raise of 100 percent.

Foodstuff Workers

It was also decided to pay all the profits to all the workers at the 11 foodstuff companies, as well as periodic raises to all of them. Some 23,997 men and women workers will benefit from this decision.

Warehouse and Shipping Agency Workers

Minister of Transport, Communication and Maritime Transport Engr Sulayman Mitwalli has decided to pay a bonus equivalent to 2 months' wages to the workers at the Egyptian Warehouses Company and the Alexandria Shipping Company, in addition to a periodic raise of 100 percent. The warehouse company's net profit was 10 million pounds, 47 percent over the goal. It was also decided to pay profits equivalent to 45 days' wages to the workers.

As for the Alexandria Shipping Company, its profits amounted to 19 million pounds, 10 million pounds over the target. It has been decided to pay the maximum profit share of 75 pounds to the workers there.

URBAN LABOR FORCE INCREASING, CONSTRUCTION WORKER WAGES RISING

Cairo AL-'UMMAL in Arabic 14 Jul 80 p 5

[Article by Rif'at Khalid: "Fewer Investments in the Countryside Is Cause of Concentration of Labor in the Cities and Migration; Lack of a Clear Training Policy Is Behind the Rise in Construction Workers' Wages"]

[Text] A report by the Manpower Branch of the Specialized National Councils has shown that emigration overseas has increased in recent years, and that the lack of a clear policy for training and meeting occupational shortages has led to an increase in construction workers' wages. Also, the decline in investments directed towards the countryside has led to a concentration of workers in the cities. Furthermore, there is the natural decline in certain workers and continued vocational training under the old method. But what do the officials say?

Head of the Specialized National Council's Manpower Branch 'Abd-al-Latif Baltiyah says that one factor influencing the labor force and especially the construction sector is the phenomenon of migrating overseas to work, which has increased in recent years, and which the Planning Ministry estimates at about 1.5 million workers or 3.7 percent of the total population. This has led to a great shortage in the skilled artisan and professional labor force and to instability in the construction industry because of its sensitivity to economic fluctuations.

Training Without Policy

There is also another important point--the lack of a firm training policy, in addition to the existing training centers; shortcomings from the standpoint of quantity, quality, and modern scientific advancement.

The Professional Labor Force Is Declining.

Dr Muhammad 'Abd-al-Qadir Hatim, general supervisor for the Specialized National Councils, says that a problem exists in the natural decline in the professional labor force because of old age, disability and death, as well as the fact that the professions are no longer handed down as they once were.

Accumulation of Workers In the Cities

Since the facts indicate a serious situation with respect to the accumulation of workers in the cities, what is responsible for this?

Dr Hatim adds that the decline in investments directed towards the countryside is responsible for this, along with the settling of industries and services in the urban areas, which helps perpetuate the accumulation of workers in the cities as a result of the continual internal migration and the accompanying shortage of skills in the countryside and the increased flow of non-skilled workers to the cities. It is worth mentioning that the urban population amounts to about 44 percent of the total population.

What the Figures Say

We looked at the statistics prepared by the Manpower Branch of the Specialized National Councils dealing with the labor force employed in economic activities and in the service and production sectors. Workers employed in the economic activities of service sectors make up about 40 percent of the total labor force, while their wages amount to about 57.6 percent of the total wages. As for the production sectors, they make up about 60 percent of the total labor force, with their wages constituting about 42.4 percent of the total. Wages have increased in recent years, and in a fantastic way for construction workers in particular. This is a serious indication, and there must be some kind of intervention to stop this increase occuring at the expense of the citizens.

Figures show that during the 10 years from 1960 to 1970, construction workers' wages rose between 15 to 50 percent. Since 1970 up to today, these wages have risen between 200 and 600 percent. This increase includes auxiliary professions as well. The construction worker who was paid 80 piasters a day in 1962 gets 3 Egyptian pounds a day now. The reinforcing carpenter has gone from 60 piasters to 3.5 pounds; the smelter from 70 piasters to 5 pounds; the whitewasher from 60 piasters to 3 pounds; the painter from 70 piasters to 3 pounds; and the electrician from 30 piasters to 3 pounds 20 piasters.

Analysis of the Graduate Labor Force

Analyzing the labor force made up of graduates of universities, industrial schools and professional institutes and their contribution to the Egyptian labor force, the Manpower Branch report shows that university graduates make up about 6 percent of the labor force, graduates of industrial schools about 8 percent, and professionals who graduated from training schools about 6 percent of the labor force. The uneducated and untrained, most of whom are refugees from the countryside, make up about 8 percent of the labor force.

11.9 Million Employed Persons in 1982

The statistical report on the labor force indicates that the labor force is now estimated at 9.72 million workers, and is expected to rise to about 11.9 million workers in 1982, at an average yearly rate of increase of about 4 percent. This rate is expected to increase in following years because of a number of factors, the most important being the increase in the working-age population and an increase in women's contribution to economic activity. There is another important point made by the report relating to the number of people past the productive age. The overall percentage of persons not of productive age, i.e. younger than 12 years and older than 65 years, is expected to drop from 33.6 percent in 1976 to 31.9 percent of the total population in 1987, because of an anticipated drop in the birth rate and a change in the customs of the populace.

The report boils down to the need to support technical education in various fields, to prepare the labor force and the working and technical cadres needed to serve production and development, and to expand the training institutes which will prepare a constant, experienced technical labor force according to the most modern scientific methods and advanced technology, in the context of international cooperation.

NEW LAW REGULATES EMPLOYMENT OF EGYPTIAN SEAMEN

Cairo AL-'UMMAL in Arabic 7 Jul 80 pp 1, 4

[Article: "New Statute to Regulate Employment of 30,000 Egyptian Seamen on Arab and Foreign Vessels; Job Opportunities To Be Made Available Without Intercession; Insurance Coverage To Be Extended to Them"]

[Text] The Manpower and Vocational Training Ministry has decided to draw up a new statute to regulate the employment of 30,000 Egyptian seamen working on Arab and foreign vessels, to provide them job opportunities without intercession, to eliminate their problems, and to extend insurance coverage to them.

It has been decided that those seamen whose names are registered on the membership rolls of the union committees at Egyptian ports will be subject to the new law, as well as those working on Arab and foreign ships of whatever type.

Minister Said Muhammad Ahmad held a meeting last week which was attended by representatives of the Maritime Transport Ministry, the Social Insurance Ministry, the Interior Ministry, and the General Federation of Labor Unions, at which the new statute and its implementation was discussed.

The new law includes a number of clauses, one of which provides that every worker or seaman requesting work should submit his request to the employment bureau, accompanied by his personal or family identification card, a certificate of good behavior from the manpower bureau, his maritime passport, and a license to work for foreigners permitted to reside in Egypt. The bureau will nominate the seamen according to whoever comes first in the listing for each profession. In case the captain rejects the nominee for substantial reasons, the employment bureau will nominate the man next on the list. Renomination more than three times is not allowed.

The seamen who are accepted for work on the ship must obtain a statement of approval of his appointment from the director of the employment bureau, to be presented to the port passport department. In no case can any seamen who does not have a statement of approval from the employment bureau be permitted to work on a ship.

The shipping agency commissioner will draw up a work contract for the seaman accepted by the ship's captain, in one original and five copies for the captain, the seaman, the shipping agency, the maritime inspection office, and the employment bureau, in the format agreed to by the General Union for Maritime Transport.

The law requires each appointed maritime worker to pay the sum of 6 Egyptian pounds as an employment fee, to which will be added the sum of 3 pounds 600 milliemes as union membership fees.

The minister explained that according to this statute, membership will be limited to seamen. Domestic elements will be sifted out, so as to limit it to seamen who are actually practicing the profession, and to remove fictitious names from the membership rolls.

Joint work contracts will also be concluded with shipowners and their agents in the ports, and bases for regulating the employment of seamen and protecting their rights will be drawn up. Professional training centers for seamen will be established to increase their technical skill and educational level.

Muhammad Ahmad added that the law includes the formulation of an insurance law for Egyptian seamen, to protect them from the dangers of old age, disability and death. An insurance card will be handed out to unemployed workers.

In another context, it has been decided to make the employment bureaus for Egyptian maritime workers working on foreign ships in Alexandria, Port Sa'id and Suez Governorates subject to the supervision of the General Union for Maritime Transport, and the union president will draw up its current administrative system.

Also, a permanent committee will be formed to supervise the activities of the bureaus, to be formed of representatives from the manpower directorate, the General Union for Maritime Transport, and the shipping agencies.

OFFICIALS DESCRIBE LITERACY PROGRAM FOR WORKERS

Cairo AL-'UMMAL in Arabic 14 Jul 80 p 2

[Article: "Class Study Hours Must Be Reconciled With Working Hours"]

[Text] Nine years after the workers' literacy programs were assigned to the Workers' Cultural Organization, many people are asking whether the organization has succeeded in carrying out the experiment. What are the difficulties? What is happening now? This investigation into the organization is an attempt to answer these questions.

Director of the Workers' Cultural Organization's Literacy Department Muhammad al-Mahdawi says, "There are more than 6 million workers suffering from the problem of illiteracy, which represents a national issue which we all must combat.

"The idea of assigning the task of combatting workers' illiteracy to the organization originated in 1971. The idea boils down to an attempt to graduate literacy teachers from among the workers themselves, on the basis of nominations by the union organization, whereby the candidate would study the basics and methods of instructing adult workers for several months at the organization's Worker Education Institute. This experiment has been successful, and more than 2,000 worker-teachers have been graduated. The experiment has shown that the literacy classes by institute graduates have been 95 percent successful, whereas the literacy classes run by Education Ministry teachers have been only 65 percent successful. In spite of this, the experiment was suspended until 1977, at which time the Workers' Cultural Organization reached an agreement with the Arab Labor Organization to offer literacy classes to 10,000 workers over a period of 2 years.

"After this agreement was signed, Minister of Manpower and Head of the General Federation of Labor Unions Sa'd Muhammad Ahmad, in his capacity as head of the organization, issued a decree forming a supreme committee for workers' literacy, chaired by the federation's vice president."

Vice President of the General Federation of Labor Unions and Head of the Supreme Literacy Committee Mukhtar 'Abd-al-Hamid says, "The committee has prepared a workers' strategy to confront the problem of illiteracy among the workers, aimed at liberating the Egyptian worker from both his functional and cultural illiteracy at once.

"This strategy has been divided into a number of stages for reaching the goal, as follows:

1. Preparation--this stage begins after data is collected and the illiterate workers are classified. The General Federation of Egyptian Labor Unions will draw up a method of clarifying the basic socio-economic features of a worker society, and will get the teachers ready.

2. Implementation--this stage will last 5 years starting in 1978, and efforts will be made to combat illiteracy among workers of all sectors.

3. Mopping-up--this stage will last 2 years, in order to eliminate any pockets of illiteracy left over from the implementation stage. The sources of illiteracy will be terminated by making elementary education compulsive and universal, and by achieving integration between school and non-school education."

The head of the committee adds that implementation of this strategy, whereby 150 classes would be opened in 1977 in the various governorates and another 200 classes in 1978, has actually started. Implementation exceeded the plan by 15 percent in 1977, since 168 classes were opened that year. The organization will open more than 400 classes this year.

One of the obstacles facing the experiment, says the head of the literacy committee, is the obvious phenomenon of worker absenteeism due to the work system at various installations, especially since the experiment follows the shift system. Therefore, there must be some reconciliation between work hours and class study hours. Also, the worker wants to utilize the time he spends studying in other matters which he may feel are more serious than education.

Finally, says the head of the Supreme Literacy Committee, in order for the experiment to continue to be successful, the following recommendations made by the committee ought to be adopted.

1. The technical and cultural cooperation agreement with the Arab Labor Organization should be renewed for 2 more years, the number of participating workers should be increased to 25,000 workers, and the appropriations made by the organization should be increased to 150,000 Egyptian pounds.

2. Some of the money from fines which is in the Manpower Ministry's fine fund should be allocated for disbursement to the organization's anti-illiteracy plan.

3. Some of the Education Ministry's funds for opening public and national sector literacy classes should be transferred to the organization, to enable it to open literacy classes for private sector workers.

SEWER WORKERS' JOB CONDITIONS DEPLORED

Cairo AL-'UMMAL in Arabic 14 Jul 80 pp 3,5

[Article by Nadiyah Sultan: "12,000 Workers Living Amid the Dangers of Disease and Death!"]

[Text] Some 12,000 workers are living amid dangers and diseases which threaten their lives, their future, and the future of their families. These workers are the sewer workers. A distressing anomaly is that they lose their health while preserving the health of the people. Although everyone knows that 90 percent of them are striken with life-endangering diseases, no one thinks of alleviating the troubles of that hard-working group. Al-'Ummal met with a group of sewer workers inside their places of work.

Muhammad Ahmad Sayyid, a diver who has worked with the authority for 10 years, says that sewer workers of various professions are exposed to many dangers and diseases which threaten their lives and their future. The worker is exposed to the sun's heat in summer and the freezing winter cold, in addition to having to breathe polluted air and immerse himself in water and filth. All of this subjects him to disease, especially chest diseases, which are considered the most dangerous type.

Nevertheless, we find that the authority and the state in general has been remiss in its duty towards this group, which represents the cornerstone of the cleanliness of the state as a whole. It does not provide protective clothing or food rations, except a half-kilo of cheese a month.

Worker Muhammad Ahmad Sayyid continued, "When we look at sewer workers, we find that about 90 percent of them suffer from diseases, and the methods of treatment are totally insufficient. The authority gives us a mere 7.5 percent nature-of-work allowance, and an infection allowance of 75 piasters a month. Naturally, this is not at all commensurate with the difficult nature of our work. We are exposed to danger, and we demand that the state show special concern for the sewer workers, so as to give them their full rights and an incentive not to leave this profession, which is both dangerous and difficult at the same time."

Muhammad 'Abd-al-Sami' Mabruk, who works as a diver for the State Sanitation Authority, says, "The nature of our work is extremely difficult, and causes us many diseases. It makes no sense for us to be treated the same as those who work in offices. Sufficient proof of this is to say that whenever any person smells a horrible smell from anywhere, he immediately hurries to leave that place because of the repulsive smell. What about the workers whose profession is diving in sewers, with their smell and the diseases they cause? Isn't this enough reason to grant the sewer worker a nature-of-work allowance totally different from that given other groups which sit behind desks?"

He went on to say, "Granting sewer workers nature-of-work allowances in keeping with their jobs is no heresy. We are working at a profession which is considered one of the most difficult, dangerous professions."

One Pound for the Worker and Five for the Engineer

Chief of Workers Affairs for the Cairo Sanitation Authority Masylihi Badir supports these views, and says, "Working in the sewers exposes the workers to many occupational and chest diseases, which leads them to flee the job. We also find that the workers gets only one Egyptian pound as an infection allowance, or 75 piasters after deductions. Meanwhile, the engineer supvising the network gets 5 pounds, without being exposed to infection at all.

"We find that the sewer worker works 8 hours a day, and is not given protective clothing or equipment. Also, he gets no meals except a half kilo of cheese per month. Furthermore, the sewer workers work on the shift system while everyone else is sleeping and relaxing at home. We find that the sewer worker works day and night without anyone seeing him."

Five Piasters Per Dive

Musaylihi Badir adds, "There are divers, who immerse themselves in the polluted water and the terrible smell. We find them being treated like an ordinary worker in all respects. When they dive, they get only an additional 5 piasters for each dive, which might last for hours while they clear the sewer. The supervisor punishes the worker who refuses to immerse himself, and the incentives, i.e. about one-quarter of his salary, are deducted."

Worker Faruq Musaylihi 'Awad-allah, who is a carpenter for the sanitation authority, builds supports for the sewers, which exposes him to many dangers. Nevertheless, the authority gives him a 7.5 percent nature-of-work allowance, some incentives, and the sum of only one pound as an infection allowance, from which about 25 percent is deducted for the war effort. Even though Law No. 47 of 1978 provides for the granting of increased allowances and bonuses, the authority even now has not given us the increased allowances, and is still paying us according to the old system."

Mustafa Lutfi, a general supervisor for the sanitation garage, brings up another problem. The authority hires divers at 20 pounds a month, without giving them any other bonuses such as their colleagues driving for other authorities get. This leads to a great shortage of drivers, which results in an interruption of work.

Sewer Workers and Perfume Workers

AL-'UMMAL net with 'Abd-al-Fattah Badr, secretary of the general federation and president of the union committee for sanitation workers, who spoke of the union committee's efforts to solve these problems. He said that about 6 months ago the committee requested the head of the sanitation authority, the officials of the People's Assembly, the cabinet, and the Housing Minister in particular, inasmuch as the authority is subject to this ministry, to raise the nature-of-work allowance to 40 percent, on the basis of the articles of Law No. 47 of 1978 pertaining to state employees. It is illogical and unacceptable for sewer workers to be on an equal footing with the perfume company workers as far as allowances go, and for workers at these latter companies to be paid a 40 percent nature-of-work allowance.

'Abd-al-Fattah Badr went on to say that this topic is now being studied by the Central Agency for Organization and Administration, in order to raise the nature-of-work allowance for sanitation workers. Also, the People's Assembly Housing Committee, chaired by Engr Muhibb Istino, has prepared a bill for a special statute for sewer workers' wages. A committee in which the union committee is represented has been formed at the authority to work on this wage bill.

A Strange Anomaly

As for the infection allowance, he says, "It makes no sense to perpetuate the strange anomaly whereby the sewer workers who go down into polluted water get 75 piasters, while we find that the engineer who sits in his office and does not undergo the workers' problems gets 5 pounds a month." 'Abd-al-Fattah Badr has demanded that this group be protected from all the dangers surrounding them, that the sewer workers have a special wage law, and that they not be exposed to any more dangers than mine and quarry workers face.

Athsma and Pheumatism

Speaking of the health dangers to which sewer workers are exposed, Dr Sami Rashid Tadrus, a doctor at the Cairo Sanitation Authority, says that the most dangerous disease from which more than 90 percent of the authority's workers suffer is bronchial asthma, which results from the workers' descending into polluted water and breathing harmful odors. Usually, this disease first appears as a bronchial cold which then develops into bronchial athsma. It will rapidly develop into something more serious if the workers continue doing the same job. There is another disease, rheumatism of the joints, which is the second most widespread disease among the authority's workers.

Dr Sami points out that there is more than one way to make sure that those workers who spend their lives serving the citizens are protected. First of all, protective clothing must be handed out, including gas masks, which will reduce the workers' exposure to disease. Then there must be a regular medical check-up for the workers at least once a year, if not every 6 months. This would greatly benefit the workers, especially in discovering disease in its early stages and preventing its subsequent complication.

He adds that one of the most important ways of reducing the disease rate among workers is to transfer any worker who has been found to be afflicted with disease to some other job within the authority suitable to his health condition. Otherwise, he will be left a victim of disease, to such a degree as to possibly cause his death.

A Shameful Thing

Engr 'Abd-al-Mun'im al-'Ashmawi, board chairman of the State Sanitation Authority, has responded to the serious questions which the workers have raised. saying that the sewer workers are exposed to many occupational hazards and diseases as a result of their exposure to filth and environmental pollution, Even though the authority provides protective clothing for the divers, the workers refuse to use it, on the pretext that it hampers their movement. Also, the authority provides food for the workers, in addition to free medical treatment, and also pays incentives and allowances which can add up to 60 percent of the wages. As for the infection allowance, the authority pays 75 piasters a month to each worker, which is unfortunately a disgrace.

A Special Package for the Workers

Engr al-'Ashmawi adds that the authority has prepared a special package for sewer workers, including insurance and retirement, similar to the law for workers in dangerous and difficult jobs. The bill has been submitted to the National Democratic Party, and will be discussed by the People's Assembly during its current session.

The authority's chairman of the board is presenting a number of proposals for ways of getting the workers to remain in this profession.

1. There should be a special package for sewer workers so as to achieve some conformity between work and wages.

2. The pension statute for sewer and sanitation workers should be amended to take into account the number of years of actual service, figured by year and half-year, when calculating the pension, in view of the dangers to which they are exposed. This should be similar to pensions for mine workers.

3. Production incentives for the workers should be set at 100 percent of the average salary and wage.

4. The infection and nature-of-work allowances for sewer and sanitation workers should be re-examined and figured in brackets according to the nature and danger of the job.

5. A training center subordinate to the authority should be established to train the workers so as to increase their efficiency, inasmuch as the modern machines and equipment being used to clean out the sewers require a great deal of skill.

Will these proposals be implemented? Will the state respond to the urgent demands of this group, which has suffered for so long and is still suffering?

STATISTICS ON JOB ACCIDENTS, LOST TIME RELEASED

Cairo AL-'UMMAL in Arabic 7 Jul 80 p 5

[Article: "The State Loses 21 Million Pounds a Year Through Work Accidents and Absenteeism"]

[Text] A report by the manpower and vocational training ministry confirms that the state is losing more than 21 million Egyptian pounds a year because of workers' accidents and unexcused absenteeism.

The report says that in recent years there has been a continual increase in work accidents, which amounted to 135,000 cases last year, after having been 98,000 cases 10 years ago.

The report mentions that work accidents in four textile companies amounted to 2,235 cases, while there are 17,400 workers at these companies. There were 40,782 days of absence because of these accidents, in addition to the estimated 19,000 pounds paid in wages for injured workers. Lost time cost 9,658 pounds during the period from January to December 1979.

As for the engineering and electrical industries sector, the report indicates that there were 779 accidents in three companies employing 3,861 workers, and lost time cost 3,495 pounds.

The report mentions that during 1979, there were 1,376,000 days lost at all the 162,645 installations throughout the republic, because of non-occupational illness, accidents, and job accidents, which increased the losses suffered by production.

The report also explains that this phenomenon is due to many causes, including the worker himself, the lack of industrial safety equipment and potentials, and the proliferation of agencies supervising industrial safety.

WORKING WIVES SEE COST OF LIVING ALLOWANCE AS INADEQUATE

Cairo AL-'UMMAL in Arabic 7 Jul 80 p 5

[Article" "The Working Woman Says That the 3-pound Allowance is Not Enough!"]

[Text] The married working woman still has a problem with the cost-of-living allowance. Even if it is decided to treat her the same as a bachelor, whereby she would obtain 3 pounds as an inflation allowance, she nevertheless says that this is not enough, that her rights are still being trampled on, and that this allowance is just barely enough to buy a kilogram of meat.

Dr Lu'lu' Ya'qub, a doctor at the al-Manshiyah al-Kubra General Hospital, says that government wages are very low. Assuming that the cost-of-living allowance was the same for the working wife as for the husband, these 3 pounds make absolutely no sense.

'A'idah Jirjis, an employee, asks, "What shall I do with this tiny sum? How can the unmarried working woman be equal to the married working woman?"

Zaynab Muhammad Rajab, an employee at the Agricultural Credit Bank; 'Afifah Sami, an employee and mother of one son and one daughter; and Qut al-Qalub Muhammad, an employee and a mother, are all demanding an increase in the inflation allowance for women with children. They all emphasize that they would prefer price reductions to getting this allowance.

Dalal Hasan al-'Awda, an employee, widow, and the mother of a son and a daughter, asks why a decree has not yet been issued pertaining to widows. She is demanding an allowance just like that a husband gets, since her circumstances are the same as his, for she is supporting a family and must get a cost-of-living allowance figured on the same bases as a male, married worker's allowance is.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL DENOUNCES HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

Appeal to Prime Minister

Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Amnesty International, the humanitarian organization, on Friday, 29 August, published an appeal addressed to Iranian Prime Minister Mohamed Ali Rajai, asking him to put an end "to the executions and arrests which persons are victims of only because of their origin or their convictions."

In the letter addressed to Mr Rajai on 19 August, Amnesty International "expresses its profound concern over the repeated violations of human rights committed since the revolution and particularly over the large number of executions which have taken place. The right to a fair and equitable trial has constantly been denied the persons who were hauled before the Islamic Revolutionary tribunals."

Attached to the letter from Amnesty International was a voluminous report on the problems of legislation and the rights of man in Iran. This report, based on the findings of a mission which went to Iran in 1979 and on the study of hundreds of trials, concludes that numerous persons were executed without having the right to a fair and equitable trial. The report had prior to publication been addressed to the Iranian authorities last January but the organization has so far not received any response to the various questions raised.

The letter addressed to the prime minister also expresses Amnesty International's worry "about the growing number of arrests of persons considered to be opponents by the Iranian authorities, including even members of parliament. In many cases, the persons arrested had been active opponents of the regime of the shah and some had even been imprisoned by virtue of their political views.

"The arrests of members of the Bahai, Jewish and more recently Christian communities seem to cast doubt upon the spirit of religious tolerance which was believed to prevail after the revolution and which was reflected in the new Iranian Constitution. Certain members of those communities had to undergo lengthy detention without any charges or trials and others were sentenced to death," Amnesty International notes furthermore before indicating that "it would with satisfaction receive any opportunity of discussing its preoccupations with the Iranian prime minister or with diplomatic representatives of his country."

LE MONDE Editorial

Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Aug 80 p 5

[Editorial: "The Iranian Republic Menace"]

[Text] In measured but firm terms, Amnesty International, the humanitarian organization, has just denounced the violations of human rights in Iran: arbitrary arrests, hasty trials, and summary executions "of which persons are victims by virtue of their origin or their views." These accusations are shocking, coming from a perfectly independent institution which by the way has never stopped defending those whom the shah was persecuting. It suffices to recall that, among the numerous prisoners "adopted" by Amnesty, under the imperial regime, was the Ayatollah Montazeri, who today has become the spirtual heir of Imam Khomeyni.

Although the leaders in Tehran as a matter of principle, disdain any humanitarian protestations coming from the "Western oppressors," they should at least be concerned with the political consequences of a repression which continues to upset or exasperate a growing number of their fellow citizens who are neither "pro-Western" nor "counterrevolutionary." The Iranians did not oust the imperial regime so that one could execute, without any form of trial, officers who have been retired for one or two decades, homosexuals, adulterous women, drug traffickers, Jews or Bahais, nor to have songs or films considered "lascivious" by one or the other mullah banned. There is no doubt that such actions are not to be found among most of the Iranians who practice a kind of militant Islam which by the way played a certain revolutionary role.

Nations have short memories. The Iranian leaders should not count on the eternal appreciation of men and women who, 18 months after the establishment of the republic, do not feel that they are governed, who have not yet been told about any project designed to resolve the serious economic and social problems from which they suffer. The country has between 2 and 4 million unemployed. Almost all of the nationalized industries are running in the red, just like the government itself which cannot balance its budget in spite of petroleum revenues. Imported products are becoming increasingly rare. The rate of inflation has reached and exceeded 50 percent. Under these conditions, can one imagine the reaction of the "disinherited" to the endless meetings held by premier-designate Rajai who, he says, is trying to form a "100-percent Islamic government?"

The incoherence of the behavior of the leaders, partly due to their inexperience, is spreading to the political arena. While the integrity of national territory is seriously threatened, both by the harrassing actions of the Iraqi armed forces and by potential American military intervention, everything goes on as if certain officials were trying to surround the Islamic Republic in a kind of splendid isolation," by simultaneously taking on Europe, the USSR, almost all of the Muslim countries which are charged with being "reactionary" or "anti-Islamic." Domestically, these same officials strike out against the right and the left, against the royalists and the communists, against progressive and extreme left-wing Marxist Muslims, against national or religious minorities.

Although divided, the royalist opposition has considerable resources and powerful support abroad: the United States, Egypt, Iraq, just to mention a few of them, are supplying arms, training camps, and radios. The Iraqi army and government are full of people who want the old regime back. The Iranian nation is disappointed and tired. To put an end to arbitrary procedure, insecurity, and privations, one cannot rule out that it might resign itself to a restoration, disguised or open.

CHIEF PROSECUTOR WARNS POLITICAL GROUPS ON ACTIVITIES

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 16 Aug 80 p 3

> [Text] If a problem ever once exceeds the limits of the law we will act on the provisions we have in these matters. These provisions are very clear and must be decisively enforced.
>
> Not only are these people doing things not in accordance with the constitution, but some of them claim to have grievances themselves.
> According to the constitution, all the country's courts must be administered by the Supreme Judicial Council.

Ayatollah Musavi Ardabili, Chief Prosecutor, in an exclusive interview yesterday with KEYHAN, gave his views concerning the convening of the judges' seminar, the district courts, the revolutionary courts, and the visible and non visible activities of some political groups.

Concerning the aim of the judge's seminar, Ayatollah Musavi Ardabili said: The reason for forming this seminar is that it is felt that the courts and the revolutionary courts ought to remain in place due to exigencies in our society, just as His Holiness the Imam has ordered, and society itself and the people also want this. Meaning that in any area where there are no revolutionary courts, we are pressured by the inhabitants of that area, who ask us to form revolutionary courts day and night. It is a reality that the courts and the revolutionary courts must be functioning now because of the needs and desires of the people. Therefore furnishings must be found for them and whatever deficiencies and difficulties they have must be put aside now. Since all the country's courts of justice must be administered by the Supreme Judicial Council according to the Imam's orders and according to the constitution, the Supreme Judicial Council has called upon all judges and revolutionary trial courts to rally around this point, to talk on the same series of issues, to follow the same methods and points of view, and to come to unanimous agreement concerning the issues that are to arise in order that they may be of one kind throughout the country.

The Chief Prosecutor then stressed that this seminar will only undertake to study issues pertaining to the courts and the revolutionary courts.

Ayatollah Ardabili said: The call for unity is not a new issue. This is a central issue for the Imam and the nation, but unfortunately some publications and some persons have not adopted a correct attitude towards this order of the Imam and the desire of the people. Naturally the Imam has decided to confront this critical issue.

Ayatollah Musavi Ardabili then said concerning the activities of some political groups: If a problem ever once exceeds the limits of the law we will act on the provisions we have in these matters. These provisions are very clear and must be decisively enforced.

The Chief Prosecutor added: We have reminded these groups many times and we have asked them to bring their activities in line with the constitution. Insofar as they do not do this we will be obliged to put the legal provisions pertaining to them into effect. Not only are these people doing things not in accordance with the constitution, but some of them claim to have grievances themselves. Again we call on these people to desist from activities that can only be called counterrevolutionary at this stage of the revolution. If they wish to engage in sound political activities, there is no need for plotting and instigation. For example, an organization came to me and complained as an organization. I told them we didn't know anything about their organization. We knew nothing of their central group, their general body or their institution, and we had no information about them. How could we investigate the problems of an organization of which we were totally ignorant? I told them, if you want us to officially acknowledge your complaints and charges, we must know about you. They said we cannot give you any of this information because of security considerations, and we want you to acknowledge us just as you know us. Where in this world is such a practice customary?

The Chief Prosecutor then stressed: The people will give these groups a period of respite, and if they do not come around we will take legal action.

He added: Of course, since we don't want to create a new problem in the country, we are therefore now confronting the issues as we think it proper, and if these problems cannot be resolved in other ways, naturally we must decisively bring forward legal methods.

Musavi Ardabili then said concerning the election of the prime minister: Mr Raja'i, in our view and from the standpoint of religion, is extremely reliable, and we know him to be a true Moslem and a person who has struggled for many years. We hope, God willing and with the cooperation of the Majles, the President of the Republic, and other revolutionary organizations, that everyone will unitedly carry the revolution forward at this sensitive stage.

ARTICLE DEPLORES GRADUAL DISINTEGRATION OF ARMED FORCES

Tehran RANJBAR in Persian 21 Jul 80 p 7

[Article: "The Army Is the Backbone of National Defense"]

[Text] Do not sacrifice the Islamic Republic institutions to factional rivalries.

Any purge of the army should make for its strengthening.

All deviant views on the army have a common denominator: the gradual or expeditious liquidation of the army.

The recent counterrevolutionary conspiracy, because it was conceived within the army, made the role of the army and the attitude toward this revolutionary institution an issue of the day again.

The current debates about the army these days all have sharply divergent directions. On the one hand, a group of people have questioned the merits of the entire army simply because there is a handful of counterrevolutionary elements in the Army. On the other hand, a large number of forces and the mass of the people have showered the army with praise and increased deference because of the existence of zealous soldiers and noncommissioned, as well as commissioned officers in the army and because the devout personnel of the army itself was the principal factor in uncovering and foiling the recent plot.

The approach to be adopted vis-a-vis the army has been an undecipherable enigma since the very inception of the Islamic Revolution of Iran. Under the previous regime, the army was, on the one hand, an instrument for repressing the people by the Shah while, there have been many democratic traditions in the history of the same army, on the other, which, given the structure of the army which comprises mostly soldiers, non-commissioned as well as commissioned officers, seem only natural and justifiable.

On the eve of the revolution, Imam Khomeyni took note of the ambivalence inherent in the army, namely (a) the dominance of a handful of pro-imperialist and royalist officers over the army; and, (b) the existence of populist personnel who comprised the near-total majority of the components of this political institution. The Imam rightly adopted a dual policy toward the Army and wisely appealed to the patriotism of the majority of the officers and to the revolutionary spirit of the soldiers and non-commissioned personnel who had all risen from the toiling classes of the society. This explains why the army of the reactionaries which was poised as the principal column for crushing the Revolution, was paralyzed and came apart at the seams. The validity of this dual policy of the Imam's toward the army was borne out in practice by the fact that the huge numbers from the army personnel joined the revolution.

Such a clear-sighted and practice-tested policy should have remained as the basic policy toward the army after the Revolution. Basically, insistence on such a policy compelled a mere handful of the traitors and those with outside links to flee or to be beaten down or outcast while this purge and the reorganization of the Army under the principal mottos of the Revolution, namely the application of Islamic Republican principles, non-reliance on the East or the West, independence, freedom, and social justice put the army fully in the service of the people and in the cause of Iran's independence and territorial integrity.

However, after the revolution, the enemies of the Islamic Republic played on the feelings seething among the people and spread slogans in favor of the disbandment of the army. Broached at the level of the society, by such notorious groups as the leaders of the guerrilla organization and by Kianuri's gang, the slogans impressed some of the forces within the ranks of the revolution, too, but it was foiled by the alertness of the leadership of the revolution and by the responsible authorities of the government both of which enjoyed the informed support of the mass of the people. It was soon clear that by hiding behind the mask of seemingly revolutionary slogans, the Soviet-and American-backed counterrevolutionaries intended to deprive the Islamic Republic of Iran of the institutions that defended Iran's independence and territorial integrity and to pave the way for realizing their ulterior motives.

The bloody clashes that started in all corners of the country after the revolution, and then the instantaneous events involving Iraq and Afghanistan, lucidly showed the motives of the conspirators for disarming the Islamic Republic of Iran via the disbandment of the Army. These events laid bare the ugly purposes of these people hidden behind their demagogic slogans.

It was for this very reason that the "Dismantle the Army" slogan was rightly written off as one subservient to Imperialism and Social-Imperialism and counterrevolution, while the enemy had not yet discarded his heinous plan. When the agents of the Eastern and Western superpowers realized that the people were aware of the conspiracy for the dissolution of the Army and of the fact that the Islamic Republic would not fall for this conspiracy, they hatched yet another plot which called for the gradual dissolution of the Army instead of its rapid disbandment. But how? The enemies of the Islamic Republic, throughout this period, tried the following tricks:

1. To foist off the army as anti-people for its role in the Kordestan events, and ....;

2. To discredit the army in the eyes of the people;

3. To disrupt the army's internal communications and terms of reference, and to infest its structure with internal chaos;

4. To demoralize the army's personnel;

5. To disseminate rumors about its commanders;

6. To show the army pitted against other military institutions, viz. the Revolutionary Guards Corps that had sprung from the Revolution;

7. To fuel the competition among various military institutions; and,

8. ... [sic]

By resorting to these schemes, the enemies of the regime attempted to weaken the army and to propel it toward disbandment and to attain their goals.

Also, by capitalizing on the rampant chaos, the agents of Russia and America tried hard to infiltrate into this institution and to pressurize it from within and without, so that this institution might not get organized, nor find discipline, nor get established on a "neither Western, nor Eastern" footing, nor get disposed to serving the revolution.

Despite all these schemes, and for the fact of the existence of thousands of devout, pious and brave revolutionary soldiers and of the patriotism of the near-total majority of the commissioned and noncommissioned officers, the army did not yield under these pressures and played a positive role in the past 18 months by giving hundreds of martyrs in safeguarding the revolution and the territorial integrity of Iran and in following the leadership of the Revolution.

In such a backdrop, the issue of the army has once again become the topic of the day for political factions. It is unfortunate that some political forces have pitched into action to undermine the army and are waging extensive propaganda campaigns against it without thinking about the ramifications of the policy they have adopted.

Although the persuasions of these groups differ from those of the enemies of the revolution and the former have adopted this tack within the context of factional competitions for the grab of political power, yet the weakening of the army and pushing it to the verge of disbandment serve no purpose other than that of the superpowers and of their agents such as the Kianuri gang in the Tudeh Party who have been pursuing such a policy for months.

From the very beginning, our party denounced the "Dissolve the Army" slogan and put forth a logical and revolutionary approach to the problem of the army. In a formulated document which it presented to the preliminary seminar of the National Defense University in the month of Farvardin of the current year [March-April 1980], our party dealt with the various problems relating to national defense, including the tracing of the roots of the existing diversionary views on the army, which views it analyzed and criticized. Inserted in Issues Nos 46 through 48 of RANJBAR newspaper, the document says, inter alia: "There is the view that we should not create a strong army but have a different force such as the Revolutionary Guards Corps instead. This view does not put much faith in the army and tends to create a separate military force which it can trust. But this view primarily aims at cinching power within the system with the help of a definite force. It does not so much heed the safeguarding of the nation's independence and its unmistakable needs and the impact of these. Secondly it reduces the role of the army in the nation's defence to zero. ....'

The view that says the command sysetm of the army should be replaced by a council-ruled system governing the army by initiating the decision-making process at the lower echelons in fact creates a built-in susceptibility to infiltration and makes for debilitating the army. This view aims at no less than factionalizing the army because the army they have in mind will soon be converted to a heterogenous amalgam of disparate factions unable, even at its best, to make decisions and to carry out orders because each council would be deciding for itself." Excerpt from RANJBAR, No 48.

The document submitted by our party to the preliminary seminar of the National Defense University also analyzed and derived conclusions from other diversionary views that "the nation needs no army because it is capable of defending the independence of the country", that "the Army needs no heavy hardware...", or that "the Army should not have a defensive but an offensive nature", [sic] or that "Heavy armaments bring dependence while we do not need them anyway."

The various diversionary views about the Army have more or less one thing in common: the elimination or gradual or rapid dissolution of the Army.

The verity of the analyses of the army by our party has been proven in practice and continues to be valid.

Those who today, for any reason, discredit the army, demoralize its personnel, jumble its internal hierarchy, fan the fire of rivalry among the armed forces of the Islamic Republic are not pursuing anything within the framework of their activities by the disintegration of the army.

We believe that these diversionary tendencies harm the revolution irreversibly. Had the holders of such views been moved by the best interests of the revolution or were they bound by the guidelines of the Imam, they would behave differently. Has the Imam not lauded the army many times and denounced the efforts for weakening it? Has the Imam not called fo the "Army of Islam"? How can they justify the act of weakening the Army and put it down as a revolutionary act in line with the Imam's policy?

We are in circumstances in which the Soviet armed forces scheme against Iran's territorial integrity from the north and the east as the American navy threatens Iran from the south and while we are embroiled in chashes with Iraq on our Western borders. In other words, we face aggression on all four sides while armed counter revolution is still active inside the country. All in all, there are a thousand dangers to our revolution. Is the weakening of the army in these circumstance anything but putting wind in the sails of the enemy?

The Army of the Islamic Republic of Iran is extant and should be strengthened and solidified. Even the purge of the hostile elements from inside the Army should make for its strengthening. To make the institutions of the Islamic Republic victims of factional rivalries is not permissible. These rivalries and policies gnaw away like moth at the bastion of the revolution from within and wreak on us without hands what the enemies did not manage to do with a thousand pilots.

Defense and national security in the sensitive situation of the world, the region and Iran, constitute a radical problem whose solution calls for the unity of all independence-seeking forces.

Our basic mottos in this matter, as indicated in the said document, are as follows:

1. Creation of a national and popular army as the mainstay of our national defense and as one which is immune from any monopolism;

2. Promotion and expansion of informed orderliness in the army on the basis of democratic decentralization;

3. Promotion and expansion of the spirit of combat and military education within the army in the service of the nation's independence, freedom and social justice;

4. Creation of command and operation unity between the Army and the Revolutionary Corps and attempting to create a 20-million strong army; and,

5. Purging the army and the other branches of the armed forces with a yardstick which would weed out the agents of the two superpowers and the corrupt and incorrigible elements linked to the previous regime and would prevent these from infiltrating.

Only by banking on the foregoing mottos and on the unity of all the forces seeking independence, Islam, nationalism and socialism will we succeed in safegaurding the revolution from the many dangers facing it in the field of national defense and security. Only that way can we continue our march forward.

REVOLUTIONARY GUARDS TO GET AIRBORNE TRAINING

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 13 Aug 80 p 13

[Article: "Revolutionary Guard Commander of Fars: Revolutionary Guardsmen Are Receiving Flight and Airborne Training"]

> [Text] The Revolutionary Guard is not affiliated with any party or group. It is an independent organization.
> A number of the instigators of the outbreak in Firuzabad have been arrested but no court has convened as yet to investigate them.

Shiraz - KEYHAN correspondent - Dr Mas'ud Khatemi, Commander of the Fars Revolutionary Guards, in an exclusive interview with KEYHAN, enumerated the Guard's programs for promoting organizational order, and strengthening the ideological and military dimension. Referring to the Guard's relationship with the religious law magistrate, he declared: The Revolutionary Guard is not affiliated wih any party or group. It is an independent organization.

The Revolutionary Guard Commander, in response to a question about what differences exist between the Revolutionary Guards and the Shiraz Religious Magistrate, said:

In the Islamic Revolutionary Courts of Shiraz there is an atmosphere we do not expect to see in a revolutionary court. It passes judgement arbitrarily and operates on the basis of influence rather than merit. The Religious Magistrate needs people who are the equivalent of gendarmes, in order to summon anyone on any pretext. They even arrest people without authorization from the Revolutionary Court. Revolutionary Guardsmen will not acquiesce to such activities.

Concerning the non-affiliation of the Revolutionary Guards of Shiraz with any particular party or group, which was the subject of another of the KEYHAN correspondent's questions, Dr Khatemi said:

Contrary to enemy rumours, the Guard is in no way affiliated with any party or groups. It is itself an independent organization. Concerning programs that are being prepared and carried out by the Revolutionary Guards, he said:

The Guard is equipped by headquarters. We also have programs in Fars for establishing organizational order in the various units, and for developing our ideology and putting it into writing as much as possible. Other Guard plans include strengthening the Guard's military capability by forming advanced military training programs such as airborne training, flight training, and training in heavy and extra heavy weapons.

Concerning identification of the instigators of outbreaks in Firuzabad, which led to the deaths of five guardsmen, Dr Khatemi said:

It is clear that a tribal chief himself and some of his close companions were the instigators of these outbreaks. Of course a number of lesser, unwittingly loyal tribes became involved in the evil plots of chiefs, but fortunately the zealous tribes, due to their religious beliefs and their Islamic qualities, are not ready to confront the Islamic Republic. As of now a number of instigators of the outbreak have been arrested, but no court has been convened to investigate them.

Dr Khatemi was asked: Now that you do not have a good relationship with the Shiraz Religious Magistrate, to what authority do you defer on questions of religious law?

He answered: We act upon the religious and theological judgements of Ayatollah Seyyed Abdolhosseyn Dastgheyb, Emam Jom'eh of Shiraz, and/or we cooperate with Mr Mir Gharfari of the Revolutionary Court.

GOVERNMENT TAKES OVER BIG TRANSPORT COMPANIES

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 13 Aug 80 p 13

[Text] The assets of eight big transport companies with four thousand trucks have been taken over by the government. The debt of these eight companies to banks and the Ministry of Commerce was around 11 billion 280 million rials. Some of these companies had borrowed 2600 times the amount of their own assets.

In announcing this news today, Mehdi Aminzadeh, of the Board of Directors of the Department for Expanding Commercial Services, said: There were about eight transport companies in Iran consolidated under the name of one parent company called "Baranbar", with assets of 100 million rials. The subsidiaries of this company were: Gostaresh-e Khadamat-e Bazargani, controller of 40 percent of the stock, Hamlonaql, and Sarbanha, Iran Tanker, the Tehran-Khorramshahr express of Iran, Iran Sor'at, Transcontinental, the Hamlonaql-e Pars Container Company, and Iran-Europe Carrier, which held the remainder of the stock.

Aminzadeh said: In 1352 [21 Mar 73-20 Mar 74] and 1353 [21 Mar 74-20 Mar 75] due to increased oil production and a flood of imports, the despised Pahlavi regime was faced with a shortage of transport facilities. Consequently it called upon its supporters, loaned them money from the treasury, and established these companies. He added: These eight companies have about four thousand trucks, two thousand of which are roadworthy. These eight companies were indebted to government banks and the Ministry of Commerce by about 11 billion 280 million rials, and some of them, such as the Tehran-Khorramshahr express, had borrowed 2600 times the value of their own assets. Aminzadeh said: Calculating these amounts, every truck should be worth 2 million rials, but now these trucks are not worth half that amount. Aminzadeh then undertook to explain this company, saying: After the revolution the Sarbanha Company, which was related to Qasem-e Sarbanha, took over the directorship of the foundation and some other shareholders. This company, with its initial capital of 50 million rials, owed around 700 million rials to the Ministry of Commerce and 2.6 billion rials to the banks.

The Iran Tanker Company, which was also related to the Sarbanha family, with its initial capital of 139 million rials was in debt about 100 million rials to the banks. The Hamlonaql-e Bozorg-e Iran Company was related to the Sudavar family, which now has government managers, and with assets equal to 500 million rials it owed about one billion 410 million rials to the government. Iran Sor'at, which was related to the Ruholamin va Gerami family, now has a government board of directors. This company, with assets of 20 million rials, had borrowed one billion 757 million rials from the government. Pars Container, which was related to the Paksima family, is now in the administrative hands of the worker's council. This company, with assets of 10 million rials, owed the government 1.4 billion rials. Transcontinental, which was related to the Mohammadian family, with assets of 500 million rials, only owed 1.2 billion rials to the Ministry of Commerce. This company is now under the supervision of government directors.

The Khorramshahr Express, which was affiliated with Mr Azari, with one million rials starting capital, had borrowed 320 million rials from the banks and the Ministry of Commerce. Finally, Iran Europe Carrier, which was affiliated with Kazemi, with 200 million rials assets, only owed 800 million rials to the Ministry of Commerce.

On the other hand, according to a note of confirmation, the directors of these companies will be from the Ministry of Commerce, but their employees will not be government employees and they will not be subject to government regulation. Aminzadeh said: Five companies, Iran Sor'at, Pars Container, Sarbanha, Iran Tanker, and the Tehran-Khorramshahr Express will be supervised by the Department for Expanding Commercial Services. Two companies, Hamlonaql-e Bozorg-e Iran and Transcontinental will come under the mantle of the Grain Administration, and the last company has also been placed under the control of the Wheat and Sugar Administration.

Aminzadeh said: At a meeting attended by Mr Bani-Sadr, President of the Republic, it was arranged that unemployed drivers would be referred to the transport companies to return to work after filling out questionaires.

MINISTER OUTLINES FUTURE OF NATIONALIZED INDUSTRIES

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 17 Aug 80 p 9

[Article: "Minister of Industries and Mines: Nationalized Industries Will Not Be Returned to Their Previous Owners"]

> [Text] None of the major industries which have been nationalized will be returned to their previous owners. And the Ministry of Industries and Mines will use all in its power to carry out those regulations which have been passed. These statements were made by Ahmadzadeh, the minister of Industries and Mines, in a press conference at which the vice ministers were also present.

Concerning industrial production levels of the past year, the minister of Industries and Mines said: After the revolution, both accurate and inaccurate figures were given to the people in a haphazard manner. But today, we have at our disposal relatively accurate figures for the year 1979-80 [1358] which contrast with those of '77-'78 and '78-'79 ['56 and '57]. Of course, these figures only include the major production areas and show that our industrial production in '79-'80 ['58] has in certain instances been less and in certain instances more than in '77-'78 ['56].

The figures show that in the areas in which we have been more dependent on raw and semi-finished materials, production has decreased.

Ahmadzadeh added: In any case, we can claim that we have been successful in '79-'80 and in spite of all the difficulties, production has been good. We hope to have increased production of high quality in '80-'81 ['59].

He added: At the end of last year, 70 percent of the investment in industries came from the government.

He added: Last year, we had many disagreements with the owners of nationalized industries, who tried to prove in various ways that the government is unable to manage the nationalized industries. But I declare before all that these individuals should not think that they will be successful. The Ministry of Industries and Mines will use all in its power to enforce the law and will not allow those industries which have financially fed upon this ministry during the past year, the ministry having assumed their management, to be returned to their previous owners.

Concerning workers' councils of the production units, the minister of Industries and Mines said: We have often used the members of Islamic councils of the factories as members of the board of directors of the factories. For example, there are members of Islamic councils on the board of directors of 80 percent of the textile units. In the food industry, this figure is about 50 percent. But the reason for the closing of the nationwide Union of Islamic Revolutionary Councils is as follows: This Union contained individuals from leftist groups who actively disrupted production within the industrial units of the Organization of Expansion and Renovation of Iranian Industries. At the same time, in accordance with the law, the formation of Islamic councils in large industrial units must take place only with the approval of the government.

In conclusion, Ahmadzadeh added: After the revolution, 95 percent of the production units were closed. We began almost from zero and now, after one year, the situation is almost reversed; that is, at the present time, 95 percent of the production units are operating. Of the 400 production units under the supervision of the Ministry of Industries and Mines, there is disruption in fewer than 5 percent of the units. The others are working well. At present, Iran National puts 250 automobiles on the market daily and it has enough raw materials to last six months.

In this meeting, Dr Sadr, the executive vice chairman of the Organization of Expansion and the Organization of National Industries, also spoke about the reasons for dissolving the factory councils. In Tabriz, councils within the nationwide Union of Islamic Revolutionary Councils were dissolved by Ayatollah Musavi. Later, a number of workers came to us and requested the dissolution of the aforementioned union. He also said: Islamic councils approved by the Islamic government are also approved of by the Organization of Expansion and Renovation of Industries.

He added: Investment in the Organization of Expansion and Renovation of Iranian Industries is all governmental and belongs to the people. What we want is to establish law and order in the workplace, because last year disorder caused a deficit of 2 billion rials.

In the continuation of this press conference, Engineer Saberi, the industrial vice minister of Industries and Mines, said concerning the nationalized industries: After the nationalization of industries, about 1,000 directors were selected by the Ministry of Industries and Mines. This may be the largest number appointed. The selected directors were first faced with actual problems such as strikes, disruptions, counter-revolutionaries, etc. Basically, dependent capitalism tried to prove that the government is not able to manage the nationalized industries.

In this meeting, Engineer Mohammad 'Ali Zaker, the secretary of the Organization for the Coordination of the Development and Independence of Iranian Industries, explained the goals of this organization. He said: The Organization began operation with insignificant means from last June-July [TIr]. First, it took steps to organize an exhibition of spare parts imported from abroad. The goal of this exhibition was to have Iranian craftsmen make these parts. But there were several major problems including the fact that most of those who were able to make the parts did not have the necessary means. And another problem was that the cost was high, several times the price of foreign-made parts. In addition, lack of cooperation on the part of factories with craftsmen caused problems.

He added: We have divided industries into 18 guild councils. The primary duty of these councils is to help establish an industrial information bank.

Following this session, Engineer Rahjú, vice minister of mines of the Ministry of Industries and Mines, spoke about the excavation of mines: Different organizations will participate in the excavation of mines and we are trying to centralize all excavation activities in one place, in an independent organization called "The Unit for the Exploration of Mines."

He added: Following the ratification of the Constitution, we drew up the Law of Mines in consultation with various spiritual leaders including Mr Golzadeh-Ghafurí and we sent it to the Revolutionary Council. In accordance with this law, since the mines belong to the people, no excavation permit will be issued to individuals. However, exploration will remain open to the private sector. That is, the private sector will be contracted to do excavation for the government.

At the end of the meeting, Engineer Hejazi, vice minister for finance and administration of the Ministry of Industries and Mines, said: The Ministry's personnel has been reduced by 25 percent and from an organizational perspective, it has decreased by 50 percent [as published].

HALF OF FOREIGN TRADE NATIONALIZED

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 19 Aug 80 p 12

[Article: "Minister of Commerce Announces at a Press Conference: Fifty Percent of Foreign Commerce Has Been Nationalized"]

[Text] At a press conference the Minister of Commerce discussed issues in the areas of foreign trade, centers of production and distribution of goods, setting up an institute for commercial studies, helping the private sector, price control, and the employment of specialists.

This conference, held in the offices of the Ministry of Commerce, was attended by the managing directors of the three centers, Production and Distribution, Metals, Paper and Wood, and Textiles and Fibres. Reza Sadr, Minister of Commerce, began by talking about foreign trade: At the end of Ordibehesht [mid April] we were able to secure the Revolutionary Council's approval of Article 44 of the Constitution, which divides the economic system of the Islamic Republic of Iran into government, cooperative, and private sectors with a systematic and eminently sound plan. He added: After the text of the law nationalizing foreign trade is written and approved by the Council of Ministers at the end of Tir [mid June], no one will be able to import iron directly. As of now around 50 percent of foerign commerce has been nationalized, of which around 30 percent of the country's imports will be secured by three centers. Twenty percent of that is related to the Center of Metals, and the other 10 percent will be handled by the centers of paper, wood, textiles, and fibre importing. Taking another group of imports into consideration, such as wheat, rice, meat, sugar cubes, sugar, and vegetable oil, which have been handled by the government up until now, this makes more than 50 percent.

Reza Sadr said: Another foundation has been set up for commercial studies which has prepared itself to gather statistics.

We know that we have been getting the worst of it in trade until now, for we have paid high prices for goods because we have not had good information in the international market. Since our trade has been traditional in nature, our information has been very slight. He said: We hope to make progress in our commercial and industrial sectors in order to be able to reduce prices and inflation.

Then Shoja'eidin Fathi, an assistant in the Ministry of Commerce, talked about changes in the country's economic situation: It is our intention, by not continuing in a state of dependence, to turn our talents to production within the country. Therefore, the first effect of nationalization is to return production to within the country. If not, we will not achieve self sufficiency through talk and discussion. Therefore, the choice of methods should be such that people will move in the direction of production. Therefore, this profiteering must be stopped.

In conclusion, he called for communications to study and analyze the effects of nationalization in order for it to be clear whether in the long run nationalization of foreign trade would lead to self sufficiency or not.

Reza Sadr added: After commerce was nationalized and more than 80 percent of industry was nationalized, a law was approved by the Revolutionary Council which appointed 22 members of the 45-person Executive Committee of the Chamber of Commerce from the Ministries of Commerce, Industries, and Mines, two people from the mines sector, 10 people from the industries sector, and 10 people from commerce. Of this number, six members of this same chamber and these same centers will be chosen, and also 23 other people will be chosen from the private sector for the purpose of helping the growth of foreign trade.

He said: I hope, with the awareness that we will give the people, and with attention to article 44, the upholders of which law will be in the Chamber of Commerce, and with attention to people in charge, God willing we will succeed in implementing this article according to the wishes of its affirmers in the Assembly of Experts and the nation.

Mohammad Suri, an assistant in the Ministry of Commerce, said concerning the establishment of a trade center: We have decided to convert the 32 story building called the Mepehr Building, formerly belonging to Hazhbar Yazdaui, to a trade center, in order to centralize all centers in that place. In this way we will transform our business from a bazaar of little shops and offices to a presentable condition that is competitive with the large countries of the world. To this end, we are asking the owner of this building, meaning the Export Bank, to complete it and turn over all the necessary facilities and international business information to the government.

MINISTRY OF LABOR SETS 44-HOUR WORK WEEK

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 18 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Tehran--Working hours for all government employees as well as workers in the private sector has been fixed at 44 hours per week, it was announced by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, Reza Nematzadeh yesterday.

Nematzadeh speaking to the Pars News Agency said that the law will be strictly enforced as from August 23, 1980.

Under laws operating earlier working hours for executives and officials was only 35 hours per week and since the beginning of the revolution there was no consistency in the number of working hours, as a result of the lengthy periods for which offices and commercial houses came to be voluntarily closed in support of revolutionary calls.

Later, with industrial closures, worker and manager disputes, calls for pay rises and other attendant disruptions of work no regular working hours could be properly determined.

It was suggested, said the labor minister, that working hours for the lower rings in the work force should be reduced to bring it in line with working hours to those in the official and executive grades. But this has been rejected, he said, as the revolutionary tasks ahead deem more working hours necessary rather than fewer hours before.

Since early in 1980 there have been attempts at every level to have industries back on their feet and normalizing of work in all government departments, so the longer working hours were a matter of the highest priority now, the labor minister said.

Asked if it was fair that working hours for officials and executives should be equalized in view of the heavy work capacities that those in this category were called upon to bear, Nematzadeh disagreed saying that labor laws throughout the world did not discriminate this way. Besides, he said, it was anticipated that most government departments would be faced with a problem of overstaffing shortly. He added that this was because there were plans mooted for streamlining work in all these departments.

The solution, he said, would be to divert as many officials as possible into the provinces and rural sectors. This is in keeping with government's policies of decentralization of society stressing development in the provinces and rural sectors.

RAILROAD IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM LAUNCHED

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 23 Aug 80 p 3

[Article: "By the General Director of Railroads: The Program for the Expansion, Replacement, and Repair of Railways Announced"]

[Text] Seyyed Mohammad 'Alizadeh, director general of Iranian government railroads, related the present situation of the railroads and their problems in a press conference.

Before the interview, the problems of the railroads were pointed out with slides and explanations. It was explained that within only the last week, seven bombs were discovered and neutralized in the Iranian railroads. There are also many telephone calls which threaten to stop the trains. In this connection, a number of people have been arrested and handed over to the proper authorities.

Then, Engineer Alizadeh, concerning the general policies of the railroads after the revolution, said:

We began basic repairs of the railroads four months ago; however, the budget for railroads in '80-'81 ['59] is insufficient. Had we had the funds, we would have been able to employ 100,000 people.

For instance, between Tehran and Garmsar there has been no reconstruction. Along this route, which is 114 km, so far only 100 km of railroad has been replaced.

The Revolutionary Council has put 600 million rials at our disposal in connection with the budget shortage, the plan for self-sufficiency, and rapid action plans.

He also added: About one-half million tons of rails designated for the stretch between the ports of Emam Khomeyni and Ma'shur (formerly Mahshahr), which is about 2,809 km, have been abandoned. These rails were purchased four to seven years ago and have been left out in the rain.

Concerning the engine power of the trains, Alizadeh said:

Presently, we have 414 diesels, one-fourth of which are used for freight and passengers. The rest, because of the lack of spare parts, labor problems, salary shortages, etc., are inoperational.

At the present time, we have 48,000 employees of the railroads who do not hold high school diplomas or are illiterate, with the exception of 4-5,000. They are, in fact, among the most disadvantaged employees of the railroads.

The reason is that the railroad was the only institution which was not in the service of the tyrannical power. Of course, it transported military personnel, but on the whole, it has been an institution used for transporting freight and passengers. The situation is presently the same. The exploitive policies of governments which controlled locomotives and rails were to profit from keeping the railroad system a consuming institution. They did not worry about making the railroads self-sufficient; they only thought of trying to sell as much as possible.

For example, when they brought us turbotrains, they did so only for their profit of $800 million.

The director general of railroads then added:

On the whole, the present situation of the railroads from the standpoint of passengers, roads, spare parts, etc. can be divided into three segments. The technical segment includes the situation with the rails, engine power, and employees and related problems. As far as the situation with the rails is concerned, there are 4,600 km of main lines and 200 km of secondary lines. These lines have not had essential, basic repairs since they were built by the British, French, and Russians.

All the lines need to be replaced, and most disasters are caused for this reason.

The ballast and ties have been damaged by snow, flood, and rain and grass has grown between the ties.

He added that although we have had 2-2 1/2 times fewer engines in operation than in previous years, this year more freight has been transported than before.

The director general of the Iranian government railroads also said: The people should realize themselves that they should travel less in order to cut back on railroad usage.

Concerning spare parts and necessary equipment, he said that the United States is not providing us with this equipment but intends to sell it to us through third parties at twice or three times the actual price. We, of course, will not accept this. In any case, the rebuilding of the lines will take 7-8 years.

He added: The safety factor of our railroads is very low and the possibility of train derailments does exist. The reason is that for many years attention has not been paid to them. Only in the last 6 or 7 months has there been any movement concerning the railroads. We need 18 million rials per km to rebuild the lines. Next year, we will rebuild between 500 and 700 km of railroad. In the north and in the south together, 1500 km of railroad needs to be rebuilt.

Concerning the making of parts, locomotive equipment, and rails in Iran, he said: About 18 or 19 years ago, a locomotive was built in Iran, all of whose parts we could build ourselves. After the coup d'état of 1953 [28 Mordad], 254 Santa Fe steam engines were put into service between 1953 and 1955 [1332-1334], which were supposed to last for 40 years. After the coup d'état, the changing of railroad directors, and the signing of contracts with the United States, the steam engines were taken out of operation and buried, even those which had no mileage on them. But at the present time, our job is to replace parts. For instance, last year we replaced 1400 cylinder heads which were corroded.

Because 5 months ago supplies had reached zero, we repaired and used the old train parts which had formerly been disposed of. For comparison, last year in Pakistan, only one cylinder head was replaced while at the same time in Iran 1400 cylinder heads were replaced. Between 2 1/2 and 6 months ago, that is, until early June [mid Khordad], we had only 78 heavy diesel engines left out of 122. That is, every week, one engine went out of order. Since 2 1/2 months ago, through the efforts and attention of employees, the number has become fixed. We have succeeded in keeping the figure at about 62 diesel engines.

Of course, recently because of the increased number of passengers, we have added seven or eight engines.

He added: By using old parts, we have been able to make repairs in 70 cases, of which only 2 have gone out of order.

PARTY ORGAN HAILS TIES WITH INDIA

Tehran TEHRAN TIMES in English 18 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The morning daily Jomhouri-e Eslami in a front page article yesterday commented on the relations between Iran and India and said that the Islamic Revolution of Iran has created joy among the Moslems of India. Realistically, the Iranian Revolution could further strengthen the friendship between the two countries for it has dealt the severest blow ever to United States imperialism and British colonialism in the region. There is need to say that the nation of India too has suffered from British and American colonialism and the U.S. through its plots has created schism among Hindu and Moslem population of India with the objective of preventing them from fighting against the dominant world blasphemy.

At present these populations are suffering from these plots and therefore they should all become aware of these instigations and put an end to them.

The fact is that the Hindus and Moslems could live together in peace and unitedly fight against imperialism and in this connection the Islamic Revolution of Iran could assist them and could take steps to strengthen friendly relations between these populations. Besides, Iran and India could expand their relations in the sphere of industry and economics. Such cooperation which would not appease the enemies of the two countries could be beneficial for both of them. Iran could meet part of the economic demands of India and India in return, could through its cooperation with Iran open a strong economic front against imperialism, added the newspaper.

In the opinion of Jomhouri-e Eslami so far the efforts made to create peaceful coexistence between Hindus and Moslems have not been sufficient enough, for both population to be able to develop their culture in a fee atmosphere. To this end holding Islamic seminars and conferences would prove to be useful, stressed the article.

The article concluded by saying that if the statesmen of the two countries realize the importance of expansion of the relations between Iran and India there would be a promising future for both nations culturally, economically and politically.

This is because stability and peace in the Indian Sub-Continent is a vital importance for the Islamic Revolution of Iran and the Iranian Revolution could not remain indifferent towards the foolish plots of U.S. imperialism.

COUNTRY SEEN READY FOR PREEMPTIVE WAR

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 27 Jun 80 pp 24-25

[Article by Nash'at al-Taghlubi: "Israel Plans for Preemptive War If Palestinians Go on With Escalation of Their Operations; European Initiative Does not Support Anybody Against Anybody; Zionist Call for 'Unity of World Jewry and Israel'; Return to Zero Point in Egyptian-Israeli Negotiations"]

[Text] Before King Husayn's visit to Washington, Jordan was the focus of attention. After the conclusion of the king's talks with U.S. President Carter, Jordan has continued to be the focus of attention. However, the following questions are raised: What comes after President Carter's determination to carry on with the two Camp David accords to the end and after the Jordanian monarch's refusal to join these two accords which, according to the monarch, have not made a single step forward on the path of solving the Palestinian problem? What does Jordan intend to do now regarding the Palestinian resolution to escalate the military operations in the occupied territories and the subsequent use of the Jordanian, Syrian and Lebanese territories and Israeli reactions to such escalation?

Before King Husayn's trip to Washington, it was noticed that Yasir 'Arafat visited Jordan and held a long meeting with the king. After 'Arafat, the Jordanian capital was visited by a Palestinian delegation headed by Abu Jihad, the Joint Jordanian-Palestinian Committee then met and a delegation representing the Palestinian National Council followed.

It is true that these movements were for the purpose of getting reassured about the health of Bassam al-Shak'ah, the mayor of Nabulus whose legs had been amputated. But what is also true is that Israel has not been unaware of what is happening on the Palestinian-Jordanian arena. Israel has wasted no time and has resorted immediately to talking about "a Palestinian base being set up in the Jordanian territories to escalate the military operations in the West Bank," warning the neighboring Arab countries of "the consequences of any attacks constituting a threat to Israel's security."

At the same time, the Israeli papers have devoted extensive space to attacking the resolution issued by Fatah, the Palestine Liberation Movement, calling for "the full liberation of Palestine and the economic, political, military, cultural and intellectual liquidation of the Zionist entity." It has been noticed that the papers have seized upon this paragraph and have disregarded the second paragraph of the resolution calling for "the establishment of a democratic Palestinian state on the entire Palestinian soil," i.e. a common state in which the Arabs and the Jews coexist. These papers have intentionally stressed that the Palestinians cannot carry out the operations to which they have referred unless the neighboring Arab countries (Jordan, Syria and Lebanon) agree to let the Palestinians launch their operations from their territories and unless the other Arab countries supply them with the money necessary for the "war escalation." This is why the Israelis have made their threats against several Arab countries, considering the contacts that have taken place in Jordan on the one hand and the rapprochement between Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Iraq on the other hand, as well as the Jordanian, Saudi and Iraqi armament, and even the Egyptian armament, a direct threat to Israel's security. This is also why the Israelis have said that "the Arab countries must shoulder their responsibilities for whatever may result from this."

Under Israeli pressure, the United States has been compelled to dip its bucket in the issue and Muskie, the U.S. Secretary of State, has addressed a direct warning to the Egyptians, Israelis and Palestinians and an indirect warning to all the Arabs against "obstructing the negotiations over the two Camp David accords." Muskie has further warned of a "whirlwind of destruction that will cover the Near East area" and will threaten "to extend to the other parts of the world" if the two accords do not reach their goal.

The U.S. Department of State has also considered the resolution of "Fatah, the party with influence in the PLO," to escalate the military action against Israel at the expense of the diplomatic efforts a very serious matter by virtue of the fact that "it doesn't offer any help to the peace efforts."

As for the U.S. press, it has attributed to the U.S. officials the reports that they expect numerous explosions in a vast area extending from the Near East to southwest Asia. This press has said that "the PLO is awaiting the outcome of the two meetings of the European countries in Venice to determine in the light of their outcome implementation of the program of scheduled operations." This press has also said that "Israel is getting ready and is blaming ahl the Arab countries, especially the neighboring Arab countries."

Meanwhile, Washington has been exerting big efforts for resumption of the Egyptian-Israeli negotiations. This effort has been proceeding in two parallel lines: First, obstruct a European initiative conflicting with the two Camp David accords. Second, compel the Arab countries, especially Jordan, "not to facilitate the Palestinian task of escalating the operations in the occupied territories."

Egypt and Israel have agreed to direct preparatory contacts in Washington to know "the nature of the grounds on which the negotiations can be resumed."

But neither Cairo nor Tel Aviv are convinced of the possibility of realizing any success in this regard. The Begin government has considered the U.S. invitation "a temporary superficial success" for Carter, enabling him to keep the crisis at a distance for some time and to devote his efforts to his election campaign. The Cairo government finds nothing from Israel to encourage resumption of the negotiations, especially since Begin--who had repeatedly stressed his refusal of any "conditional" negotiations--has been the first to hasten to set "prior conditions" when he declared that Israel alone decides the necessities of its security in the occupied territories and that the government cannot ask the Knesset (the Israeli parliament) to withdraw the bill for establishing the city of Jerusalem as the finally united capital of Israel. Cairo has said that this declaration is a direct reference to the two points that had led to suspending the Egyptian-Israeli negotiations last month. Cairo has added that the statement in which Begin has stressed his determination to build 10 more settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is enough to blow up everything because it means a return to the Zero point.

As for the European initiative, the U.S. movement to contain this initiative has been described as "consisting of a series of warnings." President Carter has warned his European allies, stressing that he is "firmly and strongly in control of the delicate matters, despite his preoccupation with the elections!" Carter's secretary of state has also declared frankly that the United States will not allow its control of the Egyptian-Israeli negotiations to be lost and that it will not allow any measure at present leading to the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

This U.S. position has, naturally, influenced the resolutions of the EEC countries participating in the Venice meeting. These resolutions have had the quality of a "political declaration" rather than the quality of "positive action," even though some Palestinian circles have considered the resolutions a step forward. Though the European capitals have implied that their initiative will assume bigger dimensions later on, the European political observers do not find it likely that any significant development will occur, first, because Washington wants nothing to annoy it from now till the end of the presidential elections and, second, because the European countries are eager to avoid a confrontation with the United States at present, as evident in the statement made by Jean Francois-Poncet, the French minister of foreign affairs, to the U.S. NEWSWEEK. Perhaps this statement explains to a large degree the nature of the Elycee Palace (the French presidency) thinking under the present circumstances. Despite the enthusiasm of French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing for a European initiative leading to the recognition of the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and to recognition of the Palestine people's right to self-determination and to the establishment of their state, he has been initially persuaded that the European initiative must pass through phases: The first is the phase of "filling the vacuum during the period in which the U.S. administration is paralyzed because of the elections." The second is the phase of deciding on positive action through amendment of Security Council resolution 242 or through any other formula agreed upon, such as the formula proposed by U.N. Secretary General Kurt Waldheim calling for the holding of an international conference to deal with the Palestinian issue and to decide on the solution it requires in freedom from the Geneva conference formula whereby the conference was chaired alternately by the United States and the Soviet Union.

On the basis of this reality, the French press has described the European initiative as being "in support of nobody and against nobody."

The question raised now is: Will Fatah, and consequently the PLO, carry out the threat to escalate the military operations in the occupied territories? Will the Arab countries help them to do so? What will the position of Israel, and also that of the United States, be in such a case?

Those who observe the course of developments in the Middle East area sum up the features of these developments as follows:

First, the recent developments, both at the international diplomatic level and in the occupied territories, confirm that the position of the Palestinians, and of Yasir 'Arafat in particular, has improved and strengthened. It is indubitable that Israel has become isolated internationally and that it can find no supporter other than the United States. On the other hand, despite all the Israeli pressures, the Palestinians in the occupied homeland continue to acknowledge no party other than the PLO as their representative.

Second, while the regime in Israel suffers from internal degeneration and faces the danger of escalated violence, it is noticed that all the Arab countries, especially the Gulf countries, will find themselves compelled to go to the most radical extremes if the efforts exerted at present fail to reach a comprehensive settlement for the Palestinian issue.

Third, the United States, despite its shaky international reputation as the result of its inability to persuade Israel to abide by the provisions of the Camp David accords, still insists on monopolizing the diplomatic action in the Middle East without displaying any readiness for any alternative to these two accords, keeping in mind that the United States knows that there has to be advance preparation for any conference held to solve any problem, meaning that there has to be preparatory negotiations that lay down the fundamental lines which guarantee the success of such a conference.

Fourth, President al-Sadat has not at all changed his opinion that the solution to the Palestinian problem and peace in the Middle East pass through neither Moscow, Paris or any other capital but through Washington alone. The reason for his insistence on his opinion is that he is wagering on the fall of Begin's government and the coming of another more moderate government!

Fifth, continuation of the present situation in the area encourages the inclination toward violence. When violence and counter-violence begin, the vicious circle starts and nobody knows when or where this circle will end.

Sixth, as a result of the internal U.S. conditions, Menachem Begin has become more inflexible and no longer agrees to anything conflicting with the rejected conditions which he has laid down as a basis for the Israeli solution to the self-rule issue. Begin has even denounced the U.S. abstention from voting on the resolution issued by the Security Council denouncing the attacks on the mayors of Nabulus and Ramallah. Because of this abstention, Begin has criticized the Washington administration sharply, as if he wants it to support the terror perpetrated by radical Israeli organizations--and all signs indicate that these organizations receive support from Begin's government itself.

But why has the U.S. secretary of state voiced his warning in which he expects "a destructive whirlwind extending from the Middle East to the other parts of the world" at a time when the U.S. officials whisper that "the Arab countries will not dare to open their borders to the PLO" and when they cite as an example the statement made by 'Abd-al-Hamid Sharaf, the Jordanian prime minister, in which he has talked of "supporting our brothers in the occupied territories" without making any reference to supporting the Palestinian action outside the occupied territories, being content with calling on the Arab countries to engage in serious action to confront the Israeli occupation and asserting that "Jordan will be in the vanguard of the deep Arab confrontation?"

The Americans answer that the international equation has compelled them to make radical statements.

On this particular point, the U.S. press and the European press are in agreement that the PLO is capable of moving despite the reservations of some Arab countries on this movement and that the Soviet Union is now interested in pushing the Middle East conditions toward further tension.

As for Begin's government which has been spreading threats that "it will not soften by one iota insofar as its security is concerned," it is no less worried than Washington itself. Its concern emanates primarily from the tension which has not been confined to the occupied territories alone but which has spread among Palestinians carrying Israeli identity cards [Israeli Palestinians] in the other areas. Begin has found himself compelled to warn these Palestinians against their solidarity with the West Bank Palestinians and the Israeli opposition has also found itself compelled to support Begin on this issue in the wake of the [press] conference held by Tawfiq Ziyad, the Knesset member and representative of the communist party (Rakah) in the Knesset, who criticized the Israeli government's position vis-a-vis the attack on the mayors of Nabulus and Ramallah and vis-a-vis the attack on Hebron.

On the other hand, the French LE FIGARO has published a statement by Shimon Peres, the opposition (Labor Party) leader, expressing tacit support for the position of Begin's government. Peres has expressed the belief that Israel is smaller than to have an agricultural society and an industrial society and has said that the Israeli Palestinians must contribute to industrializing the country as they contributed in the past to developing agriculture and "they benefited a lot from this." Even though Peres considers the settlements built by his government a "de facto that allows their legitimacy" whereas the present government "is building settlements outside the framework of any legitimacy," he has urged Europe not to "obstruct the course of the peace in which it had not participated before and not to make Arab oil the sole expression of its foreign policy and of a society that has not yet succeeded in establishing the political Europe!" Peres has also said: "For the Camp David accords to overcome their present crisis, the government must change its policy on settlement in the occupied territories, the self-rule must be first applied in Gaza which will become the 'Hong Kong' of the Mediterranean and elections must be held in Judea and Samaria in coordination with Jordan because the Judea and Samaria--West Bank--Palestinians have not given up their Jordanian passports. Their choice will not be between us and Jordan but between Jordan and the PLO. This is more an issue of interest than one of conviction."

This statement has assured the French press of the presence of a common denominator between Begin's government and any other government that will replace it insofar as the Palestinian issue is concerned. The statement has also asserted that if Begin tries to explode the situation, even if he does so according to the saying "upon my head and the head of my enemies," the explosion will guarantee him a better position, regardless of the circumstances and the results, because the explosion will guarantee, first, the containment of the "hesitant" European initiative and, second, embarking on the negotiations from an angle different from the angle on which Egypt still insists. What Begin fears worst at present is what has been said by some Labor Party leaders about the presence of the danger of the eruption of a civil war in Israel if it is decided to evacuate the settlements. This is why is has encouraged the terrorist operations aimed at devoiding the West Bank of the main Palestinian leaderships and even of the population, if necessary, "because of the difficulty of controlling more than one million Palestinians in the occupied territories. He has even included in his calculations the possibility of launching a preemptive war if Jordan weakens and permits the PLO to act from its territories."

This possibility has appeared in the appeal addressed by (Leon Dolzen), the chairman of the International Zionist Organization and of the Jewish Agency, to the Israelis to stop their internal quarrels and to exercise self-restraint and full solidarity. Dolzen has said: The internal quarrels cast shadows on the national cohesion over which the government and the opposition do not disagree. The most important foundations of this cohesion are opposition to the establishment of a Palestinian state, opposition to negotiations with the PLO and opposition to the partition of Jerusalem and a return to the 1967 borders. Dolzen has also stressed the importance of Jewish unity between Israel and the world Jewry to confront whatever threatens the Israeli entity.

Thus, Israel has not been making offhanded threats against the Arab countries and has not adopted its inflexible positions out of the desire to foil the Camp David accord concerning the Palestinian self-rule. Israel has done this, in the view of the Israeli observers themselves, in an attempt to create a new reality which it doesn't want changed if President Carter is re-elected and finds himself free of the Zionist votes, considering that his new term will be the last term permitted by the constitution.

Those who believe in this view add that what encourages Israel most to carry out this plan is its feeling that it is capable of launching a preemptive war against one or two Arab countries without facing reactions from the other Arab countries as a result of the conflicts still present among these countries. Even if there are reactions, they will come late.

On the basis of this situation, successive Israeli statements containing indirect threats against the Arabs have been made. However, these statements constitute, in the opinion of the observers, indicators that must not be disregarded or neglected. General Etan, the Israeli chief of staff, has pointed out in a statement to YEDI'OT AHARONOT that the eastern front (the front with Jordan and Syria) is being bolstered "in an unimaginable way." Etan has also said: An enormous military base is also being built in Tabuk, Saudi Arabia. This Saudi base is adjacent to the Port of Eilat on the Bulf of 'Aqaba. As for Jordan, it possesses Chieftain tanks which are the best kind of tanks. Jordan will also receive weapons from the Soviet Union and the Jordanian army is developing rapidly and now owns antiaircraft batteries. As for Syria, it has replaced its old tanks with Soviet T-62 and T-72 tanks and has acquired Mig-23 and Mig-25 aircraft. As for Iraq, it has doubled its army in the past 4 years. General Etan has added: All this means that what is happening on the eastern front is very serious. Therefore, there is no place at present for economizing in the Ministry of Defense budget. Israel has the ability to confront this front if Israel's army remains the stronger and the better.

On the other hand, General (Sagi), the chief of the Israeli intelligence, has said in another statement: Israel does not expect a war because instability in the Arab area generally spares it such a war. However, it must be said that "any change or any revolution that may occur in the area will act as two factors leading to war."

Naturally, Sagi has not defined the form of the change or of the revolution which, or one of which, Israel can use a pretext for war. Israel considers the evaluation of such a matter a private concern and an internal affair! This exactly is what calls for extreme caution because the experiences through which the Arab countries, especially the frontline states, have gone from 1949 until the present confirm that the issue of "security" is to the Israelis, with their various governments, the clothes hanger on which they hang the justifications for all their wars, which they call preemptive wars!

LIKUD, ALINEMENT CLASH IN HISTADRUT

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 21 Jul 80 p 3

[Article by Yehudit Winkler: "Struggle Between the Likud and the Alinement in the Packaging of Ideology"]

[Text] The tension which marked the preparations for the opening of the second session of the Histadrut convention dissipated yesterday, just before the beginning of the deliberations. It became evident that the Likud does not intend at this stage to carry out the threat to turn to the courts, in order to protect its status in the Histadrut institutions. "We are too late," explained MK Me'ir Cohen, one of the heads of the Likud in the Histadrut Council, the appeal to the courts will indeed take place.

The morning session of the Histadrut convention in the Hall of Culture in Tel Aviv was more than a little reminiscent of the meetings of the central committee of the Labor Party. In the first rows of the center of the hall stood the hierarchy of the Alinement; Shimon Peres, Chaim Bar-Lev, Yitzhaq Rabin, Secretary of the MAPAM Victor Shem-Tov, Gad Ya'aqovi, Yosef Takoa, and the former secretaries-general of the Histadrut Yitzhaq Ben-Aharon and Aharon Baqar. Missing from the ranks of the Likud were the members of the Knesset, including those who spent the first part of their political careers in the Histadrut, and others who sought to convince the public before the entrance of the Likud into the Histadrut that they were members of the Histadrut--that their right to vote and to be elected is anchored in this membership.

Next Year's Elections

The second session of the Histadrut convention was convened, first and foremost, for the purpose of paving the way for the holding of the elections to the Histadrut next year, and not in 1982 as the Histadrut Council had decided in the past. The change of the decision requires the approval of the convention.

Attached to this formal decision (taken during the initial states of clarification in the hierarchy of the Alinement in the Histadrut) was another decision which authorizes the Histadrut Council to hold discussions--in order to define and to specify the rights and obligations of the factions in the Histadrut. Anyone familiar with what is happening in the Histadrut calls this decision another attempt of the Alinement to cope with the repeated efforts of the Likud in the Histadrut institutions to move the struggle outside of its confines in the courts and in the Knesset--where it is a respectable minority, albeit a minority nonetheless--to the executive committee of the Histadrut, where the Alinement enjoys a substantial majority which enables it to conduct the routine activities in the Histadrut in accordance with its viewpoint and policy.

Ideological Packaging

These practical aspects were enclosed yesterday at the convention in ideological packaging--the head of the Alinement referred to the convention as an "ideological convention" even though throughout yesterday there were only a few ideological comments. The dispute between the Alinement and the Likud has been conducted along the policy line of the present government and the policy of the former Alinement governments. The controversy which continued throughout the day was far from being one involving thinkers who represented opposing political and economic world outlooks.

The secretary general of the Histadrut MK Yeruham Meshel stated in his opening address: "It is necessary to appeal to the government, and in my opinion, the government itself should have had the sense to put its political, economic, and social policy to the public test."

Before this, Meshel greeted the Chairman of the Labor Party, MK Shimon Peres, who was present in the hall, however, he ignored the presence of MK Yitzhaq Rabin. The Likud representative Ya'aqov Shamat "stole the show" when he reminded everyone that former prime minister Yitzhaq Rabin was present in the hall. His words were greeted with the thunderous applause of those in the hall, virtually without party distinction.

MK Meshel reiterated the necessity to hold elections as soon as possible, and subsequently stated that the Histadrut must also hold a social ideological discussion and sharpen the debate, in order to accelerate the process of meeting with the public. This will enable the latter to judge the path it will choose for the conduct of the affairs of state. "The crisis is not only conjectural, it has become structural" were the words of the Histadrut secretary general. Meshel repeated the opposition of the Alinement to the compulsory arbitration law, demanded the imposition of a tax on capital gains, and for an entire hour repeated his often-expressed criticism of the economic and social policy of the present government.

Meshel Opposed To Removal of Likud

The Histadrut secretary general announced that he was opposed to the removal of the Likud from the Histadrut. However, he also stated that "we dare not have a situation in which a recognized faction seeks (outside of Histadrut) a way to overcome decisions which a democratic majority took in the Histadrut." In response to the demand of the Likud that the Workers Cooperative Association grant a cost-of-living increase of 100 percent instead of 80 percent as was specified in the wage agreement, MK Meshel said: "...this is hypocrisy not truth."

The chairman of the Likud faction, Daniel Nahmani, followed in the footsteps of the Histadrut secretary general and expanded the political dispute which could have developed on any other political rostrum, "I appeal from this rostrum to the members of the Knesset and to the head of the opposition to be faithful to the State of Israel...you are doing everything possible to bring down the government..."

In referring to the attempts to prevent the Likud from moving its struggles in the Histadrut outside its confines, he stated: "...it is our right and our obligation as an opposition, without damaging the State and the Histadrut, to struggle against everything which we see as contrary to the truth, justice, and conscience." The chairman of the Likud delegation also had an explanation as to why the hierarchy of the Histadrut was seeking to advance the elections: "The moment the Alinement believes that there are prospects for it to increase its strength in the Histadrut, it wants to bring on elections so that the Alinement will have the power to weaken the workers community. This was the situation before the Likud government. This is the situation which the Alinement wants, and I do not understand how you do not comprehend the matter...."

No Roll-Call Votes

At the beginning of the session, the majority of the convention approved the proposal of the chairman of the preparatory committee, Aharon Harel, to change the rules of the convention so that the votes would be conventional--not roll-call ones as the Likud had demanded. Also rejected was the Likud demand to include on the agenda a motion to discuss the implementation of a 100 percent cost of living increase, and the updating of the points of credit and allowances for children.

The various speakers for the Likud repeated their criticism of the heads of the Histadrut for not including an update of the points of credit and allowances in the framework agreement with the representatives of the civil service. They sought to prove by this that the upper echelon of the Histadrut is primarily concerned about the established groups in the population, on the account of those with little means and large families. Against this background, a dispute erupted on more than one occasion as to who is a more faithful representative of the workers, during which the claim was hard numerous times from the ranks of the Likud that the convention delegates of the Alinement do not represent the workers. From the benches of the Alinement came the repeated criticism of the Likud that its primary concern has been oriented towards government.

Concerns Prove To Be Unfounded

The concerns of Aharon Harel over the distortion of the deliberation and intentional disturbances on the part of the Likud proved to be unfounded. There was one instance, which occurred slightly after noon, when the representative of the Likud, Shmuel Robert ascended the rostrum and remarked: "...everyone here speaks in the name of the worker. Who here is a worker? Whom amongst you have been workers all their lives or for many years? You have never worked in your lives. This amounts to a collection of communal workers. This is what you are.... The Likud made a serious error when it did not begin to move you, so that you would not have anything to eat.... You do not know any other language, only force.... You have created an economy of hidden unemployment in this nation, a nation of insurance agents and bookkeepers...."

The special session of the Histadrut convention yesterday was far from being an ideological convention. At best, it served as a forum for a repetitive and concentrated dispute between the Likud and the Alinement, in the well-known style of the executive committee. There was no confrontation between world outlooks.

The one-day session of the convention was primarily another political instrument in the struggle between the two large parties, on the level of trade union activists.

POLL ASSESSES STRENGTH OF POLITICAL PERSONALITIES

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 23 Jul 80 pp 1, 2

[Article: "Independent List Headed By Hurvitz Would Win Only Two Seats"]

[Text] If the Finance Minister Yigael Hurvitz would run together with MK Zalman Shoval at the head of an independent list in the Knesset elections, this list would not win more than two seats during the first half of July; in contrast with the three seats of the RAFI faction of the Likud in the present Knesset. This is apparent from the monthly public opinion poll conducted for the MONAITIN Monthly by Dr Mina Tzemah.

In light of the information that Hurvitz and Shoval are considering the possibility of establishing an independent list outside of the Likud structure, 1,219 interviewees were asked for whom they would vote "if Minister Yigael Hurvitz would leave the Likud and, together with MK Shoval, set up an independent list." It is evident from the responses that the electoral potential of such a list does not exceed 1.5 percent of the electorate, and this amounts to 2 seats: one at the expense of the Likud and one at the expense of the Alinement.

A MONAITIN poll in July tested the electoral potential of an independent list headed by Ezer Weizman. It is evident from the findings that if such a list were established, it would receive 12 seats during this month--8 of them at the expense of the Alinement and 3 at the expense of the Likud (in contrast with 16 seats in the June poll and 10 in the May poll).

The poll also examined the current potential of an additional option which has begun to be discussed in certain political circles--a partnership between Ezer Weizman and Moshe Dayan at the head of a new list. The responses of the interviewees indicate that if such a list were established it would receive (in July) 16 seats in the Knesset, 10 of them at the expense of the Alinement and 5 at the expense of the Likud.

The current election forecast for the first half of July, in comparison with the second third of June, reveals a rather stable picture. If the various lists were to run within their current structures and leadership there would be only slight changes in their strength: the Alinement-61 seats (63 in June); the Likud-24 (25); NRP-11 (10); Agudat Yisrael-Po'alei Agudat Yisrael-6 (6); Hatehiya-3 (2); Shai-1 (1); and the other lists -14 seats.

Slight Changes

Only slight changes--all in the sample-error range--were recorded in the July poll of MONAITIN also, in the degree of popularity of the four leading candidates for prime minister. In response to the question as to which of the four--Yitzhaq Rabin, Menahem Begin, Shimon Peres, and Ezer Weizman--is most suitable for prime minister, Rabin received 35 percent of the votes (37.9 in June), Begin-22.5 percent (20.2), Peres-19.7 percent (21.1), Weizman-12.8 percent (12.3) with 10 percent abstaining (8.5). In comparison with the June poll, Weizman maintained his strength whereas Menahem Begin (who was hospitalized during the period of the poll) recovered more than half of the 3.7 percent which he lost between May and June and again passed Shimon Peres.

The general picture, however, remained unchanged: Yitzhaq Rabin continues to lead by a significant percentage, more than 55 percent ahead of the person in second place; Begin and Peres are close to one another in the popularity race, whereas Ezer Weizman continues to be last in the list without significant changes in his strength.

The stability in the relative degree of support for Rabin and Peres is reflected in the poll in an additional question. In response to the question as to which of the two is more fit to be prime minister, Rabin received 57.3 percent of the votes against 29.6 percent for Peres (in June 57.6 against 30.2). As was the case in the previous polls, Rabin continues to lead Peres in all groups--age, education, countries of origin, and voters in the various lists, including the Alinement.

The July poll, however, included for the first time a new group--the group of members of the Alinement parties, that is to say members of the Labor Party and the MAPAM. It appears that among this group, Rabin received 53.1 percent against 41.3 percent for Peres.

LIBERAL PARTY RIGHT GAINS INFLUENCE

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 20 Jul 80 p 9

[Article by Amnon Barzilai: "Strengthening of the Liberal Right"]

[Text] When Prime Minister Menahem Begin returned home after an extended stay in the hospital, he gave his assistants an urgent request. Begin requested immediate contact with the offices of the Tel Aviv municipality, specifically with Deputy Mayor David Shifman. In the telephone conversation, Begin congratulated Shifman on his election as the chairman of the central committee of the Liberal Party. Begin also apologized for his delay in sending his greeting because of his illness; he said that he was determined that when he returned home his first act would be to telephone him and congratulate him. Shifman, a public relations expert, told Begin that on the previous Sabbath in the synagogue, he made a MESHEBARAKH [the traditional prayer for the sick, the opening words of which are MESHEBARAKH, "He who blessed..."] for the health of the prime minister, and the entire congregation responded, "Amen."

The short conversation was conducted within the framework of the customary courtesies. However, its political significance--like Shifman's victory over Minister Gideon Patt in the contest for the chairman of the party central committee--goes well beyond the normal democratic process. Step by step, the people of the chairman of the party leadership, Minister Yitzhaq Moda'i, are capturing the dominant positions in the party. About 10 days ago, it was Shifman. This week, the candidate for victory is minister Moshe Nissim (a member of the coalition in the party headed by Moda'i) who will compete against MK Avraham Sharir for the chairmanship of the party leadership.

"The Quiet Revolution"

At the conclusion of the dramatic vote in the central committee of the party which convened in the American Zionist House and after a tense wait for the results of the vote, Gideon Patt said to the members of the central committee that he regards Shifman's victory in the vote as a great and personal achievement for he himself, in that the vote proved that that half of the party backs him (backs Patt). The claim was designed to salvage the honor of Patt, whose personal status was always stronger than Shifman's. However, he was unable to erase "the quiet revolution" which took place among the Liberals. The Patt-Shifman struggle was indeed a personal one, however, the incisive fact is that Shifman--a hawk by the Liberal criteria--has views identical to those which represent Moda'i just as Patt is close in his positions to Simha Ehrlich. If Moshe Nissim defeats Avraham Sharir on Thursday in the central committee, Nissim will complete the hawkish triumvirate which will lead the party.

The change in the face of the Liberal Party--if Moda'i-Shifman-Nissim stand at its head (Ehrlich stands above them and has reconciled himself to the reality)--is not limited to a shift to the extreme on the political defense level only. The second development is shocking and more difficult to digest. At the head of the Liberal Party will be a religious and observant trio. Moda'i and Shifman--not to mention Nissim (the son of the former Sephardic chief rabbi)--are religious, observant, careful about eating only kosher food, do not travel on the Sabbath, and spend their Sabbaths and holidays in the synagogue. The strengthening of such a trio at the head of the Liberal Party (in contrast with the previous trio: Rimalt, Ehrlich, and Dolzin) will bring satisfaction to Begin. The quick telephone call to Shifman was an expression of Begin's political ability. The prime minister has perhaps disappointed his supporters in his abilities to govern, however, he has no peer in understanding internal politics and the analysis of party procedures. These internal developments foil a plan which has not yet died: to help the Liberals for the purpose of establishing a party of the center.

During the last year there was an increasing clamor in the Herut Movement for the dissolution of the Likud. This tendency is fed from several developments:

*The prevailing trend in public opinion polls which project a Likud defeat and its return to the opposition.

*The expected movement towards the extreme in the political-security positions of the Likud in the opposition.

*The voices of Yigael Hurvitz and Zalman Shoval in the RAFI calling for separation.

*The low regard for the leadership of the Liberal Party and its ability "to attract" votes.

*Confidence in the Herut Movement--that as an independent party it could win 15-20 seats in the Knesset.

In the Herut Movement the electoral potential of the RAFI is more highly regarded than the strength of the Liberals. Owing to Hurvitz's hawkish positions, the minister of finance is considered to be an ally of Herut. However, if he establishes an independent party--the Herut people believe--Hurvitz will not siphon off voters from the Herut Movement or the Likud but rather from the Labor Party, especially from the old settlement. Together with Moshe Dayan who, under the Likud administration, achieved public rehabilitation (and the possibility is not ruled out that Dayan will agree to join a political movement which will bear the RAFI name), the force which will sweep away such a list (established by [text missing] rostrum), will not be insignificant.

Without Hurvitz who, together with Zalman Shoval, represents in Likud the wealthy property owners class, it will be easy for people such as David Levi to appeal to the voters and present them with a visiting card of a party which professes to help the poor and the underprivileged. The Liberals are in the category of "a bone in the throat." They are not helping David Levi improve the populist image of the Herut. Moreover, since according to the understanding in his movement, the Liberals carry no weight among the public, their representatives in the Knesset will occupy real and safe places of the Herut people. However, for those who want a dissolution of the GAHAL partnership (the Likud was established on the basis of the agreement between Herut and the Liberals), there will be a problem with "the master of the house." As long as Begin is chairman of the movement, he will not permit the partnership between himself and the Liberals headed by Simha Ehrlich to be damaged. After Ehrlich finds that he cannot attack the new coalition in his party and joins it, Begin will not permit the Liberals to be hurt in the slightest.

Bone in the Throat

The Likud has once again fallen into a trapped position. The Herut does not want to absorb the Liberals, however, it is also unable to eject them. Although Herut does not need the Liberals in order to win over those who vote for it, the severing of the bonds which tie the Liberals to Herut will move them to the center of the political map. A unique opportunity will then be created: the Liberals would, in this event, fall lie ripe fruit into the hands of Ezer Weizman, who is waiting to see the developments toward the elections to the Knesset.

Begin would not permit his major rival for the leadership of the Likud, a golden opporunity to establish a large centrist party at his expense. Those in the Herut movement who oppose the dissolution of the Likud will ultimately gain supremacy because their argument appears to be more logical. It is perhaps better to lose several seats for the good of the Liberals who will remain with them (in one pot), rather than to destroy the Liberal Party and push it to the center so that it would be a lever for the establishment of a centrist party--such a development would push the Herut back to the middle of the fifties. The changes in the leadership of the Liberals mean turning over control by democratic means to the hawks. However, this is a process which has not been completed, and even the hawks are not eager to flaunt it. In the meeting of the central committee which elected Shifman, the faction of Gideon Patt decided "to run" Avraham Sharir for chairman of the party leadership. This position which was held by Ehrlich until the party convention was deprived of its powers with the revival of the institution of the party chairmanship, which was given to Ehrlich, and the establishment of the leadership institution--now headed by Moda'i with the election of Shifman as the chairman of the central committee.

However, in order to salvage their honor, Patt and Sharir were prepared to be satisfied with a position in the top leadership. In the deliberation which they held during the course of the meeting of the central committee, after it became known that Patt had been defeated, they decided to work for a vote of the party leadership that very day. Their consideration was tactical. Many of the coalition people had already gone home after Shifman's victory became known. Sharir had nothing to lose, and actually his prospects for defeating Nissim were rather good.

Simha Ehrlich foiled the Patt-Sharir action. He requested permission to speak, ascended the rostrum, and moved that the members of the central committee adjourn ("because of the heat and fatigue"). He suggested that the contest be held on another occasion. By a majority vote, and after the protests of the Patt and Sharir people, the members of the central committee went home. The election of Shifman was the first test of the party coalition headed by Moda'i. If Nissim is elected, it will be additional evidence of Moda'i's growing hold on the party.

The heads of the coalition now have a new trick up their sleeve. In collaboration with Simha Ehrlich and the chairman of the Liberal Workers Association Tzvi Renner, they are working on a plan to establish a nominating committee which will select the Liberal candidates for the Knesset will be selected not by secret ballots in the central committee but rather in accordance with the new relationships of the forces which are strengthening the hawkish tendencies and tightening the bond between Herut and the Liberals.

[Article by A. Kinerti: "Danger of Disintegration in SHELI"]

[Text] The crisis in SHELI worsened with the "desertion" of MK Sa'adya Marciano from the movement; following his announcement that he would not vacate his seat in the Knesset in accordance with the rotation agreement, and the negotiations which he is conducting with MK Mordekhai Algrebli on the establishment of a joint faction in the Knesset and a list for the coming elections--together with the Oded group and the Ha'ohalim movement in Jerusalem.

The SHELI institutions will apparently convene in the near future, in light of the danger of disintegration which threatens the movement. For the last two days discussions of this matter have been conducted with the participation of Me'ir Pa'il, Uri Avneri, and others; it is expected that there will be an official reaction by the institutions of SHELI to the Marciano affair. It is known that SHELI activists have been perturbed by the style of the debate between Marciano and Me'ir Pa'il, and because of the personal insults which they have exchanged.

Additional Departures Expected

SHELI is expecting the additional departures of Amnon Zikhroni, a Ha'olam Haze man and a friend of MK Avneri, who will likely joint the Labor Party and of Lova Eliav with whom Labor Party and MAPAM people have been conducting negotiations. Eliav is about to return to Israel from his sabbatical in the United States.

Also expected is the departure of a group of former MAQI members who became disenchanted with SHELI after joining it for organizational reasons--representation in the institutions, etc--and because of the position of its leaders on political issues, including relations with the PLO and contacts with PLO representatives abroad. A "pioneer" of this group who left was Yair Tzeven, who switched to MAPAM a month ago. It is known that there have been contacts by several former MAQI members with the Labor Party and MAPAM.

Marciano Wants Biton

MK Algrebli and MK Marciano are conducting intensive activity for the establishment of a joint movement which will include the Oded Movement, the Panthers from the neighborhoods and the Ha'ohalim people. Marciano wants to add his friend MK Charley Biton, a member of the HADASH [acronym for the Leftist Democratic Front] (RAKAH in the Knesset), to the Knesset faction and the proposed list. Biton's friends have said to him: "Leave RAKAH and Afghanistan and come to us."

Algrebli Wants Yitzhaqi

Yesterday, a RAKAH personality told DAVAR reporter that it can not be assumed that Biton will leave HADASH in order to join Algrebli and Marciano. In HADASH he has a free hand in an issue close to his heart, the social problems and the indigent neighborhoods. It is not impossible that Biton will appear in the HADASH list in the elections to the Tenth Knesset, this personality stated.

Algrebli is known to be working for the addition of MK Yitzhaq Yitzhaqi from the Likud to the proposed joint faction and for establishing a list to the Knesset with a "social-neighborhood platform," however, Yitzhaqi is still standing by his decision to run for the Knesset on the "One Israel" list headed by him.

Ha'ohalim Will Not Join

A DAVAR reporter on welfare matters adds:

"The Ha'ohalim Movement will not join the party established by MK's Algrebli and Marciano, however it is likely that it will collaborate with it."

A Ha'ohalim spokesman, D. Benvenisti, said yesterday that his movement welcomes the establishment of the political force which will be a preferable alternative to the parties active in Israel, however the Ha'ohalim will remain a social movement independent of any party.

POSSIBILITY OF POLITICAL CHANGE IN NATION ASSESSED

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 3 Jul 80 p 13

/Article by Muhammad Ma'tuq: "Will Normal Political Life Return to Jordan? The 'Opposition' Is Not Opposing and the Government Is Closeting Itself in Ignorance"/

/Text/ It is no longer farfetched in Amman that normal political life might return, after having been repressed after the unsuccessful coup attempt 27 years ago. There are people who believe that the matter is imminent and that it might not take more than a few months.

Although no positive sign on the imminence of this possibility has yet been given by the authorities, preparations are being made by bodies and political parties to respond to a request which is expected to be made of them to play a role they have been deprived of for a long time.

Informed sources have told AL-SAFIR that there are two contradictory trends inside the Jordanian regime, one was expressed by the prime minister himself and the other embraced by some ministers, among them ones who share his desire that the "bitter party experience" not be repeated, but who do support a move toward a new experiment which will skirt the dangers of the past and respond to the need for "normal" political life in Jordan.

It is related that one of these ministers would prefer to establish a system of two parties or two political blocks in Jordan, provided that one of them constitute the ruling system and the other represent the opposition. However, this minister, who does not seem to be speaking for himself alone, stresses the need that the opposition and the loyal party alike be under the banner of the regime.

Signals about these contradictions or disputes within the regime must have reached the political parties functioning secretly under various rubrics. The course of the dispute going on within the governnent must also have inspired optimism among these parties, and they therefore determined 2 years ago to form what they called "the popular forces in Jordan," electing a secretariat general for themselves which issues statements on political developments in the Arab region.

This political grouping, which contains most of the national and progressive political parties operating in Jordan, alongside personalities well known for their nationalist positions, was formed in April 1978. One party personality in Amman insists that the notion of the grouping arose after the Israeli invasion of southern Lebanon in March of that year.

Representatives of the political parties held their charter meeting at that time in the headquarters of the grouping of vocational unions of Jordan, in the elegant al-Shumaysani shop, and announced a charter bearing on the grouping which did not contradict official declared positions in its general policy sections. They then demanded that the authorities permit them to function, but the latter refrained and still do not recognize the secretariat general, in spite of the intense activity it was performing.

A Media Obfuscation

Through its dominance of all the media, the government has managed to ignore the secretariat general on purpose. The statements issued in the secretariat's name have sometimes been published, but under the name of "the Committee to Save Jerusalem," which also participates in the secretariat and enjoys official recognition by the government. The secretariat tried to win some recognition by deliberately issuing statements on positions which represent support for the viewpoint of the authorities (the declared one, at least). However, the statements did not reach public opinion, other than through the parties and bodies participating in this political grouping.

Some bodies participating in the abovementioned secretariat general describe this style of the authorities as proof of the insincerity of their general policy positions. If they really rejected Camp David, as they announced in a government statement, why didn't they allow the secretariat general to publish a statement supporting their position on Camp David and bearing verbal testimony to it?

Aspiration to Power

However, to some others who participate in the secretariat general, the picture does not seem so black. These people still point out how King Husayn himself attended the declaration of the birth of the national grouping following the June 1967 defeat, in order to absorb the popular resentment which had arisen from the defeat and Israel's occupation of the West Bank. These people do not rule out recognition of the secretariat general, corresponding to a recognition of the grouping, rest in peace, which was buried in September 1970, shen specific conditions arise.

Because this possibility is not farfetched, the secretariat general is fully prepared for it, and secretariat sources expect that the king will come to it at any moment or invite it and ask it to form the new government. And so on.

Although the notion seems strange now, preparation for this desired moment is going on at full speed. The most prominent features of the preparation are two: one is emphasis on the unity of the destiny of the two peoples, the Jordanians and Palestinians, and the second is care not to have Palestinian organizations represented in the secretariat general.

Most political and party personalities which a person examining the horizons of political activity in Jordan might run into see no harm in participating in power in the context of the present regime of King Husayn, although not all have neglected to compare the political positions they declare with those of the authorities.

In any event, most of these personalities do not consider the grouping of popular forces to be an opposition movement or an opposition grouping: "There is nothing for us to oppose." This is because the situation of Jordan possesses a rare characteristic, that of a front line state surrounded by two radical regimes, in Damascus and Baghdad, whose position on peace with Israel is absolutely negative and blunt, though the Jordanian regime has been able, for a while at least, to satisfy these two regimes to a given degree without letting America or Israel think that it has burned the bridges to the field of direct negotiations.

Therefore, the regime's announced political positions do not stir up protest among national parties, although most of the time they stop at the border of words.

Relations with the Regime

In another area, most of the independent political personalities which participate in the secretariat general of the popular forces in Jordan are establishing firm ties and bonds with the regime. Some observers in Jordan wonder how there can be an "opposition" when most of the people in it are millionaires and include people who have grown rich from grants and concessions the regime itself has given them.

These observers cite examples. There is one person who owns a pier in al-'Aqabah, second, one who owns a plant with a private monopoly, then a third, fourth and fifth who own millions and have been graced with permits from the regime itself.

These observers wonder how this opposition, on which the regime is raining bounties, can be. Can it not be gleaned from this that it is an opposition tailormade to the regime's measurements?

The fact is that no one in Amman with whom AL-SAFIR met, who is considered a leader of his party, which functions in secret, enthusiastically embraced the notion that the regime will change. Some of them ignore or avoid the issue entirely. Others reply by saying that there is no alternative to this regime. There are people who say that they do not see an alternative even within the royal family, and go on to say that everything propagated in the past about the existence of disputes, struggles and contradictory tendencies within the ruling family is only a rumor. The king is the whole authority and the others, starting with the crown prince and ending with government official, are officials without assignments, except for one, namely 'Abd-al-Hamid Sharaf.

'Abd-al-Hamid Shaaf himself was an opponent in the past, and was sentenced in Jordan when he assumed the position of editor in chief of the magazine AL-HURRIYAH, spokesman for the Arab Nationalists' Movement before it was liquidated. Now, however, he is the prime minister and the second person in power, entrusted with all secrets.

However, 'Abd-al-Hamid Sharaf is no longer the Arab nationalist militant he was by nature. He repudiated this characterization before making a reconciliation with the regime, as one of the conditions of this reconciliation.

'Abd-al-Hamid Sharaf is not the only nationalist party man it was possible to assimilate into power; in fact almost more than half of every cabinet formed since 1957 has consisted of former Arab nationalists and Ba'thists. It is related that one non-government Jordanian personality once passed through Damascus in a previous era and was detained by intelligence for questioning. During the interrogation the man did not deny his strong relationship with the Jordanian regime--in fact replied by stating "Why aren't you in agreement with our Ba'thist regime in Amman?" This was because most of the members of the Jordanian cabinet at that time were former Ba'thists.

However, cooperating with opposition personalities is one thing and cooperating with opposition parties is something else. In Jordan's political history, very few cases have been recorded--and those were particular in nature--when party members of parties with a national progressive context reached the parliament and the cabinet. The first time was in the days of al-Nablusi's cabinet, where a working member of the Communist Party was elected to parliament and a working member of the Ba'th Party was included in the cabinet. The second time involved the social nationalists who were linked to King Husayn by special relations which were ruined by the party's position on the Jordan massacres of September 1970. Before that, the party managed to get two members into parliament, Ra'uf Abu Jabir and 'Abd-al-Halim al-Nimr; the second later became minister but by that time had finally left the party.

In spite of the distinctive relationship linking the Jordanian regime to them, the Moslem Brothers have remained a peripheral power in Jordan and were only once permitted to send a deputy to parliament. That was in the 1967 elections, before the Israeli occupation of the bank. At that time Yusuf al-'Azm ran successfully from Ma'an.

On the subject of the brothers, there are people who say they have eluded the grasp of the Jordanian regime and that practices they are pursuing which stir the wrath of Damascus are happening against the will of the regime. However, the phenomenon so far remains the same--that is, the brothers enjoy the greatest degree of political freedom in Amman.

The regime--and its intelligence, as has been related--know that the brothers pursue political activity and are not reducing it but are propagating their stands in mosques and institutes. Similarly, the regime knows about the activity of all political parties operating secretly in Jordan. However, according to one source in the grouping of popular forces, it is anxious to maintain a brilliant image abroad, thus only resorts to repression when it sees that a danger is being realized. This danger occurs whenever any operating party reaches a good organizational level and constitutes a force which must be constantly watched. At that point the regime acts and strikes to stifle it.

A Tendency To Crystallize

Is it now possible to expect the return of political life to Jordan in reality? It is difficult to predict the answer, although a basic condition is necessary for this, and that is that independent personalities cast a broad shadow over any grouping of popular forces so that the distinguishing features of every grouping will be obliterated and all national parties will attach themselves to them. Thus the grouping will turn into an opposition party standing on the other side of client forces, which may perhaps make up a party in the near future, as long as this remains the greatest degree of tolerance the regime can provide, and the nationalist parties can only accept or decline.

CONFLICTING FORCES CRITICIZED FOR DISRUPTING NATION

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 28 Jun 80 pp 1, 17

/Article by Dr George Farshakh: "In a Stormy Conversation with AL-QABAS in Paris, Raymond Iddih Draws the Map of the Partition of Lebanon!"/

/Text/ I brought a map of Lebanon along, went to Dean Raymond Iddih, spread it out in front of him and said, "Dean, the talk about Lebanon these days deals only with partition. Is partition realistic, and how?" The dean started to draw the partition map as people had presented it to him. However, he soon paused and said with obvious irritability, "No, no, I can't. It's not permissible." The pen was moving over the map, like a knife cutting into the body of a living man--not to say the body of the dean. He threw the pen down, rolled up the map and said, "Let's just talk."

The dean had prepared us a copy of a statement by "al-Jumayyil's son," as he calls him, in which al-Jumayyil the younger (Bashir) said that if the Moslems did not agree to a format then it would be better for "al-Jumayyil's son" to reach agreement with Abu 'Ammar over the partition of Lebanon. The dean said, "This is basically their scheme." During the conversation, the dean received a phone call and we heard him discussing the subject of the formation of the cabinet, then telling the person who addressed him "a cabinet of activities, indeed a cabinet of children--since Ezer Weitzmann has resigned from Begin's cabinet, why don't they ask him to form the children's cabinet in Lebanon?"

These days, it is difficult to talk with the dean. True, he is a democrat, as he says, but he cannot bear criticism of his opinions. When he gets vexed, he says, "Are you here to ask questions or to get the answers you want?" If you insist on arguing, he will threaten to increase the volume of his attack on President Hafiz al-Asad and Syria, on grounds that you will be scared.

You come out of a discussion with Dean Iddih in despair. Not even the road to partition is blocked, but has become open. The dean recognizes that he has failed to thwart the schemes, and that they are all dwarves in Lebanon.

I ask him if he would agree to return to a partitioned Lebanon and he says "I am fighting partition, and cannot imagine that Lebanon will be partitioned."

The conversation took place in the dean's apartment in the Hotel Prince de Galles, as follows:

AL-QABAS: Where is Lebanon going?

The dean: So far, toward collapse. In Lebanon there is no state except in name, and the territory of Lebanon is occupied by Syria, Israel and the Phalange Party. Communism [he means "legitimacy"] exists in less than one quarter of a percent (o.25 percent) of the area.

AL-QABAS: And the Palestinians?

The dean: Syria and the Palestinians are the same body.

AL-QABAS: But dean, there are 20 Palestinian organizations.

The dean: I mean the Palestine Liberation Army. When the Syrian forces withdrew from some centers and barriers, to whom did they hand these positions over? To the liberation army.

AL-QABAS: How is the "occupation" broken down, in your opinion?

The dean: Eighty-five percent of the territory of Lebanon is under Syrian-Palestinian occupation, 10 percent is under the dominance of the Israeli army, that is, from the al-Litani River to the borders with Israel, and 4.75 percent is under the dictatorship of the Phalange (that is, the al-Ashrafiyah area of Beirut, half of al-Matn, Kasrawan and Jubayl). Legitimacy exists on less than one quarter of 1 percent (0.25 percent), that is, in Ba'abda Palace, the gardens around it, the al-Fayadiyah Barracks, part of al-Hadth, 'Ayn al-Rummanah and Furn al-Shabbak.

AL-QABAS: But the Syrian forces now have a legitimate presence. They are a factor in the Lebanese situation, and for us to keep repeating that they are occupation forces or legitimate forces does not add or detract anything, especially from here, from Paris.

The dean: That is your opinion. I, however, say that the Lebanese authorities are harrassed and that if you conduct a referendum among all Lebanese circles you will find that the overwhelming majority want the withdrawal of the Syrian forces. However, some Lebanese who are Christians are clinging to the Syrian army.

AL-QABAS: Let me go back to my first question: where is Lebanon going?

The dean: I said, toward collapse. I now add, I do not know. Maybe it will be partitioned, in implementation of the plan drawn up by the former American Secretary Henry Kissinger, which aims at settling 500,000 Palestinians in Lebanon.

The Partition of Lebanon Will Afflict the Arabs with a Contagious Disease

AL-QABAS: 400,000 or 500,000? There is a big difference

The dean: Who knows? Who can give you precise figures? Kissinger's plan calls for the settlement of Palestinians in the section which might then become Moslem Lebanon. Israel will take the portion lying south of the al-Litani River, once the majority of the Shiites migrate north of the al-Litani. As for Syria, the al-Biqa', 'Akkar and the town of Tripoli will be severed to compensate it for the Golan and for the fatigue it has endured in order to stop the fighting--which is still continuing--if it does not insist on putting its hands on the port of Beirut, at which point Hafiz al-Asad will become the Napoleon of the region because he will gather the transit movement to the whole Arab region in his hands.

AL-QABAS: That talk isn't serious, dean. Napoleon, enduring fatigues, transit movement--there is a big political game in the region. Will Iraq agree? Will Egypt be quiet? And so on.

The dean: That talk isn't serious? We Lebanese will never change. That is how they always answered me. What has the result been? Lebanon now is actually partitioned. Since 1974, I have been saying that there was a Kissinger plan to "Cypriotize" Lebanon and "Balkanize" the area. I tried to repel this plan by diplomatic means. So far, I have not been successful in my mission. Therefore I am directing an appeal and a warning to the Arab countries, I am telling the Arabs: come let us convince America that the interests of the region require that Lebanon survive, because, if Lebanon disappears or is partitioned, the contagious disease of partition will move to other Arab countries. The Arabs all must stand up to this plan and act to thwart this conspiracy.

There Are Partition Maps

AL-QABAS: Has anyone discussed partition with you?

The dean: I have always been in favor of a united Lebanon and against partition. Those who have held discussions with me, and stated that peaceful coexistence between Moslems and Christians could come about only through partition, have received nothing from me, and I have never agreed to their plans.

AL-QABAS: Who has held discussions with you?

The dean: There is no need to mention names. The people who have partition plans are well known.

AL-QABAS: Is there a partition map?

The dean: There are partition maps.

AL-QABAS: Could you draw them for us specifically on this map?

The dean: Of course it is possible.--After the dean started to draw the map, he threw the pen away and stated, with obvious irritability: No, I cannot continue. It's not possible. I am in a serious situation.

AL-QABAS: Where does the real danger to Lebanon come from?

The dean: From Israel. Israel wants to expand up to the al-Litani River. Were it not for the expansionist Zionist scheme, we would now be living in peace. Of course a responsibility lies on the Lebanese rulers who thought lightly of the Israeli danger, and whose rule was based on indifference to this danger; the result was that Lebanon lost its unity and its sovereignty. The Arab countries, and Syria in particular, bear great responsibility for what we have ended up with. As for the Palestinians, they came as refugees, then bore arms after the collapse of the Arab armies in 1967. They are now using the diplomatic field to acquire a country. The Palestinian people have a right to a country. This country can only be in Palestine.

AL-QABAS: Regarding what has happened in Lebanon?

The dean: I am not trying to exonerate the Palestinians for what has happened in Lebanon. However, I do hold the Lebanese authorities who signed the Cairo Agreement with them responsible for what has happened, permitting them to roam around outside the camps with arms and asking them to take charge themselves of protecting their camps, when Abu 'Ammar came and asked the Lebanese authorities to protect the Palestinian camps after the assassination of the three leaders Kamal Nasir, Kamal 'Adwan and Abu Yusuf. No Arab country has allowed the Palestinians to use its territory the way they have been permitted to use Lebanon.

The Cause of Lebanon No Longer Concerns Anyone

AL-QABAS: Do you believe that the cause of Lebanon still concerns the world?

The dean: Most sadly, I can say no. The Israeli issue is the one which concerns the world in the first place, followed by the Palestinian issue. The importance of the Palestinian issue arises from the fact that it is linked to the general situation in the oil region, which is extremely delicate, and the fact that it offers confidence for the destiny of the Zionist state. As for Lebanon, no one is any longer concerned about it. Its rulers must travel abroad and plead the Lebanese case in Europe, America and the United Nations.

AL-QABAS: What is your personal contribution to the process of searching for a solution?

The dean: I, as a deputy, am studying what would be the optimum solution on Lebanon's behalf. I believe that the optimum solution would be to establish a nation for the Palestinians in Palestine, at which point Lebanon would relax, because, even if some of the Palestinians remained on its territory, they would have the same rights and duties that apply to every foreigner.

The Reconciliation Plan--Hypocrisy!

AL-QABAS: Have they taken your opinion on reconciliation?

The dean: No, no one has consulted with me. The reconciliation plan, as it has been set forth now, is a hypocrisy and a diversion.

AL-QABAS: Do you believe that Lebanon still enjoys its independence? What is your opinion about putting it under United Nations trusteeship? Couldn't that be the start of a solution?

The dean: First of all, what is your notion of the word "independence?" If the word independence means a state which is independent of another state by law, Lebanon is a country which is independent of Syria, Israel and the other countries in the area. If the word independence means a sovereign state, Lebanon today is an independent state but does not enjoy full sovereignty.

As regards the United Nations trusteeship, a state which is put under trusteeship is a "deficient" state, and there is no doubt that if we take the opinions of some Lebanese today who want to live in dignity and security, and who want to rid themselves of exploitation by parties, we will find that these people want to be put under a United Nations trusteeship, in spite of the fact that Article 78 of the United Nations Organization Charter states that the system of trusteeship does not apply to countries which have joined as members in the organization. I will remind you that I many times asked that foreign or mixed foreign-Arab international forces be sent to take the place of the Syrian army, provided they were under the command of the secretary general of the United Nations, and that their task be that of a force supporting the Lebanese army, so that it could collect the heavy arms in the possession of the Palestinian resistance and the militia, and protect the Palestinian camps from Israeli and other aggressions--naturally while keeping the international forces in the south to expel the Israeli army in implementation of Security Council Resolutions 425 and 426.

The Maronites against the Lebanese Front

AL-QABAS: You are a Maronite leader, and you are opposed to the Lebanese Front, which claims to represent the Maronites. Does it really represent them?

The dean: The Maronites of Lebanon are spread about over all the areas of Lebanon. What is left of what is called the Lebanese Front, walled up in al-Ashrafiyah, half of al-Matn, Kasrawan and Jubayl does not represent all the Maronites at all--it does not even represent the Maronites residing in the areas which the front dominates, or, more precisely, which the fascist Nazi Phalange Party dominates. The Maronite majority turned against the Chamounite and Phalange parties because of the militia's behavior and vicissitudes in political alliances. Today they agree to the Cairo Agreement and tomorrow they will turn against it. Today they are on the side of the Palestinians and the noble guerrilla and tomorrow they will be against him. Today they resort to having the Syrian army come and tomorrow they will fight against it. Today they ally themselves with Israel and receive arms from it to protect the Christians and tomorrow they will state and declare that Israel wants to exploit the Christians and use them for its own interests. The Maronite people have become convinced that that this leadership has failed, but they cannot rid themselves of it because of the Phalangist dictatorship, because it is the only military authority present in the region. The majority of the Maronites do not want partition; they want Lebanon to regain its independence and sovereignty.

AL-QABAS: When will you return to Lebanon?

We Are All Dwarves

The dean: When it becomes in the power of the Lebanese authorities to replace the Syrian army group which is present in the Ministry of Information a few meters away from my house with a Lebanese army group. I have personally conveyed this request to the prime minister, Salim al-Huss, who said that it was an easy request. However, a week later he contacted me from Beirut through a major official in the office of the premier to inform me that he was unable to carry out this modest demand. I am not asking that to create a paralysis but for reasons related to my dignity as a Lebanese deputy and because I have been exposed to two assassination attempts within sight of this group and it did not try to intervene--perhaps because it knew about the attempts.

AL-QABAS: Are there heroes in Lebanon?

The dean: The events have proved that we are all dwarves.

AL-QABAS: But you and--

The dean: All of us in Lebanon are dwarves.

INVOLVEMENT IN WEST AFRICAN DISPUTES REVIEWED

London AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 21-27 Jul 80 pp 13-14

[Article by al-Salami al-Husni: "What Happened Between the Republic of the Poet and the Jamahiriyah of the Colonel?"]

[Text] The outbreak of the dispute between Libya and Senegal, which led to the severance of relations between the two countries, is another indication of the tense situation in the area of the Arab Maghrib and the area of the Southern Sahara in Africa. Were we to accept the reasons given by the two sides for the eruption of this dispute, we would come up with nothing more than mere disagreements between two regimes which have conflicting interests. However, there is more to the matter than this, because the factors and motivations that brought the breach between Tripoli and Dakar cover a whole region, and include issues of balance of power and international conflicts.

Officially, Senegal accuses the Jamahiriyah of acting as a host for the Islamic-oriented Senegalese opposition, which is trying to overthrow the Senghor regime by armed force, and of enabling this opposition to get arms, materiel and training in Mali and northern Senegal, where the Muslim Senegalese tribes live. Libya charges Senegal with representing French interests in Africa and with implementing Paris' policy, which is delineated at the Franco-African summit every year. Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, therefore, broke relations with Dakar, and called upon France to represent Senegal in the Jamahiriyah, in line with his earlier announcement that the Jamahiriyah would sever relations with African countries maintaining close relations with France. This means that the crisis between Senegal and the Jamahiriyah falls within the context of the French-Libyan struggle in Africa.

However, when this crisis erupted, Libyan-French contacts were under way to normalize relations between the two countries, and arrange for the return of the French ambassador to Tripoli and the recognition by the French Foreign Ministry of the Libyan People's Bureau in Paris as a form of diplomatic mission. Although these contacts have had no major results, the two sides hope to come up with permanent solutions on the political issues outstanding between the two countries, because economic relations have continued even though French-Libyan political relations had gone downhill.

French circles say that the remaining obstacle between the two countries is the situation in Chad, as they are still giving indirect support to Husayn Habre whom Libya regards, with justice, as a rebel against the legitimate authority as represented by Goukouni. The French believe that the break in Libyan-Senegalese relations was understood in Paris to be an attempt to put pressure on France to withdraw from Chad for good, and to abandon its African policy. The Libyan-Senegalese, however, also has a connection with another problem, which is still, in one way or another, helping to stir up disagreements among the countries of the Arab Maghrib. This is the Western Sahara issue, the debates on which, at the OAU [Organization of African Unity] summit in Freetown, coincided with the break in Libyan-Senegalese relations as a result of the hardline position taken by Dakar on backing Morocco. Tripoli viewed this as siding with the Moroccan plan to resolve the Western Sahara issue. In fact, the Libyan-Senegalese disputes do not arise only from the reasons we have already mentioned. These are merely factors which expedited the emergence and escalation of these disputes to the point of breaking off relations.

The essence of the dispute goes back to the Libyan thrusts toward the area of West Africa, particularly Mauritania, Mali and the Western Sahara, which, Senegalese sources allege, are primarily military thrusts. Official Senegalese circles have leaked a report to French papers that Libya has built a secret military airbase north of Mali that could be used by Senegalese teams in lightning strikes against government institutions in Senegal. Also, the deteriorating French-Mauritanian relations on the one hand, and the emergence of the Libyan presence in Noakchott, particularly economically, have made Dakar perceive a direct threat to what it calls its vital surroundings north of the Senegal River. Since the coup against Ould Dada in 1978, Senghor has threatened several times to annex this area, if the new Mauritanian authorities launched a campaign to Arabize the country.

Since the Military Committee for National Salvation in Mauritanian assumed power, the issue of the northern Senegal River has become a candidate for turning into an international issue, similar to the Western Sahara issue, particularly after Senghor's government hosted a group of opponents to the government of Ould Haidalla in Nouakchott. Dakar intends to push this group to announce a government in exile on the pattern of the Saharan government of the Polisario Front.

To the Jamahiriyah, which is now taking a greater interest in the issues of the Arab Maghrib since the breakup of the Confederation of Arab Republics and the switch of al-Sadat's Egypt toward Washington, this means that its policy in the area is now threatened, particularly since some have begun to talk about the possibility of Algerian flexibility in dealing with the Western Sahara issue. Consequently, the Jamahiriyah would find itself facing a whole set of unpropitious conditions and climates in the area of the Arab Magrib and south of the Sahara. Therefore, Senegal appeared to be a weak link in the interface of these conditions that could be curbed and threatened with collapse by blocking it from engaging in any activity outside its borders.

Coming Developments

It does not appear that the crisis between the Jamahiriyah and Senegal will end with the severance of diplomatic relations, not only as a result of the probable start in Moroccan-Algerian negotiations about the Western Sahara or, at least, Algerian caution toward Polisario activity, but as a result of reports about Libyan help in forming a federation between Western Sahara and Mauritania, extending to northern Senegal and possibly including some parts of Mali. Completion of this project, which now constitutes the subject of discussions by political circles in Paris, depends not only on the willingness of the parties concerned, that is, Nouakchott and the Polisario Front, but on the blessing of other quarters concerned, such as Algeria and Morocco, and on the extent to which there is annexation of districts in both Senegal and Mali (Dagana and Matam in Senegal and [Khasaw?] in Mali), areas which include tribes similar to, if not related to the tribes of Western Sahara and Mauritania and the Tauregs of southern Algeria.

One thing conducive to completion of this plan is the fact that the tribes concerned do not recognize established borders, since they are nomadic tribes that wander across the desert, preserving their own tribal organization. This would make it easy to include them by mere agreement of their shaykhs under the banner of Islam.

The obstacles to this plan are many; most importantly the fact that some of the tribes still swear loyalty to the monarchy in Morocco and others live most of the time on Algerian soil, while the tribes of northern Senegal have begun to turn to agrarian sedentary life. Have governments, including Algeria, adopted such an Islamic Sahara Federation project? That is the question.

In any case, the crisis which began between the republic of the poet, Senghor, and the Jamahiriyah of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, is not one of limited dimensions. Rather, it covers the whole area of West Africa. Therefore, its consequences will begin to emerge in the near future: either a Western negotiated solution will be accomplished for the Western Sahara issue, or there will be involvement in preparing the plan for an Islamic Sahara Federation. Between this possibility and that one, the quarrels will continue with accompanying benefits for the big powers, particularly France, which still feels that its African interests are not seriously threatened.

NEW BOOK ON JAMAHIRIYA--Moscow, 15 Ramadan-27 July (JAMAHIRIYA NEWS AGENCY). A new work has just been published in the Soviet Union by the House of Science. It concerns the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, under the title "Libya On The Path Of Independence, Of Social Progress," and was written by the Soviet writer Sorine Tomassian. The author treats, in the first part, there are 11 parts, the (Djihad) combat of the Libyan Arab people against Italian colonialism and the period of so-called independence at the time of the restored monarchy. Then the author analyzes the circumstances of the great revolution of the fateh and describes the situation at the time when Libya was under the yoke of the American and British colonial bases and of the multinationals, which pillaged the petroleum resources of the country. The writer devotes several parts of his book to the power of the people in the Jamahiriya, of which he speaks knowledgeably since he served as ambassador to Libya. The writer analyzes the gigantic achievements of the grand revolution of 1 September over the past decade. [Text] [Paris BULLETIN QUOTIDIEN DE L'AGENCE JAMAHIRIYA-PRESSE in French 27 Jul 80] 8956

IRANIAN NEWSPAPER COMMENTS ON JAMAHIRIYA--Tripoli 8 Ramadan-20 July (JAMAHIRIYA NEWS AGENCY). In the series of articles that it is publishing on the Jamahiriya, the Iranian newspaper AZKIKAN praised the experiments of the Jamahiriya in the creation of people's markets in all the regions of the Jamahiriya, which are considered to be the best way to fight the high cost of living and the monopolies and to put an end to the society of exploitation and domination. The newspaper also recalled that the Libyans had suffered very much from the monopolies and dealers who dominated the markets where they sold merchandise at excessive prices for quick profits. In its report, the newspaper has in addition drawn up a comparison between the prices in the people's markets and those which existed in the public markets. SUPPORT FOR JAMAHIRIYA--Beirut, 12 Ramadan-24 July (JAMAHIRIYA NEWS AGENCY). The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine has affirmed its support of an aggression on the part of the Egyptian president against the Arab people of Libya. The Front has also expressed the esteem in which it holds the grand revolution of 1 September, its courageous positions and its accomplishments in favor of the liberation of Palestine and of the occupied Arab territories. That is the essence of a communique released yesterday in Beirut, following the visit of a delegation of the Front to the Jamahiriya between 14 and 17 July. According to this communique, the delegation of the Front has had a number of meetings with the brothers in the Jamihiriya. Following these meetings, which took place between the General Union of Students of the Jamahiriya and the Student Bureau of the Front, the two parties affirmed their strong desire to pursue cooperation in the student domain. They agreed to coordinate and exchange their points of view on the problem of student employment in the Arab fatherland, or elsewhere, and to work in common toward that goal. The communique affirmed that the Palestinian armed revolution is pursuing its efforts to liberate the land of Palestine, in order to contribute to the rising up of the masses in the occupied territory, to concretize the solidarity of the Palestinian revolution with the national movement in southern Lebanon and to halt the projects for settlement which aim only at stifling the revolution and at destroying the national identity of the Palestinian people. MINISTER NOTES GOVERNMENT'S EFFORTS TO ALLEVIATE FOOD SHORTAGE

Nouakchott CHAAB in French 18 Jul 80 p 3

[Interview with Mohamed Ould Amar, minister of rural development--date and place not given]

> [Text] In an interview that he granted the AMP [Malagasy Press Agency], Mr Mohamed Ould Amar, minister of rural development, talked about all aspects of the country's policy in the rural sector.
> This policy, the minister said, makes our country's food self sufficiency a fundamental concern.
> The land problem and the return of our people to their homelands were touched on by the minister who pointed out that the goal of our country's agricultural policy is to make it possible for our people to lead a decent and harmonious life.

[Question] Mr Minister, since the advent of the movement of 10 July, the priority in the rural sector has gradually been becoming a reality. Among the goals to be achieved in this plan, food self sufficiency occupies a high place. Can we find out the results obtained in this area?

[Answer] Our country's food self sufficiency is indeed one of the government's basic concerns. Our dependency on imports and donations of food products, especially grain, has become, owing to the persistence of the drought, very disturbing: our national production still scarcely covers 20 percent of our needs.

Steps have of course been taken to ensure the country's food security in time of climatic-agricultural distress, with among other things, the establishment of the food assistance commissariat; but the basic problem remains: i.e., the development of our productive capacity.

Hence we have firmly oriented our policy in this direction and the achievements have followed: a campaign to promote and expand market-garden crops and projects inaugurated and guided, particularly in arid areas like Lejoua in Inchiri or N'Beika in Tagant; dams have been repaired or built, for example, in the severely tested region of Tamchekett; the agricultural services have embarked on basis programs in favor of dry crops, which still represent a primary part of our production, in spite of the unpredictable and freakish nature of our climate. Moreover it is in order to shake off this climatic insecurity that we are devoting all our efforts to acquiring the management of water and developing the irrigated areas that are vital to our food self sufficiency. This is a struggle that promises to be long and difficult but whose implementation will be undertaken during the next plan. Let's mention only black Gorgol and Aftout-Es-Sahel, the financing for which is in progress, to justify a measure of confidence in the future.

[Question] With the appearance of the drought phenomenon and to a certain extent with the modernization of farming, the land problem poses itself again with acuteness. Solving it, on the one hand, will facilitate achieving food self sufficiency and, on the other hand, will condition the success of the rural development strategy in our country.

Mr Minister, what are you contemplating to solve this ticklish problem?

[Answer] It is true that the land issue has become acute and everyone must realize the difficulties that we are encountering in this ticklish area.

The pilot "ease" of Gorgol is still suffering from the insolvency of our modern legislation in the land area and from its insuitability for allowing the settlement of issues that arise during the development of lands and of their improvement. This example shows how urgent it is that the state undertake a decisive investigation of this question to attain development's real socio-economic objectives.

While waiting for such legislation, we have studied solutions among which, we are sure, the landowners, the non-owner farmers, and the government will find the one that will restore vitality to this "ease" of Gorgol, which has proved itself worthy by its exceptional productive capacity. This first Mauritanian installation in the area of managing water should become the jewel of our irrigated farming.

[Question] Question on the management of water and the protection of the environment: These are two closely linked problems and they constitute two important parts in conjunction with the accomplishment of food self sufficiency. Can you tell us, Mr Minister, your specific achievements in these areas?

[Answer] As you say, these issues of the management of water and protection of the environment are closely linked, and each of them is an element in our policy to return the inhabitants to the land with a view to agricultural production.

The vicious circle formed by desert encroachment, the decrease in production, and the rural exodus has established itself and we have to break it in several places.

This is the reason that we recently sponsored a seminar on desert encroachment in which numerous countries that are friendly to us and several international or regional organizations participated. Our battle plan against this scourge was defined at this time and we are determined to carry it out with international cooperation but above all with the help of the inhabitants concerned who have become cruelly aware of the threat that weighs on them. Direct action has been carried out to enlarge the network of fire screens, to set up reforesting nurseries; increased surveillance of forests and the merciless suppression of improper or illegal cuts are on the agenda.

A national tree day will be celebrated in August that will symbolize our collective desire to recover the land abandoned to the desert.

As a result of this policy, rural inhabitants will have less precarious living conditions and a more favorable environment for traditional life and work at their disposal.

This is where water comes in, a vital factor and one that we not only need to find more of but we need to manage parsimoniously since it is as precious and as expensive as it is.

We have undertaken numerous activities as a prelude to the implementation of a bold water policy: the planning of the use of water is under study, the hydrometerological system is being expanded, the research of methods to use solar and eolian energy has gotten off to a start.

Finally the mobilization of water resources and the management of water constitute the primary goals of the hydraulic and rural engineering departments and SONADER [National Rural Development Company]. The achievements are far from being insignificant. The getting under way of 26 drillings, the construction and the repairing of 139 wells, the installation of two solar pumps, the laying of more than 40 kms of pipe to carry water from our capital overburdened by the influx of rural populations, the construction of four dams that will make it possible to farm more than 400 hectares of grain crops at N'Beika, the 10 irrigated hectares of Lejoua that I have already mentioned, and this list is far from being exhaustive.

All these projects are encouraging but still greatly inadequate. Development activities should be integrated and should be concerned with all the socio-economic aspects of the problem posed; its cost is therefore still very high.

This is being tested in all the areas of the rural sector, whether it is a question of farming, hydraulics, or animal husbandry; this is the reason that indepth studies are being undertaken on this sector and its potentialities that will make it possible to better plan our rural development and integrate as much as possible the social, ecological, and economic factors, the links among which we have raised. Thus it is an important step towards the working out of solutions to our problems and towards food self sufficiency in particular.

[Question] Mr Minister, what results have been obtained in the campaign launched a year ago to protect the livestock?

[Answer] It is important first of all to review in a few words the extremely difficult conditions that presided over this protection campaign, the results of which you are asking me about now.

In order to do this, let's go back in time a little. The year 1979 was characterized by a sizable rainfall shortage. This did not fail to occasion a very large shortage in grazing land in the whole animal husbandry area of our country. This fact resulted, at the livestock level and particularly with regard to cattle, in undernourishment and a resurfacing of the contagious and food-deficiency diseases, which as early as the month of April began carrying off animals.

Faced with this situation that grew worse day by day, my department launched the program you are alluding to and the goal of which was:

--to distribute free cattle feed to animals in the disaster-struck areas.

--supply water to the areas that had grazing land that was not being used because of the lack of water.

--to strengthen the sanitary condition of the livestock by deparasiting and, if necessary, vaccinating.

Concerning the results themselves of the campaign, it is important that you realize that:

--2,300 tons of cattle feed were distributed free.

--some 200 to 300,000 head of livestock in the area of Kaedi-Maghama alone benefited from a regular procurement of water. At this level the results were highly positive, sizable quantities of milk at low deposits in May were collected daily by the cattle raisers.

On the sanitation level, close to 100,000 animals were affected by deparasiting and vaccination programs. These programs proved to be very highly effective because no outbreaks of the disease appeared during the whole period of the campaign.

A sharp fall in conjunction with this would certainly lead to fresh outbreaks of certain diseases well known to our cattle raisers. To summarize, I'd say that the principal outcome of this campaign has been the strong reduction in the number of fatalities noted in all animal husbandry areas of our country.

[Question] Where are we, Mr Minister, in the implementation of the policy that seeks to encourage investments in agro-pastoral enterprises?

[Answer] As you know, new investment laws have been promoted [sic], with the intent to promoting, in particular, investments in agro-pastoral enterprises. They have considerable importance and we are studying several projects on tomatoes. However these laws are very recent and their practical application in the rural sector involves only a few files submitted to the investment committee in the area of chicken raising for example.

However we intend to widely promote the private sector with a view to developing our agro-industry and to give the most attention to these new laws so that our farming and animal husbandry benefit as much as possible for the sake of the whole country. Private capital is indeed vital to our rural development and everything must be done to encourage investments in the rural sector. The needs certainly are considerable, taking into account the costs of development, factories, equipment, and the weakness of our present infrastructure; it is inconceivable that the government can assume the necessary program on public funds and it is therefore crucial to attract Mauritanian and foreign capital.

Our whole policy, you have seen, seeks to make it possible for the nation and its citizens to live decently and in harmony with the habits, the environment that are the foundation of our traditional culture. Hence it is a question of the fact that our people reoccupy the land that they abandoned, pushed by the need to find the food and work that the drought had deprived them of.

So it is obvious that our campaign against desert encroachment and for the management of water is, in itself, one of the most important sections in the struggle against the rural exodus; it alone makes it possible to restore a tool for production and a receptive land to the inhabitants, and it is the condition even for agricultural production and the settlement of the people.

All this is accompanied by parallel steps within the scope of a development policy rethought in light of the drought's catastrophic effects felt by the whole community.

As a result, the notion of projects has changed, as well as their method of utilization and people are applying themselves to integrating all the aspects of social day-to-day living, whether it be education, health, or communications. The 36 drillings are an example: people provided for, in addition to draining equipment, drinking-troughs for the livestock, the need to water gardens, and boundary cisterns for communities. Black Gorgol will be another place where a complete socio-cultural infrastructure to meet the needs of a village community will be provided for. The administrative plan, drawn up for Tagant, is another one where all the constraints that are a burden on a harmonious regional development have been taken into account.

I feel that in this way, we are on the right path and that the trend will soon be reversed, as a result of the return of our farmers to their better protected lands and of our cattle raisers to better developed and more dependable community pastures. This is our aspiration.

BRIEFS

HEAVY LOSSES OF CATTLE--Nouakchott, 9 Sep (AFP)--More than 70 percent of the cattle in eastern and central Mauritania have died because the rains were late and sparse this year, Rural Development Minister Mohamed Ould Amar said in a newspaper interview published here. Mr Ould Amar told the DAILY CHAAB that the government had begun buying up cattle from the hardest-hit regions in a bid to preserve the herds. He said that precipitation was only 40 percent of normal in certain agricultural regions during July, and he added that a short rainy season will be disastrous for cattle because their forage will not have finished its growth cycle before the hot season begin in October. In 1979, Mauritania was one of the countries worst affected by drought in the Subsaharan Sahel belt. The country's grain deficit was 75,000 tons, most of which was made up by other countries and international organizations. [Text] [AB091630 Paris AFP in English 1547 GMT 9 Sep 80]

PRESIDENT INTERVIEWED ON DOMESTIC, REGIONAL ISSUES

Algiers EL-DJEICH in French Jul 80 pp 29-32

[Interview with President Ali Nasser Mohammed, in Aden, by Hacene Baadji; translated from the Arabic by H. Timsiline--date not given]

[Text] In the context of his reporting on the Peoples Democratic Republic of Yemen [PDRY], our reporter Hacene Baadji took advantage of his presence in Aden to interview President Ali Nasser Mohamed, secretary of the Central Committee of the Yemeni Socialist Party [YSP], president of the Presidium of the Supreme People's Council, and prime minister of the PDRY.

The interview ranged over several questions of great interest relative to Yemen, the Arab world, and the rest of the world.

And here is the translation in full.

[Question] The Yemeni Socialist Party has set several goals to attain, among which is elevation of the economic-social level of the Yemeni people as a whole. How far has this come, so far? And how much emphasis is placed in the second Five-Year Plan on utilization of local resources? Finally, what part will foreign technical assistance play in the execution of this plan.

[Answer] The YSP, as the program of the democratic national revolution, decreed by the first party congress, stipulates, envisions the development of the various sectors of the national economy and the improvement of the material and spiritual conditions of existence of the laboring masses. Also, during recent years, and after the regaining of independence, we have centered out efforts and our potential, as well as the militancy of the masses, on the basic goal of liquidating the after-affects of economic and social underdevelopment we inherited from British colonialism.... This has led to some revolutionary transformations in this area.

We can say in particular that implementation of agrarian reform, nationalization of capitalist companies and institutions run by foreigners and the local comprador bourgeois as well, the creation of a state sector, a cooperative sector, and a mixed sector, have allowed us to mobilize our resources and use them for this economic development.

If it be true that Democratic Yemen does not abound in natural wealth, and that it has recourse to foreign assistance, it is no less true that the remarkable projects that have been achieved command respect.

Beyond this it is necessary to say that despite the plots and maneuvers of all kinds, and also the economic blockade, as well as direct and veiled pressure, we have been able to carry out plans for construction of dozens of factories, roads, complete agricultural projects and build hundreds of schools, hospitals, and health units.

All this is testimony to the path [we have] followed toward improving the living conditions of the citizens. The YSP has succeeded in orienting the people toward achieving the two economic development plans. In the same way as it continues to work toward realization of the second Five-Year Plan.

We can say that the investments in the second plan will make possible the bringing about of the best conditions for guaranteeing national economic advancement and the improvement of the social conditions of the people.... To bring such delicate missions to a successful end, our vanguard party, the enlightened guide of the people, is based on rigorously scientific planning. Just as it calls for the best possible utilization of local resources and also foreign assistance, which we consider an important factor in the execution of programs of economic development.

[Question] Forces hostile to the Yemeni revolution are presently inspiring a tendentious campaign in the press whose goal is to discredit and cast suspicion on the treaty of friendship and cooperation between Democratic Yemen and the Soviet Union.

These press campaigns have even gone so far as to claim that in Yemen there exist serious divergences of opinion between the party and the state. What do you say to this?

[Answer] Imperialist-reactionary forces will never cease mounting such campaigns of denigration and lying insinuations against the treaty of friendship and cooperation between the Yemeni and Soviet peoples, which was signed last October.

Just as these forces will never stop mounting similar campaigns against any country maintaining friendly and cooperative relations with the Soviet Union.

What is the true nature of these forces which are deeply hostile to moral principles and values, such as friendship, peace, and social progress, and which try by all [possible] means to prevent such relations from being established? World imperialism is trying, through tendentious and criminal scheming against the USSR and [against our] friendship with its people, to keep young nations, the newly independent countries, within the orbit of its strategy, in order to use them in the ferocious struggle it is waging against international socialism. Naturally we, in Democratic Yemen, are proud of the friendship which binds us to the Soviet people, for it rests on principles and a basis of equality, mutual respect, and non-exploitation. Just a it contributes to the establishment of peace in the world and aims for the well-being of our two peoples.

Yemeni-Soviet friendship is not a new thing. It is the continuation of the relations of friendship and cooperation already enshrined in the treaty signed between our two peoples in 1928. Isn't this a proof that our friendship has withstood the test of time with flying colors? Once again I would like to say that our friendship with the Soviet people cannot be shaken by slanderous campaigns nourished by imperialism. It is also a friendship which responds to the logic of the revolutionary age which is converging toward socialism, peace, and understanding between peoples. This same logic will eradicate the vestiges of phenomena we see every day: wars, colonialism, aggression, and exploitation. All these phenomena are faces of world imperialism, which never extends friendship except at the price of the subjection of the people.

The allegations from these forces as to divergencies between the state and the party need no response for the simple reason that in Democratic Yemen the party and the state cannot be in contradiction; rather, they are two inseparable aspects of the revolutionary work. It was in this spirit that the treaty of friendship and cooperation between Yemen and the Soviet Union was concluded, at the directive of our party and at the insistence of the president of the People's Superior Council."

[Question] The Socialist Party of Democratic Yemen reaffirms that the achievement of a united Yemen is one of the greatest and noblest objectives, intimately bound up with the interests and evolution of the Yemeni people. How is the work of the mixed commissions coming, and just how optimistic are you as to the future of unification? Also, are there obstacles which could retard the advent of the merger between Aden and San'a' into a united Yemeni state?

[Answer] Achievement of the democratic unification of Yemen remains the fundamental task, and one of the noblest for which our Yemeni socialist party and all Yemeni patriots work. For the prolongation of the state of division, and the dispersion of the capacities and potentialities of Yemen only delay the process of development of the Yemeni revolution.

Besides, the achievement of unity will provide our country with human and material possibilities of considerable size, permitting it to go forward on the road of social progress. However, the imperialist and reactionary forces take a dim view of the unity of our peoples. Also, they are fomenting all kinds of plots to thwart such a design and maintain instability.

Nevertheless, despite the plots and scheming the two parts of Yemen are firmly determined to reach this unity. Their optimism about its future is great, for it answers to the logic of history and to the will of our Yemeni people. And despite the obstacles our enemies prepare and the plots they weave, they cannot indefinitely delay the advent of unity.

In this sense, the world of the unity commissions is going ahead and is well on the road to achieving their goals and overcoming the problems with which they are confronted.

This is being done in continual coordination with brother Col Ali Abdellah Salah, president of the Yemen Arab Republic.

The next visit that we will undertake to San'a', historic capital of the Yemeni people, will be the occasion for working out together the modalities of further coordination between the leadership of the two parties. Just as it will provide an opportunity to review the results of the work of the unity commissions as well as to pursue and complete pending work.

[Question] Imperialist-reactionary conspiracies are being hatched against the Arab nation both in the Arab East and the Maghreb. They are materialized in particular by the defeatist and capitulationist position of the Cairo regime in the Middle East and that of the puppet monarchist regime of the Naghreb. What do you think are the most effective methods for isolating and encircling these two regimes, especially in light of the growing strength of the firmness front and the positive results recorded at the Fifth Conference, especially with its recognition for the first time of the POLISARIO Front as the unique legitimate representative of the Saharan people?

[Answer] Never since the onset of the Arab nation's struggle for liberation has it encountered a situation as dangerous as the one through which it is passing today.... In reality, both in the Arab East and in the Maghreb, world imperialism, and more especially U.S. imperialism, is conspiring overtly against the Arab peoples and attacking their dignity.... Plundering her wealth, the income form which it invests to the benefit of the Zionist enemy. This same money is used to break the Arab liberation movements. What could be more shameful and more grievous for the Arabs than that imperialism should receive the support, the blessings, and the encouragement of reactionary Arab powers such as the regimes in place in Cairo and Oman?

Some of these reactionary forces in collusion with the American imperialist policy are maintaining a total silence about its hostile policy toward our Arab nation.

These puppet governments refrain from denoucning all these plots being concocted, but rather loudly proclaim the friendship which ties them to the imperialist forces, even though U.S. imperialism be Israel's unconditional ally.

In our opinion, too, there is no other way to bring down the Camp David accords than to strengthen inter-Arab, anti-imperialist, and anti-reactionary solidarity.

Nevertheless, from the standpoint of opposition to the Camp David plan we see the urgent need to undertake practical steps translating words, decisions, resolutions [into action] in such a way as to put an end to the cherished designs of the Camp David accords.

[Question] If the member countries of the Steadfastness and Resistance Front have thrown all their forces into the evolutionary battle, energetically fighting the illicit Camp David accords and the Zionist enemy, the remaining Arab countries, by contrast, continue to adopted an overly moderate position. What role do you think these countries should play, and more precisely those that have a political and economic weapon such as oil?

[Answer] The parties present at the Camp David summit are carrying out their plan. And it is our duty, in the framework of Arab solidarity and the Steadfastness and Resistance Front, to answer these attacks forcefully. To do that we must make use of all our weapons, which are numerous and decisive, and in the first place the oil weapon and Arab assets in the imperialist banks. Beyond that we must use our relations with the Soviet Union and the socialist countries as a strategic weapon.

[Question] On the pretext of watching out for peace and stability in the region, the American fleet is cruising off the Arab Gulf and in the Indian Ocean. This constitutes a threat to the Yemeni revolution, especially in light of Oman's agreement to provide the United States full military presence in the region? Also, what is the capability of the Yemeni people's defense in the event of a foreign attack against our country?

[Answer] Their allegations are well-known and unfounded. The presence of the American fleet in the Arab Gulf and the Indian Ocean threatens the security, stability, and sovereignty of the peoples of all the region. So of course it directly threatens the Yemeni revolution. Also, one should say that those who are already placing bets on the future development of Democratic Yemen and are prediciting less of a future for it, or who are still placing their hopes on the American military presence, are only ensnaring themselves in illusion. For Democratic Yemen has the capacity to defend itself and has the means necessary to protect the inviolability of its borders and to safeguard its sovereignty, as also it will not be alone should it be exposed to eventual foreign aggression.

All supporters of justice, peace, and sovereignty will rise up with it. It is also of interest to all the countries bordering on the [Gulf and the Indian] ocean that peace and stability should prevail in this region, and that there should be a stop to the establishment of military bases and the provision of military facilities as the regime in power in Oman is doing. This is the kind of thing that further complicates things and could plunge the region into the orbit of conflicts, crises, and tensions that threaten world peace. Besides, American imperialism is saying for all who are willing to listen that the Soviet Union is trying to bring the region into its sphere of influence and that it has designs on its oil. These are nothing but chimeras and false charges, a record that has been played over a thousand times.

Nevertheless, the peoples of the region are aware that the USSR is the richest nation in the world in terms of oil resources, and because of this fact it has no pretensions of this kind.

From another angle, the U.S.A., which consumes enormous quantities of this resource obtained from our region, is working to maintain its military presence, thus threatening the national independence of the peoples of the region.

[Question] Yemen is committee to certain principles such as supporting national liberation movements. In connection with this, what aid do you give to Arab liberation movements, on the one hand, and to other liberation movements around the world, on the other?

[Answer] This is a position of principle which characterizes our revolution. We are in favor of the legitimate struggle of peoples who are aspiring toward their national independence. As you know, our people lived through the horrors of colonization and the plundering of our liberty. When they committed themselves to the path of struggle for recovery of their independence, they enjoyed the sympathy of revolutionary forces around the world, as well as their support. Thus it is natural that our people, who have acquired their liberty, stand today shoulder to shoulder with the national liberation movements which are struggling to free their peoples from the colonial yoke and imperialist domination. Thus, we stood resolutely at the side of the Vietnamese people attacked by American imperialism. Just as we supported the peoples of Southeast Asia, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Angola, Zimbabwe, Nicaragua, and Iran....

We will continue to give our support to the Saharan people under the direction of the POLISARIO Front and to the people of OMAN under the leadership of the popular front (PFLO). We are also giving all possible aid to the struggle of the Palestinian people under the leadership of the PLO. Naturally our aid to national liberation movements is in proportion to our means, for we are a small country with modest resources."

[Question] Based on the party organizational experience of Democratic Yemen, what is the place of the party and its role in the economic, social, and political life of the country? And how solid are the relations linking the Yemeni Socialist Party to the FLN Party in Algeria? Also what arethe prospects for improvement and strengthening of these relations?

[Answer] We have had a very rich and continuous experience. It was begun at the time when we undertook the organization of the people's vanguard forces to enter the struggle against the occupying power.

After independence and more precisely after 22 June, 1969, we worked to improve our partisan movement. Organization on a production sector basis replaced organization on a geographic basis. And we created the college of scientific socialism in order to be able to recycle and educate militants in accordance with the ideas and the principles of the theory of scientific socialism. At the same time, the various branches of the national movement launched the debate on singleness of political organization. This enterprise was crowned with success at the Unification Congress of October 1975. This was a step forward toward the establishment of a vanguard party. In October 1978, the first party congress went into session, declaring the birth of the YSP. We can say that the YSP truly constitutes a fighting vanguard actualizing the people's struggle for social progress.

The YSP's role is becoming larger and larger, in its leadership functions, in the ranks of the workers and of the laboring masses. It defines the directions and the axes of economic and social development. In the light of the latter, the YSP guides the people toward the concretization of its policy to promote better life, both materially and spiritually.

Our party is working to consolidate its ties with revolutionary parties, both in the Arab and outside world. In this connection, relations between YSP (Yemen) [and] FLN (Algeria) have been made even closer, through the exchange of delegations. Which led to the acquisition of experience for both sides concerning the organization of the party in the two fraternal countries. There are far-reaching prospects for these ties, and we are convinced that we are going forward in this direction, for our two parties are the bearers of revolutionary and progressive values, and are shoulder to shoulder in the anti-imperialist and anti-reactionary struggle, and they are militating for social progress and socialism.

[Question] Mister President, you recently paid visits to several fraternal and friendly countries. What have you learned and what positive results have you brought back from your trip? What are the benefits for the two parties of these respective visits?

[Answer] I recently visited Syria and the Soviet Union. In Syria we had fruitful discussions with our brother President Hafiz al-Assad. They resulted in further deepening the friendly and fraternal relations between the Syrian and Yemeni peoples and made possible the delineation of a plan for common action within the Firmness Front so as to increase the effectiveness of the front and to strengthen Arab solidarity in opposition to the Camp David plan and the conspiracies hatched by American imperialism and in the confrontation with the Zionist occupying power.

In the Soviet Union the discussions we had with Comrade Brezhnev and all the Soviet leaders took place in an atmosphere of sincere friendship.

They covered all the questions of common and general interest. These discussions were crowned with immense success. We can say, further, that this visit enabled friendly Soviet-Arab relations to become even closer. Just as it enlarged the field of cooperation between the Yemeni and Soviet peoples.

The aid which the latter will bring to our country, in accordance with the new agreements, and which will permit the Yemeni economy to make a fresh start on new basis, is testimony to the friendship which exists between our two peoples and two countries.

[Question] Certain newspapers in Beirut and the Gulf have spread the news that certain changes are imminent in the leadership of the party and the government. How much credence can one give these stories? If it is true, how do you explain these changes?

[Answer] In truth this is nothing but deceitful information exuded by sources known for their hostility to the Yemeni revolution. They are without foundation. What has been written on the subject of the supposed intention of the party to effect certain changes in the leadership posts is absolutely false. Moreover, there would be no justification for such a move. At any rate we understand the motives of this publicity hostile to our country. Their designs are clear...to deceive public opinion, both in the Arab world and internationally, by making them believe that instability reigns in our country.

Let me tell you that the news published by this insinuating press does not interest us anymore. For we are sure we are on the right road, and the confidence our people place in us is enough. All attempts at political sabotage and all the hostility of this press only reinforces our conviction and our vigilance.

[Question] What are the implications of the visit that President Chadli Bendjedid recently made to the PDRY on the fraternal relations existing between the two countries? Also, are you yourself contemplating a visit to Algeria soon?

[Question] President Chadli Bendjedid's visit is a revealing sign of the improvement of Yemeni-Algerian bilateral relations. Just as it was an opportunity for our two governments to study a certain number of questions of common interest. We came to an understanding on several important points such as strengthening the effectiveness of the Steadfastness and Resistance Front and the reconsolidation of the unity of progressive Arab regimes, in order that they can play a more preponderant role in support of Arab liberation movements and most especially the Palestinian revolution, in order to permit the national liberation movements and the progressive Arab forces better to meet the imperialist-Zionist and reactionary conspiracies. We also reached agreement on the question of development and extension of the field of cooperation bilaterally between Yemen and Algeria.

The fruitful results of the visit of our brother President Chadli Bendjedid underline the importance of exchanges of visits and meetings between our two political leaderships. For, in face of the constant scheming of reactionary forces, it is imperative to strengthen the unity of national and progressive Arab forces. I must express here my relief and my serinite [translation unknown] at the positive results which marked the visit of our brother President Chadli Bendjedid. Here in Democratic Yemen we consider Algeria as the dearest and surest friend. As we stand fast in the consolidation of our relations with the fraternal Algerian people. Because of this it is with great joy that I will pay a visit to Algeria.

[Question] Mr President, what message do you send to the Algerian people by means of our publication?

[Answer] I am pleased to transmit by means of your publication my highest militant salutations to the fraternal Algerian people and to the National Liberation Front Party of Algeria, on behalf of our people and of the Yemeni Socialist Party. Similarly, we express to them our deep confidence in the strengthening of the ties of shared militantism between the two progressive revolutions concretized by the two revolutions [sic]. These ties will also be strengthened by virtue of our joint fighting solidarity in the path of militantism to promote liberation and social progress, by our firmness in opposition to the conspiracies and schemes of imperialist and reactionary forces.

The history of relations between our two revolutions clearly testifies to positions of support and joint solidarity with respect to questions of revolutionary progress in our two fraternal countries in particular, and with respect to all questions of national independence, social progress, and peace in the world, in general.

In light of this history, the process of martial relations between democratic Yemen and the Algerian Democratic Peoples Republic will move forward and affect every domain of cooperation and exchange of experiences. Toward more radiant horizons and still greater prospects. We respect Algeria greatly for the grandiose sacrifices its people paid to obtain its national independence. We also believe that the people who sacrificed more than a million chouhada [translation unknown] for their national independence can become masters of their own destiny and realize their national progressive aspirations.

RECONCILIATION EFFORTS AMONG PERSIAN GULF NATIONS REVIEWED

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 13 Jul 80 pp 17-18

[Article by Kuwait correspondent: "Aden Seeks To Settle its Differences"]

[Text] There have been a lot of mediation attempts to reconcile Aden with its neighbors. Kuwait has taken action. Saudi Arabia has given it its blessing. And the trip of 'Ali Nasir Muhammad al-Hasani [Chairman of the PDRY council of ministers], may crown these initiatives with success. But there remains the problem between Aden and Baghdad. The process of bringing about a settlement of the differences between the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) and the Sultanate of Oman has already begun. It was Kuwait which took the initiative to bring about a reconciliation between the two Yemens. Kuwait then focused its mediation efforts on Aden and Muscat, in an attempt to bring about stability in the southern part of the Arabian Peninsula.

When 'Ali Nasir Muhammad took over as prime minister in Aden, the very first initiative actually came from Aden, when it sent Mr Mahmud Najashi, the PDRY minister of culture, to Kuwait on a mission which was said to be related to cultural affairs. In fact, the mission was of a political nature, even though the media said nothing about its being policical.

In addition to his 3 days of meetings with the Kuwaiti undersecretary of information, Mr Sa'dun al-Jasim, Mr Najashi met with the ruler of Kuwait, Shaykh Jabir al-Ahmad al-Jabir al-Sabah; the crown prince and prime minister, Shaykh Sa'd al-'Abdallah al-Salim al-Sabah; and the deputy prime minister and minister of information, Shaykh Jabir al-'Ali al-Salim al-Sabah. During these meetings he made preparations for the visit of 'Ali Nasir Muhammad to Kuwait.

Nasir Muhammad took action concerning the Gulf area when he paid his first visit to Saudi Arabia last Saturday. This was a visit which had been previously set, but had been postponed because of Mr Muhammad's sudden trip to Moscow. He made this trip to reassure the Soviets that the changes which had resulted in the resignation of the previous prime minister, Mr 'Abd al-Fattah Isma'il, would not affect relations between Southern Yemen and the Soviet Union. After Mr Muhammad visited Saudi Arabia, he visited Kuwait.

Dialog on Two Fronts

The PDRY minister of culture did not release any comments to the press during his visit in Kuwait. But during his private talks, he hinted that the PDRY government was prepared to reopen a dialog on two fronts--with Iraq and with Oman. Regarding relations with Iraq, he said that it would be possible to normalize them through talks between the officials of the two countries. He said that there would have to be an end to the difficulties which were caused by the circumstances of the assassination [of an Iraqi lecturer at Aden University in 1979], and the subsequent arrest of Yemeni Ba'thist elements in Aden and of PDRY citizens in Iraq.

Concerning the Sultanate of Oman, Najashi said that democratic Yemen would welcome a resumption of "fraternal" relations between the two countries. But he said that this would have to be on condition that each of the two countries should not interfere in the affairs of the other, and that the sultanate should not be bound by any treaty or defense agreement with the United States. Asked about the facilities which the PDRY regime was granting to the Soviet fleet, he denied that this was being done, saying that the only thing which bound Aden to Moscow was a treaty of friendship. He refused to admit that any bases or military facilities had been granted to the Soviets in connection with this treaty.

The Sultanate Is neither Fish nor Fowl

Oman, for its part, still has not revealed the true nature of the security agreement which it has concluded with Washington. Qays al-Zawawi, the minister of state for foreign affairs, keeps talking in his statements about coordinating the sultanate's foreign policy with the policy which is followed by the other Gulf countries.

According to information relayed by diplomats from Muscat, the sultanate insists on having consultations with the other Gulf countries before making any decisions concerning matters which affect issues of security and defense. This is because the sultanate feels that the countries of the area are a unit, and that whatever affects one of the countries of the area will affect all of the area's other countries.

But diplomats are met with silence when they ask about the nature of the defense agreement [with the United States], and the extent to which it is consistent with the general policy of the Gulf countries which rejects foreign tropps and rejects the policy of alliances. These diplomats are told that the agreement is merely an "aid agreement," which is more economic and financial than it is political or military.

Authoritative sources in the Gulf states expect that it is Saudi Arabia itself which will give the green light to pursue success of the mediation efforts. If Saudi Arabia reaches even a minimum of mutual understanding with 'Ali Nasir Muhammad, this will signal the start of Kuwaiti mediation, which was temporarily at a standstill, but consequently took on new dimensions when it was expanded to include relations between Southern Yemen and Iraq. The fact is that Saudi Arabian and Southern Yemeni officials are setting conditions and counter-conditions for the achievement of a "minimum" of mutual understanding. The Southern Yemenis are concerned that there should be no interference in their internal affairs or politics, and they want to be free to choose the type of regime they want. At the same time, they would pledge to try not to export their "ideas or revolutionary ideology" to places outside their borders, on condition that no one should provoke them or "conspire" against them.

Another of their demands is that they should share in the oil wealth. They want to do this by means of implementing development projects and building schools and hospitals. They do not want aid to them to be in the form of goods, that is, "cash." Furthermore, they say that they are able to coexist with any type of regime next door to them, on condition that this regime would not provoke them. They, in turn, would not provoke that regime.

Neutralization, Not Threats

This is all that the Saudis are asking for. They also have certain reservations. One of these reservations is the fact that Aden signed a treaty of friendship and cooperation with Moscow, and subsequently signed a similar treaty with the Marxist regime in Ethiopia.

Informed sources in the Gulf area say that Saudi Arabia perhaps felt that these two treaties were concluded in a state of emergency which would pass. But they say that Saudi Arabia's reservations are based on its fear that the treaty with Msocow will be used to give the Soviets--some reports say that the Soviets have already been given--naval and air bases in Socotra, Maksar and other places. It may be that Saudi Arabia is not too concerned about such a military presence when it is far away, but Saudi Arabia cannot afford to feel this way when the military presence is right on its borders, threatens its security and, consequently, threatens its oil resources.

For this reason, Saudi Arabia makes the condition that any foreign military presence in the area be eliminated, be it a Soviet or American military presence. Saudi Arabia consequently desires to have the area neutralized, and this includes both Southern Yemen and the Sultanate of Oman. Saudi Arabia wants the former to undo its bonds with the Soviet Union, and wants the latter to do the same with the United States.

Saudi Arabia also has reservations about the considerable presence of Soviet, East German and Cuban military advisers in Southern Yemen, who consequently pose a constant threat from Aden to the Sultanate of Oman.

In the opinion of Saudi Arabia, if it is necessary to have the sultanate return to the ranks of the Arabs and have it commit itself to the decisions made by the Arab summit conference, it is also necessary to stop threatening the sultanate. This is because threats will only drive it farther away and will impel it to search for means of providing itself with security, even if it has to cooperate with the United States.

Diplomatic sources in the Arabian Gulf area are of the opinion that 'Ali Nasir Muhammad will not be inflexible in his talks with Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. They feel this way, particularly because he is known for his flexibility. In addition, he believes in an open-minded policy and a policy of coexistence, at the same time adhering to principles which he considers to concern himself and the Yemeni people.

These sources also say that the new regime in Aden does not want a protracted discussion of its ideological convictions. Rather, it is prepared to search for a way to work together with its "fellow-Arabs" in the Arabian Gulf and Red Sea areas.

Iraq Has no Objections

If a solution can be found for the problem between Aden and Riyadh, and for the problem between Aden and Muscat, there still remains the problem between Aden and Baghdad.

According to information from responsible sources in the Gulf area, Aden and Baghdad are not in a hurry to solve this problem and settle the issues which mainly developed during the days when 'Abd al-Fattah Isma'il was prime minister.

Saudi Arabia does not want to have anything to do with the problem between Southern Yemen and Iraq, and neither does Kuwait. Informed sources in Kuwait consider that this problem may be solved by a Yemeni initiative, which they think has already been started by the prime minister of Northern Yemen, 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih. They especially feel this way, because relations are very close between San'a' and Baghdad, and because relations between San'a' and Aden were strengthened after 'Ali Nasir Muhammad became prime minister.

San'a' receives a great deal of financial aid from Baghdad, and Baghdad is implementing a number of development projects for San'a'. For this reason, San'a did not want to approach Aden, because this would cause Iraq to ask a lot of questions. This is why San'a', after the change in regime in Aden, has sent a number of envoys to Baghdad and to the capital cities of the other countries of the Arabian Gulf area. Informed sources in Kuwait say that Northern Yemeni mediation between Aden and Baghdad is already proceeding along a sure path, but they say that the fruits of this mediation will not be seen before Aden reaches final reconcilation with Riyadh and Muscat.

RESUMPTION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN EXAMINED

Jiddah AL-MADINAH in Arabic 29 Jul 80 p 2

[Editorial: "The Resumption of Saudi-British Relations]

[Text] The resumption of normal relations between the kingdom and Great Britain confirms the desire of both parties to stay on the path of cooperation in support of efforts being exerted at present to bring about peace in the Arab region and to find a just solution to the Palestinian problem. The crisis which occurred in Saudi-British relations convinces all of us that the best way to maintain friendly relations is to steer them away from anything which offends the national values, ideals and feelings of the two nations, and, in particular, to eliminate once and for all the sources of tension in these relations, so that they do not recur in the future.

In its relations and dealings with all nations of the world, the kingdom always seeks mutual respect and avoidance of everything which offends the customs, values and ideals of these nations. It thus expects similar treatment from other nations.

We have been candid in expressing our feelings about the affronts made to our Islamic religion and to the values and ideals of our country, thereby causing a deterioration in diplomatic relations between our two countries.

We certainly appreciate the British government's recent positions regarding the Arab-Zionist struggle. They are positions which Prime Minister Thatcher and Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington have expressed on more than one occasion, confirming support of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination, and condemning the expansionist and terrorist acts being carried out by the Zionist authorities in the occupied Arab territories, including the establishment of new settlements and the policies of Judaization. They are positions which have subjected Lord Carrington to a stream of cheap attacks launched against him by Menachim Begin, the enemy's prime minister.

However, this does not mean that Great Britain as a great power has fulfilled its duty with respect to solving the Palestinian problem. We believe that words of condemnation and sharp criticism are not what is required. "Political history"is full of these statements. What is important is their translation into the realm of practical application. Great Britain is the one most responsible for the creation of the Palestinian problem. Consequently, it bears great responsibility to search for and participate effectively in finding a just solution for it, just as it succeeded in finding a solution for the Rhodesian problem, through the skill of Lord Carrington and his unprecedented efforts in this domain.

There are many opportunities for British participation in a solution. The most prominent of these include withdrawing British support for the Camp David agreements condemned by the Arab nations, contributing toward a push for a real European initiative for peace in the region, exerting effective pressure on the Zionist entity, and recognizing both the PLO and the right of the Palestinian people to establish an independent state on their national land.

If the British government has made progress on this road, we hope it will continue to do so, for this serves its interests, above all, as well as peace and stability in the region.

DANES WIN DESIGN CONTRACT FOR CIVIL DEFENSE HEADQUARTERS

Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 10 Aug 80 p 5

[Article by Martin Hartung: "Danish Design for Large Arabian Building Complex"]

[Text] A large building complex is to be built in Riyadh, capital of Saudi Arabia, as designed by Danish architects. The complex is to house the headquaters of the country's civil defense.

The size of the project is apparent from the fact that the floor area of the complex will amount to 57,000 square meters, which for comparison is over 60 percent larger than the foreign ministry's new office blocks at Asiatisk Plads near Knippelsbro in Copenhagen.

This was a very demanding and complicated design task, all the more so because the structure is to house, in addition to a command center and offices, a housing wing for the personnel and a school for recruits, an indoor swimming pool, and a mosque. The design was prepared by a group of technicians consisting of Condane (the engineering firms of B. Hojlund Rasmussen, N. H. Harms, and Geotechnical Institute), as well as the engineering firm of Crone & Kock and the architectural firm of Holm & Grut.

The group was assigned the task in competition with half a dozen large firms of various Western countries.

The Arabs preferred the Danish design because, among other things, it was worked out in consultation with the Danish civil defense administration and thereby provided a better solution than the Arabs had in fact asked for.

About 60 technicians of the involved engineering and architectural firms were employed in the design work, which according to the contract was to be done within a time limit and at a firm price.

The design has just been delivered to and approved by the Arab authorities, and it is now to be submitted for enterprise bids. The bid material submitted by the Danish group consists of about 900 drawings and about 3000 pages of specifications and material amounts, figures that give an impression of the size of the project.

In shaping the project's forms and materials, designs and installations the Danes made efforts to reduce the demand for maintenance to the extent possible. For example, facades are to be in cast concrete of a smooth, sand-colored surface.

In the design the Danes strived to produce a building complex which to the smallest detail will conform to the Arabian way of life. They did, however, refrain from any attempt to create Islamic architecture. It will be a simple and robust and to some degree also a monumental structure.

Perspective drawing of the design for the headquarters of Saudi Arabia's civil defense, prepared by a group of Danish engineers and architects. The structure is to be built on a concrete deck at the first floor level above the terrain. On the deck there will be, among other things a well shaped courtyard in front of the office wing (in the middle of the complex.) Below the deck there will be a parking garage. On the deck there will be gardens and a helicopter landing pad. Below the deck there will be a bomb-proof command center and bomb shelters.

SAUDI ANTICRIME WORKING PAPER SUBMITTED TO ARAB CONFERENCE

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 30 Jul 80 p 1

[Article by Tal'at Waqa: "Kingdom Submits Working Paper to Conference of Arab Interior Ministers"]

[Text] His Royal Highness Prince Nayif ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, minister of interior, has told AL-RIYAD that the kingdom has submitted a working paper to the conference of Arab interior ministers scheduled to be held in Ta'if on 15 Shawwal [27 August]. AL-RIYAD has learned that the most important feature of the Saudi working paper is a field study of security problems in Arab countries.

The interior minister said that the kingdom, in its capacity as host nation, has joined the Social Defense Organization in writing the agenda for the conference. He added that consulations are under way with Arab interior ministers to learn their opinions about the proposals which have been submitted. Many answers have been received approving the agenda.

AL-RIYAD has learned, moreover, that the agenda of the conference consists of several points, including security problems in Arab countries and their present challenges, the drafting of a preventive security plan and the development of the conference of Arab interior ministers into a permanent ministerial conference. The agenda of the conference also includes choosing the place and time of the fourth meeting, in addition to appointing the secretary general of the Arab Social Defense Organization.

Dr Faruq Murad, director of the Anti-Crime Center of the interior ministry, told AL-RIYAD that the most important feature of the Saudi working paper at the conference is a field study of security problems in Arab countries. The study was undertaken by the Anti-Crime Center of the interior ministry. It sent investigators to all Arab countries with a questionnaire prepared in advance.

Through the use of qualified investigators and on the basis of information produced through the study, this working paper set forth the first preventive security plan. It is hoped that joint Arab cooperation in security matters will crystallize around the plan over the next 3 years, which is the period of the plan.

WATER PROJECTS--The Water and Sewage Authority of the Eastern Province has recently undertaken the drilling of eight artesian wells and has built the necessary reservoirs and pumps in both al-Dammam and al-Khabar. 'Abdullah Muhammad al-Babatayn, deputy director of the authority, has said that five artesian wells have also been dug in various districts in al-Dammam and al-Khabar, plus three wells in al-'Aqrabiyah and al-Thiqbah. Reservoirs with a capacity of 40 cubic meters have been built for them. He also said that a study has been completed for a project to drill seven artesian wells, with their reservoirs and pumps, in populated areas. The study includes an extension project in al-Dammam and al-Khabar and a well project. The authority is also trying to distribute water in tank trucks to those who are not served by the public water system. [Text] [Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 6 Aug 80 p 3] 7811

HEALTH PROGRAM--The Minister of Health, Dr Husayn al-Jaza'iri, is scheduled in the near future to establish the work program of clinics and hospitals in the western region during this year's pilgrimage season, according to Dr 'Abd al-'Aziz Abbar, assistant director general of Health Affairs in the western region. He added that Health Affairs in the region has set up this program which includes the preparation of hospitals in general and those in the area of the shrines of the pilgrimage ceremonies, in particular, plus the preparation of clinics on the al-Madinah road, in order to get ready to receive pilgrims. The minister of health is scheduled to decide on this program very soon. The program also includes the numbers and names of workers during the season. It is worth pointing out that some of the staff of the King 'Abdul 'Aziz University Hospital in Jiddah is expected to participate side by side with Health Affairs in its work during the pilgrimage season, in accordance with the agreement concluded between the two parties. Dr Abbar hoped that the program would ultimately succeed in achieving the goal sought by the ministry and desired by Health Minister Dr Husayn al-Jaza'iri. He confirmed that the program will be set up by the minsiter before the end of the current month of Ramadhan. [Text] [Jiddah AL-MADINAH in Arabic 29 Jul 80 p 3] 7811

AIRPORT NETWORK--A number of airports have either been opened or will be opened in Saudi Arabia during the latter part of this year. The new

Ha'il airport was recently opened at a cost of 169 million riyals. It includes a main building covering 2,270 square meters, a VIP lounge furnished with a private wing for royalty, an arrival lounge accommodating 600 passengers per hour and a departure lounge accommodating 240 passengers per hour. Thus the arrival lounge is capable of receiving 5 Boeing-727's per hour, and the departure lounge can send off 2 of the same type of aircraft per hour. The runway is 3,200 meters long and 45 meters wide. There is an access 22 meters wide parallel to the runway. The space for aircraft parking is 25 meters by 225 meters and accommodates 4 Boeing-727's at one time. Saudi Arabian Airlines recently began the first trial flight to Muhasin airport in al-Ihsa' on Miskar-28 aircraft which hold 65 passengers. Then the new airport was opened with regular official flights averaging three flights daily and serving the route of al-Hufuf--al-Riyadh--Dhahran--Jiddan--al-Riyadh--Dhahran--Jiddah and vice-versa. Limited tests of aircraft will begin this month at King 'Abd 'Aziz International Airport in Jiddah in preparation for its official opening at the end of this year. The Budnah airport recently opened, and following this month of Ramadhan, the airports of Najran, Jayzan, Bishih and al-Wujih will open officially. These airports have been furnished with modern and advanced equipment in the fields of aviation, control and international air safety. In its budget for this year, the Civil Aviation board authorized the selection of a site for construction of a civilian airport in al-Hufuf in the central district. A team of engineers and experts has been commissioned to select the site of the new airport. It is worth pointing out that the estimated cost of the new airport is more than 250 million riyals. Saudi Civil Aviation president Shaykh Nasir al-'Asaf says that a network of modern and advanced airports will be built in the kingdom by the end of the current plan. FERTILIZER PLANT--A new fertilizer plant will be built in Jubayl District in Saudi Arabia. Work on its facilities is expected to begin in early November, and production will begin by the end of 1982. The Royal Commission of the Jubayl and Yanba' project has recently signed an agreement to rent land for the plant which will produce urea fertilizer. Annual production capacity will be 500,000 tons for both local consumption and export abroad. The plant will be built on a plot of 487,200 square meters. It may be pointed out here that the Royal Commission made preliminary preparations of the land designated for the plant, and the Jubayl Fertilizer Company completed the gound surveys. The site will be supplied with electricity, water, a sewage system and communications, in addition to the sea water necessary for cooling. [Text] [Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 30 Jul 80 p 8] 7811

WATER PIPELINE--Saudi Arabia has allocated $910 million for a huge project which aims at supplying Riyadh with water by laying a pipeline between the Gulf coast and the Saudi capital. Several German, Dutch, French and American companies will execute this contract. It is the final stage of the tremendous project to assure the water requirements of Riyadh during the 1980's. The contract was awarded through the Saudi government Salt Water Conversion Organization. Last year it awarded a contract to built 10 desalinization units at the port of Jubayl. Japanese and Italian companies are currently supplying the pipes. The project consists of 2 pipelines, each 1.5 meters in diameter and 466 kilometers long, in order to supply 830,000 cubic meters of water, in addition to 6 pumping stations aloug the pipelines. AL-SADIQ AL-MAHDI DISCUSSES NATIONAL RECONCILIATION, RELATIONS WITH EGYPT

Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 9 Jul 80 pp 15, 12

[Interview with Sudanese opposition leader al-Sadiq al-Mahdi by Babakr Hasan Makki in Khartoum; date not given]

[Text] Al-Mahdi tells AL-SIYASAH:

"We Want Alternative That Avoids Pre-May and Post-May Mistakes.

"Elements Inside Regime Worked to Foil National Reconciliation.

"Al-Sharif al-Hindi Asked Sudanese Ambassador in Tripoli to Negotiate With Him But Khartoum Refused.

"Biggest Accomplishment of Palestinian Revolution Is That It Transferred Battle to West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"Arabs Must Put United States Before One of Two Options: Relationship With Arabs or With Israel."

Before my interview with al-Sadiq al-Mahdi, the popular Khartoum was talking about a diplomatic flap that almost erupted between Sudan and Nigeria when Nigeria gave al-Mahdi an official reception even though he has no official status other than being a former Sudanese prime minister, chairman of the banned National [al-ummah] Party, former chairman of the opposition National Front, former member of the Socialist Union's Political Bureau, the grandson of Muhammad Ahmad al-Mahdi, the leader of the biggest revolution in the Arab area, and, finally, the quiet opposition man who uses Khartoum as the base of his opposition. The popular Khartoum said that the Nigerian president had received al-Mahdi only hours before convocation of the African economic summit conference and that this motivated Muhammad Mirghani, the minister of state for foreign affairs, to criticize this act on the part of the Nigerian government. Even though al-Sadiq al-Mahdi denied that the issue was so clamorous when I asked him about it and was content to say only that he had met with the Nigerian president without any official reception--despite this, this issue was one of many which had aroused my interest in interviewing al-Sadiq. The external opposition considers the man a participant in the regime whereas the official Khartoum considers him an opponent.

Al-Sadiq still lives in Halah, Aba Island, where his house abounds with members of al-Ansar, some lying on the green grass, some eating the hot 'asidah [paste made of flour and butter] for breakfast and some coming from the west for greetings and "congratulation." Amidst all this, al-Sadiq secluded himself in his office which overflows with volumes and books, with a picture of William (Deng), al-Mahdi's late friend, placed in the middle.

[Question] The public street is wondering about your real position toward the regime. Some say that you have joined the regime whereas others say that you have broken your agreement with Numayri?

[Answer] Our position toward the present regime in Sudan, says al-Sadiq, is based on the fact that we were in conflict and dispute and that then came a stage during which the regime offered the national reconciliation. As a front comprised of the various parties and leaderships, our opinion was to respond to the reconciliation on the grounds that it would establish a system of concord in Sudan through understanding between the regime and its opponents. The bases--seven altogether--for this system of concord were laid down and the most important was the principle that the current political system--the Sudanese Socialist Union--has failed to be a democratic system in the country. Therefore, al-Mahdi adds, this issue had to be rexamined, not for the sake of a return to the system of parties but for the sake of setting up a comprehensive political system in Sudan. This was the basis of the expected reform in the Sudanese political system. Nine points were defined for this political reform and were made public. There was the issue of the constitution because we held the belief that there was a need for reforms in a democratic and Islamic direction insofar as the country's constitution is concerned. The provisions required to be amended in this regard were laid out in detail. In any case, our demands dealt with fundamental changes in the political establishments and actions. Since then--the beginning of the reconciliation--we have been discussing the details of these matters. The starting point of these discussions has been the importance of normalizing the relations between yesterday's opponents so that a freer atmosphere of discussion may be created. This normalization did certainly require definite measures--such as putting a stop to the arrests and to the opening of jails, abolishing or freezing the state security law and the return of those present in camps abroad and providing them stability in modern cooperative associations. Generally, the normalization required the creation of an atmosphere in which the state of bitterness and conflict existing earlier would be eliminated. We believe that it has been possible in past periods to realize all the aspects of normalization and to bring back all the brothers who were in exile abroad and establish them in various projects. However, implementation of the fundamental changes required has not been realized for reasons. These reasons are connected with the presence in the regime of elements that have done all they can to resist the required changes in order to preserve their positions and out of fear of the democratic changes that may occur. As leaderships that have responded to the reconciliation, we find that as long as there is in our country the freedom that enables us to say what is right and what is wrong and to call for correcting the wrong--and there is now greater freedom in our country than in many of the Arab and African countries--then this is enough to make us interested in the issue of reconciliation and in continuing the efforts to realize the remaining goals. I believe that under the free atmosphere currently present in Sudan, we have been able to talk objectively about the shortcomings and faults of the regime and to also talk maturely about the mistakes of the pre-May regime and to say how we want a situation that will not take the country back to the era preceding the 25th of May (1969). We have also been able to say that we do not want continuation of the current practices in the country but want to find an alternative that avoids the pre-May and post-May mistakes. We believe that this line is the best line for the interest of the country. This is why we are happy that it has been possible, through the path of reconciliation, to relatively exclude the foreign factors, elements and forces from interfering and playing a role in the Sudanese politics. This has been one of the accomplishments which has made it possible to turn the disagreement over the remaining issues into a purely Sudanese disagreement. This transformation protects the Sudanese political body from the incoming influences that could intensify if we return to the state of confrontation. Therefore, the state of confrontation is rejected, and so is surrender to the status quo and to the system in its present form because such surrender means continuation of the present mistakes and impotent policies and practices. Such continuation is against the country's interest. If it is against Sudan's interest to return to the policy of confrontation and if it is against Sudan's interest to capitulate to the conditions as they are at present, then it is logically in Sudan's interest to take advantage of the conditions of relative freedom to work with political means in order to realize the goals which, we believe, will lead to changes when achieved. As long as we can fault any of the regime's actions with freedom, then there is no justification for us or for others to work from abroad. The moderate opposition leader adds: In summary, we can describe our position as that of a group that has responded to the reconciliation on certain conditions. Some of the circumstances preparing the way and some of the accesses leading to these (conditions) have been realized but not all of the desired goals have been realized. I declared and explained in a press conference in July 1978 that all the things that will reunite the will of the Sudanese will be the fruit of the national reconciliation process.

Optimism

[Question] (Here I interrupted al-Mahdi to ask:) Does this mean that you are optimistic that all your goals will be realized someday?

[Answer] I am neither optimistic nor pessimistic. As long as the counter opinion has freedom and as long as the policy of violence and oppression is stopped, it is my opinion that it is the duty of the Sudanese citizen to work within this framework to realize the goals which he views as the outlet for his country. It is my opinion that there is no justification for the policy of confrontation except when freedom is undermined and confiscated and when a policy of violence and oppression is established. It is also my opinion that as a part of the third world, our country does not have the opportunity and it is not right for it to adopt the policies and constitutional systems followed, for example, in West or East Europe. It must also not be said, for example, that we want a liberal democracy. It is also my opinion that any attempt to copy these policies exactly will have harmful consequences because even the systems followed in Europe have come as the result of certain political and social development that accompanied the conditions through which Europe has passed. Therefore, we are, as I have already said, in need of detente and of finding an equation with two sides: One side for unifying the administration and building the country and the other side for the freedom that provides the opportunity for participation, for bringing into account, for questioning and for correcting the mistakes. The challenge facing us is the challenge of enabling our political system to establish this equation for this generation satisfactorily. This is the lesson that we can derive from Islam because Islam has no single system of government. There isn't a certain system of government called Islam. Islam contains general principles--consultation, justice and so forth--and has the Shari'a. If we examine the Shari'a itself, we find that it contains provisions and these provisions were turned into laws by the jurisprudents--Abu Hanifah, Malik, al-Shafi'i and ibn Hanbal. Those jurisprudents benefited from the intellectual and social background under which they lived to turn the provisions found in the book [Koran] and in the Sunna into laws by which the people abide. As long as we want to apply the Islamic Shari'a, we are required to know the provisions of the book and the Sunna and to understand them in the light of the intellectual and social life we are living today. The strongest point of Islam, says the son of al-Siddiq al-Mahdi, is that it has not committed mankind to a certain system of government but has left general principles. It is our duty to apply these principles at all times and everywhere through the channels and means befitting the conditions under which we live in the light of these facts. The present regime came up with interpretations, including the Socialist Union which it has adopted from Egypt, and established the present constitution. When we view this experiment from within, we find that it must be corrected in the light of the action and of the experience. When we view it from outside, we find that it must be corrected within the framework of the concepts within which the reform is sought. We have called for correction of the experiment. It is my belief that as long as we are working in an atmosphere of freedom, we cannot be annoyed. The problem arises when the government says: I follow one system of government and you are either with me or against me. This does not apply to the present policy, as I have already said, because there is a degree of tolerance and freedom which, to my belief, doesn't exist in many Arab and Islamic countries.

I Resigned From Political Bureau for These Reasons

[Question] After your return to Sudan, you entered the Socialist Union and took the oath as a member of the Political Bureau but gave up this position soon afterwards, either by resigning or by being relieved. How do you explain all this?

[Answer] When I entered the Socialist Union, I did so as the result of four points which were announced in the press conference to which I have already referred, namely:

1. Correcting, reorganizing and restructuring the Socialist Union.

2. Revising the provisions of the constitution to make it more democratic and more Islamic.

3. Resettling the groups of al-Ansar that were abroad.

4. Reviewing the entire current performance to bolster the positive and to drop the negative. Even though I had agreed on these points with President Numayri, there are elements in the Socialist Union who resisted this inclination strongly when they became aware of it. The question became more complex with the rise of the question: Where does Sudan stand vis-a-vis Camp David? We had thought that this position would be discussed in the Political Bureau which is the top political authority. But when I found that the decision concerning Sudan's policy toward Camp David had been adopted without a meeting of the Political Bureau, this provided the proof that this bureau does not perform the role it should perform in determining this country's policies. Therefore, my resignation was due to the fact that the measures that were expected to be taken regarding the four points had met resistance which led to freezing them. This matter was subject to give and take. But then came the straw that broke the camel's back in the form of the adoption of a decision on a serious matter without the participation of the authority concerned, namely the Political Bureau. Had the four points been realized and had the Political Bureau continued to exercise its jurisdiction as the highest political agency, I would not have had to resign.

This is al-Sharif al-Hindi

[Question] (I then asked al-Sadiq the question raised by the Sudanese man-in-the-street, saying:) You and al-Sharif al-Hindi were the two faces of the opposition coin. You have returned and al-Sharif has continued his opposition from abroad, accusing you of abandoning the struggle as a result of the temptation of some positions. What is your position toward al-Sharif al-Hindi and toward the accusation he has made against you?

[Answer] The truth is that brother Husayn al-Hindi was a member with us in the National Front. When the front adopted the reconciliation decision, it did so with a unanimous vote. He personally was present when the decision was taken. After I met with brother Numayri in July 1977, the front met on 14 July 1977 at the Brown Hotel in London. Al-Hindi was present at this meeting and (agreed) to all the results of this meeting. Afterwards, brother Husayn al-Hindi declared from London Rabio [BBC] and from Tripoli Radio on 24 July 1977 his support for all that I had said. It was then decided that I would come to Sudan with all the front leaders to continue discussing the provisions contained in the reconciliation policy. Al-Hindi was supposed to return with us but he excused himself for health reasons. However, he did see us off at the airport on 29 September 1977 and we agreed that he would stay abroad until I returned to him or wrote him on the outcome of what happens at home. We were then to assess the developments and he, because he had stayed behind, was to write President Numayri to inform him of my delegation to conduct the negotiations at home. He was also to observe silence and not to make any comments until the two of us met. In fact, he did write a letter to President Numayri which was published by DAR AL-AYYAM on 29 September 1977 in which he says that he supports the reconciliation policy and delegates me to conduct the negotiations. He observed silence for about a month and then began to express his opposition to the discussions without knowing what had taken place.

Partisan Jealousy

(In talking about al-Sharif al-Hindi, al-Mahdi adds:) It is my opinion that he started the opposition not because he is opposed to the reconciliation policy but because he feels that the popular reception that I was given upon my return to Sudan brought me, in his opinion, a political gain and because the Arab and world information media showed interest in the reconciliation as a matter between me and President Numayri, thus dropping [reference to] all other parties. These things aroused al-Hindi's partisan jealousy and this is why he did not fulfill what he had promised and why he started his well-known opposition. The proof of this is that when some men in the regime learned that I insisted on certain measures for change and reform they thought of maneuvering within the partisan disagreement existing between me and brother Husayn al-Hindi and thus contacted him and concluded with him the 1978 London agreement. In that agreement, al-Hindi agreed to the constitution as it is and agreed to the Socialist Union as it is. All he demanded was the more careful application of the constitution and the re-formation of the Socialist Union. This agreement was broadcast and announced in London and signed by brother Husayn al-Hindi. This means that when he entered the reconciliation, he agreed to issues that I would not have accepted because they are not within the framework of the front's policy. However, when the brothers in the regime concentrated on the issue of "partisan jealousy," they found from him response to things that I was rejecting and thus showed that his aim was not rejection of the reconciliation. It later became evident that the London agreement itself was not for the purpose of reconciliation but for the purpose of threatening us. Since then, brother Husayn al-Hindi has moved to establish alliances with several partisan organizations in the Arab countries. However, he has not kept his promises to these parties--promises that he would stage revolutions in Sudan.

Al-Hindi Asked Sudanese Ambassador in Tripoli to Mediate for Reconciling Him With Regime

(Al-Sadiq adds:) I later learned that during his presence in Libya, brother Husayn al-Hindi contacted the Sudanese ambassador in Tripoli--after contacting Dr al-Turayki--and asked to negotiate with the ambassador. However, the Sudanese ambassador asked Khartoum for the permission to do so but Khartoum refused to open negotiations with al-Hindi because it doesn't trust what he says and so the ambassador refused to meet with him. It is my opinion that the policy which al-Hindi is following and which relies on getting aid from foreign countries that are usually hostile to Sudan, on his acting from abroad and on his sending weapons into the country is a completely wrong policy because it is an adventurous policy and because it has hurt his party's followers whereas he is safe abroad. He sends things that cause his followers at home to perpetrate security crimes and this has exposed all his party's cells to the Sudanese security agencies. Now most of his men are involved in security problems because of his adventurous policy. Another of the faults of al-Hindi's policy is that even if we assume that this policy succeeds, at best, in polarizing a certain country hostile to Sudan to support him, this success would give Sudan the justification to polarize another country. If this policy succeeds, it will, under the best assumption, turn Sudan into an arena of conflict among non-Sudanese forces operating in Sudan. What value does all this have when the Sudanese has the opportunity to say this is wrong and this is right? Sudan is currently alive with a free student movement. If you visit the universities, you will notice this. There is also a free labor movement, in the sense that labor elections took place this time without any arrests being made against any side, unlike in the past. It is true that there was intervention but no arrests were made among the rival leaderships. This policy, and within this degree of this freedom, is the policy in which I believe. I reject and condemn any policy that resorts to violence or to foreign aid as long as there is an opportunity for dialogue, difference and tolerance in Sudan for the realization of the popular demands. It is my belief that this adventurous policy [of al-Hindi's] will result in harm for all sides, regardless of whether it succeeds or fails. This is why it is a faulty and rejected policy. (Al-Sadiq al-Mahdi adds:) This is why I have told and advised and continue to tell and advise brother al-Hindi--through my meetings with people who are connected with al-Hindi--that the mistake does not lie in whether we cooperate or we don't cooperate but in this adventurous course. It is my conviction that if al-Hindi abandons this course, there will be opportunity for national action in Sudan, and even for rejecting the reconciliation. Not all those who support me support the reconciliation. Many of them oppose it and believe that it is a faulty policy but only because they are confident that the reconcoliation's goals will be realized. I have no objection to realizing the reconciliation's goals and I have no objection to whoever says that it is our duty to abandon the reconciliation policy.

I Have Not Collected Single Mil From My Position in Sudanese Socialist Union

The former chairman of the National Front and the former prime minister of Sudan then proceeds to deal with the accusations made against him by al-Sharif al-Hindi, saying: These accusations are short-lived. For example, there is the accusation that I have been lured with positions. Until this day, I have refused to have the discussions deal with any position and have insisted that they deal with the regime and with the required changes. I have said that there is no use in changing persons and that what is needed is a change in the actions and the establishments. If my goal was to accept a position, this would have happened long ago. But so far, I have no official status whatsoever. As far as rights are concerned, I have eagerly sought since returning to Sudan the rights of those who had been punished economically. I can say that through the reconciliation, the rights of many people have been restored and many others have been rehabilitated. But until this day, nothing has been returned to me or to my family and if anything is returned in the future, I will be the last to get it. What this means is that if we had embarked on the reconciliation for personal gain, something would have definitely happened in this long period. Had I asked for anything, there would have been a response. At present, I am an ordinary citizen only and I am committed not to transfer the domestic battle or differences outside Sudan but to work for containing them in the country and to try to convince the regime of any policy in which I believe through amicable means of communication. I will tell you that I did not collect a single mil as a monthly salary for the period I spent as a member of the Political Bureau in which I served for 5 months after taking the oath, keeping in mind that a Political Bureau member has privileges that exceed those of a minister.

Why Should I Reconsider If Offered Position of Prime Minister?

[Question] I took this opportunity to ask al-Sadiq: Will you reconsider if you are offered the position of prime minister?

[Answer] (He replied with surprise:) Why should I reconsider?

[Question] I hastened to say: But you have pointed out that not all your conditions for national reconciliation have been realized.

[Answer] This is true. But, as I have told you, I do not want to talk about any positions unless the reforms which I believe to be necessary for reforming people take place. It is out of the question for me to assume any position or responsibility if these reforms are not made.

Egyptian Leaders Assume Sudan's Subservience to Them

[Question] I asked al-Sadiq al-Mahdi about the truth of the Sudanese-Egyptian relations in light of Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat's attack on Sudanese President Ja'far Numayri in the 15 May speech.

[Answer] There are between Sudan and Egypt historical bonds that exist at present and that will exist in the future. The faults of the Egyptian policy is that many of Egypt's leaders and of its ruling class assume that these bonds commit Sudan to follow Egypt. This is a basic mistake. Sudan has a political movement that is more mature than the political movement in Egypt and Sudan's people are aware of their dignity and their entity. We are Egypt's neighbors but nobody will be wrong if he says that there is a clear-cut Sudanese personality. For example, our Arabic dialect is different from the Egyptian Arab dialect. The official sect in Sudan and Egypt is inherited from the Ottomans, namely the Hanafi sect, whereas the popular sect in Sudan is the Maliki sect and the popular one in Egypt is the Shafi'i sect.

Sidqi Pasha Dreamt of Putting Sudan in His Pocket

(Al-Sadiq adds:) When Sidqi Pasha, for example, returned from his negotiations with Bevin in 1946, he told his people: "I have brought you Sudan in my pocket." When Fu'ad Siraj-al-Din, the chairman of the banned al-Ummah [Presumably meaning al-Wafd] Party, wanted to criticize the Egyptian revolution because this revolution was serious in giving Sudan the right to self-determination under the influence of Maj Gen Muhammad Najib who knew the Sudanese well--when Siraj-al-Din wanted to criticize this revolution, he said that it lost Sudan, as if Sudan, says al-Sadiq, is a part of his estate. At present, President al-Sadat assumes that Sudan should support his policies as a matter of course without his having to discuss any of his policies with it. Al-Sadat surprised President Numayri with his Camp David policy. Numayri had his circumstances which compelled him to proceed slowly in taking a clear and definite position against the policies of al-Sadat who did not consult Numayri even though he had consulted a number of other Arab leaders. When al-Sadat was in the United States, Numayri arrived there before the former's departure but al-Sadat did not even wish to wait to meet with Numayri and to try to convince him of anything because he assumed, as a result of this attitude of superiority, that Sudan would naturally support any decision he takes. As a result of this attitude, he counted Sudan with the supporters of the [Washington] accord. Even when Numayri made his Arab solidarity tour, he found understanding from all the countries, including the rejectionist countries, but total disregard from Cairo which doesn't want him to think for himself. In my opinion, the major problem lies in how to implant in the mentality of the Egyptian ruling class the idea that this class cannot realize the common interests of the two peoples except respecting and appreciating the Sudanese will and through abandoning the concept of committing Sudan to be subservient to Egypt. It is my view that any Sudanese, whoever he may be, acknowledges and fully believes in the ties that bind the two fraternal people. But ultimately, all the Sudanese will stand in the face of any Egyptian leadership that wants to transform these interests into subservience. I believe, says al-Sadiq, that the present leadership in Egypt is like the leadership which existed in the days of King Faruq--a leadership that has been and continues to be very ill with this disease. The Egyptian studies materials that assure him that Sudan was part of Egypt until the conquest [sic] and that one of the demands of the Egyptian national movement is "evacuation" and "Sudan." These concepts must be eliminated from the Egyptian national education and from the Egyptian culture. The Egyptian must view Sudan as a people with their entity, their pride and their dignity. Through such approach, the highest degrees of cooperation, integration and unity can be achieved. Otherwise, there will be estrangement, conflict and alienation. (Continuing his assessment of the Egyptian policy, al-Sadiq al-Mahdi adds:) There is a very serious aspect in al-Sadat policy embodied in the fact that when al-Sadat came to Khartoum to take part in the session of the Joint Egyptian-Sudanese People's Assembly, he said that he is Sudan's protector, thus imposing custodianship on our country and ignoring the fact that he was addressing a people with their priorities in life and with their concepts and values. He who sells the trust of his country cannot find a way with which to impose "custodianship" on Sudan. The mainstays of the Arab Egypt and of the Islamic Egypt have been lost with al-Sadat's policy. With his current policy, the Egyptian president has shattered any possibility of cooperation between Egypt and Sudan because he has turned Egypt into an inlet for relationship with Israel and this relationship is rejected at the Arab, Islamic and national levels.

To put it briefly, the success of any relationship between Egypt and Sudan depends on the disappearance of two things:

First, disappearance of the domineering Egyptian khedivite mentality that assumes Sudan's subservience to Egypt.

Second, disappearance of the current Egyptian policy which is non-Arab, non-Islamic and unnational.

Biggest Accomplishment of Palestinian Revolution Is Its Transfer of Battle to West Bank and Gaza

[Question] I then moved on with al-Sadiq al-Mahdi to talk about the Palestinian resistance. I said: Are you with the policy of the Palestinian diplomacy or with the policy of the rifle only?

[Answer] (Here, the leader of al-Ansar says:) First, this sharp division between the rifle and diplomacy does not exist at all. It is my opinion that the Palestinian resistance performed an honorable act when it transferred the battle to the occupied territories. The battle is still heated and the West Bank and Gaza people are still fighting bravely. This in itself is one of the biggest accomplishments of the Palestinian revolution and is something that sends the greatest joy in the heart amidst this darkness which has been created by al-Sadat policy. All that we hope for now is that the Arab and Islamic countries play a role in heating up the battle. Israel must be made to feel that this situation in the West Bank and the Strip is unbearable insofar as it is concerned. As for the issue of diplomacy, it is necessary and it has major priority, especially since it has become evident that it is possible to influence the U.S. public opinion, especially the black sector which has displayed great readiness to understand the Arab cause. It is our duty to address this public opinion. We should also not forget that there is evident conflict between the United States and its allies and here arises the need to address these allies.

I tell you, says al-Sadiq, that the Arabs must put the United State before two options: Either the relationship with the Arabs or the relationship with Israel. I believe that if we put the United States before these two options, it will certainly opt for the places where it has its interests, namely the relationship with the Arabs, because Washington is fully aware that Israel is saddling it with extremely exorbitant costs. Israel is an industrial entity created by the U.S. intelligence and the U.S. weapons. I know many Americans, such as Fulbright, George Ball and James (Aiken), the former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia, who have shown a clear understanding of the Arab cause and have demanded reassessment of the U.S. relations with Israel from the angle of restoring the legitimate Arab rights.

The U.S. mentality, adds al-Sadiq al-Mahdi, still believes that the United States can be the main support for Israel while being at the same time the main beneficiary of the Arab interests. An end must be put to this "vanity" through the alert movement of the Islamic and Arab nation.

Iranian Revolution's Experience

[Question] Just before leaving the office of al-Sadiq al-Mahdi in his house, I remembered the Iranian revolution and the messages that al-Mahdi has carried from President Numayri to Khomeyni and the Iranian leaders and so I asked him about his assessment of the Iranian revolution.

[Answer] (Al-Sadiq said:) I believe that the Iranian revolution had clear and definite goals, foremost being the goal of purging Iran of the regime of the shah who wanted to change Iran's skin and to impose western interests on it. The Iranian revolution is the biggest proof of the capabilities of Islam to mobilize the masses' will for liberation. It is also an affirmation that the interests of the Muslims do not lie in subservience to the east or the west and that these interests are based on the faith, creed, ideals and entity of the Muslims. But as we know, adds al-Sadiq, every revolution has to encounter some troubles because the previous security and administration system falls to pieces and this leads to an eruption of the previously repressed problems. It is my belief that the current problems of the Iranian revolution arise from the absence of alternative programs to those of the toppled regime. They also emanate from the lack of harmony between the revolutionary cadre of politicians and the clergymen. This has provided the opportunity for the rise of some centers of power that want to leave their own impression. The Iranian revolution is now facing a major challenge embodied in drawing up alternative revolutionary programs and developing the revolutionary cadre capable of leadership.

BOURGUIBA SIGNS DECREE-LAWS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 16 Aug 80 p 4

[Report: "The Independence of the Judiciary Must Be Safeguarded"]

[Text] Yesterday morning President Habib Bourguiba conferred at Carthage Palace with Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali.

Mohamed Mzali, minister of justice, and Slaheddine Baly, minister of national defense, later joined the conversation.

Following the audience, Mohamed Mzali made the following statement: "The talk with the chief of state dealt with some problems related to the functioning of the administration and the judiciary.

The Supreme Fighter reemphasized the need for an independent judiciary. He equally recalled that he had sacrificed his youth for the independence of the country and for the prevalence of justice among the citizens, and that he will always watch, with God's help, over the honesty of this state and the strengthening of the foundations of its domestic and foreign influence.

Furthermore, the President of the Republic was kind enough to sign in the course of the audience the following decree-laws:

- Decree-law on the creation of a school of medicine in Monastir;

- Decree-law on the organization of pharmaceutical studies in Tunisia;

- Decree-law on the organization of the teaching of dentistry;

- Decree-law amending Law No 76-64 of 12 July 1976 on the organization of medical careers;

- Decree-law amending Law No 77-19 of 23 March 1977 on the system of studies in medical schools;

- Decree-law on the ratification of the loan agreement concluded in Washington on 22 May 1980 between the government of the Republic of Tunisia and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development pertaining to the fourth highways project;

- Decree-law ratifying the agreement between the government of the Republic of Tunisia and the Association for Voluntary Sterilization.

The President of the Republic also signed two decrees, the first appointing M'hamed Ali Souissi director general of projects of the Ministry of the Plan and Finances, and appointing Ridha Zbiri director general of taxes of the same department.

PRIME MINISTER ADDRESSES GROUP CHARGED WITH FORGING NEW STUDENT UNION

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 6 Aug 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] "We want an organization or several organizations elected freely and by democratic means which would really represent the students, take part in the organization of university life and, why not, be really concerned with the political, economic, social, and obviously, the cultural life of the country."

These were the words of the prime minister and Party secretary general, Mr Mohamed Mzali on Monday evening at the Dar Maghrebia in Carthage, when he inaugurated the work of the study commission assigned to the examination of the question of student representation.

In his recent declarations, Mr Mohamed Mzali had already promised that the government would do whatever was in its power this summer in order that at the beginning of the academic year, the students could form such an organization. To understand the problem and to place the Monday evening meeting in its true context, the prime minister gave an analysis which recalled the various techniques applied, but unsuccessfully, to solve the crisis affecting the UGET [General Tunisian Student Union] since the Korba Congress and which has finally caused a paralysis in this organization.

"The university crisis," said the prime minister, "and the periodical disturbances it has been experiencing, derive from many objective and subjective reasons of which one, which is by no means the least, is that hateful "division into small groups," caused itself essentially by the ideological quarrels which have for several years been sapping the student milieus. The situation was, so to say, blocked, and this block was the result of almost rigidly frozen stands and of the previously adopted principles. In particular, two previous stands, which were expressed by two slogans: "Free our imprisoned comrades" and "Do away with supervision." Today there is no longer any political prisoner in Tunisia, and an interministerial council has just decided that the former university supervisors will be, in a matter of speaking, recycled, converted and transferred to other administrative cadres. As regards the statement that the students are unable to practice democracy in a supposedly non-democratic country, I would answer: we ourselves believe that Tunisia is evolving unceasingly towards increasing democracy, that democracy is acquired, built up and earned, and finally, that the initiatives taken just recently by President Bourguiba should encourage the spectators and skeptics among the students to speak on democracy. As for me, I sincerely believe that it will be possible for us to obtain, by the beginning of the academic year, a strategy tending to permit the students to take part in the university life and more generally, in the political life of the country by means of an organization which would be their own, as was the case in the past, and more particularly during the national struggle."

Students Must Assume Their Responsibilities

"But the government can only take part in the solution of the problem of the UGET. It cannot be held solely responsible for it. For there are also the university authorities whose duty is to guarantee the process of free elections and by so doing, remove the students' doubts. But indeed neither the government nor the university authorities could do anything if the persons directly concerned, i.e., the students do not assume their own responsibilities, seriously, loyally and especially courageously. That is why I wish to make an appeal to the students to get rid of the doubts they have entertained in the past, so that they could speak of a democratic solution, and be wary of those behavior patterns and stands which have delayed the cause of the students, wasted their energies, and been detrimental to their interests."

Elections at the Start of the Academic Year

"I am also asking the members of this commission to start immediately a search for procedures which would solve the problem democratically and not to become lost in analyses and conjectures.

Ever since Korba, over many years and in many newspaper columns, the phenomenon has been analyzed to such a degree that it has almost been killed, and with it, the university life."

The prime minister then suggested that at the beginning of the academic year, the students should proceed to elect delegates which would be representing them with the committee which will be appointed to prepare the congress of organization. These elections must be free, and their organization might be entrusted to the Deans who are elected and by lecturers accepted voluntarily by the students.

"What I promise," Mr Mohamed Mzali also said, "is that the organization to which this congress gives birth, according to this formula or any other formula accepted by the students, will be recognized by the government as a valid partner and as a legitimate and legal representative of the students." "Where will this step lead us?" was the prime minister's next question, before declaring: either to the success of the operation, a situation which would compel us to practice the game of democracy and negotiation leading either to agreement or disagreement. In case of the latter, the dialog would have to continue, and public opinion would be called on as witness. If this attempt were to fail, unfortunately, the government would be released from its responsibility, because it would have exhausted all its possible procedures.

Be that as it may, the only way open to us in Tunisia is to become accustomed to living with a diversity of opinions which may well be supplementary as long as they are based on patriotism, national unity, the unswerving attachment to the development model freely chosen by us.

That is why the very essence of "bourguibism" is to open our minds to ideas and trends, however different they may be, and to work towards establishing by their means a platform for national struggle."

Bourguibism, Symbol of Democracy

Indeed, bourguibism has its roots in the people, and that is why it is democratic, and that is why it is so devoted to openness, to the debating of ideas, by means of dialog and far removed from sterile violence. On the other hand, ideological depth represents the surest path to increasing democracy."

This meeting was attended by Messrs Mongi Kooli, Party Leader and ministerial delegate of the prime minister, Abdelaziz Ben Dhia, minister of Higher Education and Scientific Research, Fouad Mebazaa, minister of Information and Cultural Affairs, Mansour Moalia, minister of Planning and Finances, Sadok Ben Jemaa, minister of Transportation and Communications and Mezri Chekir, head of the prime minister's Cabinet.

PRIME MINISTER PRESIDES OVER MEETING ON RELIGIOUS QUESTIONS

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 5 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] Mr Mohamed Mzali, prime minister and Party secretary general, presided at noon yesterday, over a work session whose purpose was to study religious questions. This meeting was attended in particular by Messrs Fouad Mebazaa, minister of Information and Cultural Affairs, Mohamed Frej Chedli, minister of National Education, Mezri Chekir, head of the prime minister's Cabinet, Sheikh Mohamed Habib Belkhoja, Mufti of the Republic, Mr M'hadheb Roujssi, governor and president of the Tunis District, Zakaria Ben Mustapha, mayor of the capital and Kamel Tarzi, Cult director.

On this occasion, the prime minister announced that he would be honoring on Wednesday 6 August, corresponding to 25 Ramadan, at the time of breaking the fast (Iftar), the imams who preached in the District of Tunis.

He recommended moreover that care be taken of the mosques, both with regard to the furniture and the external appearance which should be worthy of the spiritual worth of these buildings and in accordance with the directives of the Supreme Warrior who has always shown his solicitude for religious matters and is anxious to safeguard the mosques and promote the Islamic religion.

During this session, it was decided to hold a meeting, to be chaired by the prime minister, of the commission appointed a few months ago for the purpose of reforming the syllabus and the methods of teaching of the Kairouan Theology School.

Finally, the prime minister gave instructions to ban publicity regarding alcoholic beverages and tobacco, to preserve the physical and moral health of the Tunisian youth.

MOKADDEM COMMENTS ON NEW DYNAMISM IN NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Tunis DIALOGUE in French 21 Jul 80 pp 30-32

[Interview with President of the National Assembly Sadok Mokkadem by Raja el-Almi]

> [Text] On the eve of the celebration, this coming 25 July, of the 23rd anniversary of the republic, a "balance sheet" interview with the president of the national assembly--a fundamental institution of the democratic and republican system which this year has, moreover, begun its fifth session--was a "must." This was all the more true in that the method employed in the election of the nation's representatives (through the introduction of the system of expanded lists), and the agenda for the immediate future, both invite reflection. We have therefore deemed it useful to put some important questions to Dr Sadok Mokaddem.

[Question] Mr President, for the first time since independence the deputies of the National Assembly have been elected on the basis of a system prescribed by the Electoral Code: the system of expanded lists. These elections gave the citizens the opportunity to freely choose their representatives.

Has this new electoral formula resulted in the appearance--during the session now drawing to a close--of a new dynamism in the National Assembly, particularly at the level of the debates and the parliamentary committees?

[Answer] It is appropriate to note first of all that the procedure of the expanded lists has resulted in a major turnover in the membership of the National Assembly. Virtually two-thirds of the Assembly is composed of new deputies who are sitting in that body for the first time. Another important fact is the decrease in the average age of the deputies, for you cannot fail to have noted that this Assembly is much younger than the preceding one. Lastly, the deputies have in fact been eager to participate to a greater extent, both on the committees and in the plenary assemblies. It can accordingly be said that this new procedure (although we are too close to the situation to judge, and despite some negative aspects that have been noted) has certain interesting positive aspects and provides food for thought and study. There is no doubt that the voters, and public opinion, have greeted the new system with considerable interest. The voter has felt himself more involved, for the new system enables him to feel that he is participating to a greater extent in public affairs. This heightened interest on the part of the voters is, moreover, an additional incentive for the deputies to express themselves more vigorously and influence the debates. As you say, a new dynamism is beginning to manifest itself, to take shape. I believe this is a good thing. I like to say--and to reiterate--that although we have been living under a representative system we have yet to create our traditions, our customs.... That takes a long time, and a quarter of a century--in the lifetime of a nation--isn't very long... especially when the turnover in the Assembly has been on a massive scale.

[Question] It is admissible, in a democracy, for an elected representative to have complete freedom of expression--and make his point of view prevail--in Parliament. There are limits, however. Could you tell us what they are?

[Answer] Democratic dialog has its rules. The essential thing is, above all else, tolerance toward opposing views, toward others. I believe this to be the fundamental rule of all democratic activity. The exercise of the right of self-expression therefore presupposes one's agreement that others shall also enjoy the same right to express themselves with the same freedom and under the same conditions. The second rule is to hold fast to certain norms--certain rules of the game--to which one should adhere, in that they derive from one's awareness of the responsibility one assumes when participating in public affairs, in the democratic system and in democratic dialog as an elected representative of the nation or even as an ordinary citizen. One should, moreover, feel duty bound to place this dialog on a certain level by acting in such a way that it will be oriented toward the search for truth and the public interest rather than toward disruption, personal attacks and so forth. These are the only limitations, and they are, moreover, not imposed but freely accepted.

In our case--in our Assembly--we obviously adhere to an agenda. One cannot bring up every aspect of every subject. That is the only limitation. I believe, moreover, that the deputies are beginning to use this right of expression with considerable skill and conscientiousness. The merit of our system is precisely the fact that it enables all the deputies--who are a representative sample of society as a whole--to express their own views together with those currents and trends of opinion that gave birth to their respective candidacies or that relate to their respective constituencies and backgrounds...which do not necessarily correspond to the point of view of their opponents in the debate....

[Question] It's the right to be different that makes the National Assembly so valuable....

[Answer] Yes, and these differences do not prejudice the quality of the dialogue. I believe this is the most important fact. It is an example of one of the bases of the Bourguiba philosophy, which is founded on dialog and compromise--an example taken from the parliamentary milieu.

[Question] In his keynote address to the National Assembly the prime minister placed emphasis on the clarity that should prevail in the relations among the different branches of government. In particular, he declared that the exercise of power should rule out secrecy.

In what measure does this intent serve to consolidate the relations of trust that exist between the legislative branch and the executive branch?

[Answer] I believe that in order to be fair and to be faithful to historical truth, it must be said that clarity has always existed in the relations between the government and the National Assembly. There has never been any secrecy, or secret agreements, or secret clauses, of any kind; there has been, in fact, a resolute manifestation of the truth. There have been two or three debates which have dealt with basic questions. I may mention the debate on the proposed union with Libya in 1974.... There has also been a complete openness both on the part of the Assembly and on the part of the government, and the respective responsibilities have been accepted with the greatest decisiveness. The same thing was true this year following the attack on Gafsa. The government did not conceal any of the data in its possession that were useful in an evaluation of the situation, and the deputies did not fail to state their views, ask questions and attempt to cast greater light on the events. The same was also true in 1978, when the agitation that occurred in January and the subsequent attempts to incite uprisings in our country also gave rise to a very intense and profound debate concerning the matter. This is to say that on the part of Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali what has happened is neither an innovation nor a new element in the evaluation of the relations between the government and the Assembly but rather the affirmation of a situation that has always prevailed in the relations between the two branches and that constitutes the very foundation, and the guaranty, of the efficient operation of our political system--a situation which I always define as good harmony, and good coordination, among the individual cogs in the machinery of our republican system.

[Question] Mr President, the 1979-1980 parliamentary session is coming to a close. Is it possible to identify for us its strong points?

[Answer] First of all, you know that as with all the assemblies in the world the important--the essential--action of an assembly is the budget. Why is this so? Because the budget lays bare all the problems that affect the life of the nation and offers a complete panorama of those problems. The analysis of the budget requires virtually 3 months of committee meetings and plenary assemblies. And also because the budget is the basic instrument which authorizes the government to employ the means necessary to carry out its policy, particularly when it is linked to the policy of development. Through the instrumentality of the budget the complete framework of the state's activities is delineated by the joint effort of the Assembly and the government. The study of the budget is therefore the most difficult--and the most important--aspect of the session and the one that requires the greatest attention and care on the part of the deputies. A second aspect to be considered is the fact that through the medium of the cooperation agreements and international accords the whole of our foreign policy is evoked and gives rise--in the National Assembly--to debates with the government that are most valuable and most interesting. Problems also arise that relate to security, public order and the law. Substantial changes have been made in certain codes, as occurred this year in the case of the Civil and Commercial Code of Procedures, the penal code, and everything that relates to social security. These are very important problems to which the Assembly has accorded a great deal of attention.

[Question] The Gafsa incident demonstrated that national unity has been strengthened. What do you think can be done to consolidate this unity further?

[Answer] You know, it is my belief that the consolidation of national unity is a continuing task--a constant effort that should basically take into account not only the evolution of the mentality of our citizens but also the profound changes our society is undergoing as a result of its development. These changes are the consequences of development--consequences that are known and predictable but that are inevitable. They involve the generalization of education, the elevation of our standard of living, the number of dwellings that have been constructed, the social guarantees that have been granted--all of which serves to create among the citizens, in a general way, a somewhat different and changing vision the importance of which must be grasped precisely, in order that their decisions may be adapted to the maintenance of national unity. It is therefore not a matter of something sacrosanct before which one bows down or venerates because it is something sacred, something mysterious. It is instead a constant effort, a daily effort. I would almost say it is a state of mind, a mentality, that should prevail--especially among officials, at whatever level of responsibility they function. It is a continuing quest, an effort that is constantly renewed--a kind of dynamism for every moment. What you have here is the process of developing political awareness, the political maturation, the ferment, that is taking place in our society--for our society is indeed in the process of maturing. It is the gestation of a new social and economic order--gestation which is, very fortunately, taking place under good conditions despite some minor disturbances. It is a process of gestation that is nonetheless taking place: our society is giving birth to something new. This is the gamble that President Bourguiba has taken, that the party has taken. In one of his speeches the president said that after the attainment of independence in some countries the status quo had been preserved, with no effort being made to democratize education, to facilitate access by all social classes to education, to instruction, to responsibilities--primarily for the sake of having peace. It is a vision, however, that did prevail in certain countries for a time but ended in an explosion. Here in Tunisia the president and the party took a gamble, with all the risks it entailed, and they did so consciously. We are witnessing a profound transformation in our society--a transformation that was anticipated and that will give birth to a new society, which Medi Nouira has called the "Middle Society." I believe we shall achieve a social system that will satisfy the aspirations of the young people who raise their eyes toward the heavens, toward the future: who scrutinize the future to see what will become of them, how their destiny will evolve, with all the attendant social and economic implications and also all the constraints--the constraints of employment, the constraints of investment, and so on--which are often very severe. All of this, however, is the risk that democracy and development entail.

[Question] The country is about to begin preparation of the Sixth Plan for economic and social development. How does the National Assembly propose to participate effectively in this preparation?

[Answer] Participation in the preparation of the Sixth Plan is taking place on several levels. There are the preliminary phases, which are now in the process of implementation and in which the deputies are participating in different individual capacities, either through their national organizations or through their sectorial committees. Their participation is therefore a fact. The Assembly is already present in the person of these elements, who are participating as individuals or as representatives of their respective organizations. Once the bill has taken shape there will be committees on which deputies will also serve. It is when the draft of the bill is completed that the Assembly will take formal charge of it, for in the final analysis the draft plan will become a law--an executory law--which will to some extent follow the same process as all laws.

RETIREMENT FUND FOR PROFESSIONALS--Yesterday morning Mohamed Ennaceur, minister of social affairs, received in his office a delegation representing the boards of directors of the councils of the Order of Physicians, Pharmacists, and Architects, and of the National Union of General Insurance Agents. The discussions dealt with extending the retirement system to members of the liberal professions. Mohamed Ennaceur informed the delegation members that the retirement plan is currently under study by the ministry and that an expert of the International Labor Office (ILO) is examining the question. The beneficiaries of this system will choose the formula best adapted to their situation. Furthermore, the delegation informed the minister of a plan for the establishment of a national liberal professions union. A provisional community has been set up to this effect. Its mission will be to facilitate coordination with the Ministry of Social Affairs with a view to extending the old age, disability, and survivor benefits to the liberal professions. AOSARIO OPEN LETTER TO AFRICAN HEADS OF STATE

[Text] The Movement of the Natives of Saguiet Al Hamra and of Rio de Oro (AOSARIO) sent an open letter to all the African heads of state in the framework of the next meeting of the Committee of the Wise Men, which will meet shortly in Africa. Here is the complete text of that letter:

Open letter to Their Excellencies the African Heads of State with a copy for information to their ministers of Foreign Affairs,

Excellencies,

At a time when all eyes are turned toward the occurrence of the future meeting of the Committee of the Wise Men, which will have to debate the so-called "Sahara formerly under Spanish domination" problem, the AOSARIO appeals to the sense of responsibility and to the conscience of the African leaders, asking them to situate the debate in its proper context, even to consider it--which is actually the case--under the conflictual angle which sees opposed our mother country, Morocco, and the Algerian Republic, which by its intentions and its tendencies toward expansionism and hegemonism has deliberately sacrificed the life, the destiny and the future of our people now held captive on Algerian soil.

Permit us to recall briefly to all the African leaders that historic moment when the creation of the "Polisario" was decided upon in 1974 in Algiers under the most artificial conditions.

It was indeed after the first movement of liberation born in the Sahara against the occupant--a movement whose offices were located in Algeria until the end of 1974--had refused to play the role of a puppet in the service of Algiers, that the leaders in power in the country had recourse to that dilatory maneuver. A maneuver which was to permit them to carry out their pact with the Francoist authorities on political and economic concessions, which were themselves based on the respective interests of the two heads of state.

It was in accordance with this secret pact made known after the death of Franco, that the Algerian leaders tried from the month of June 1975 to place their troops in strategic positions located in the Sahara, particularly Amgala, Mahbes, Guelta Zemmour, as well as in several forts along the lines which link these bridgeheads; in addition the confrontation at the places cited between Algerian troops and Royal Army Forces had revealed this maneuver on which Algiers was counting to quietly replace the colonial forces in place.

The Overwhelming Evidence

In order to avoid hasty and unfounded positions and for the purpose of allowing international and African opinion to be informed in particular, the AOSARIO has drawn up a paper which will be placed in the hands of Amnesty International, the Committee of the Wise Men and all the appropriate international authorities. This paper is supported by the testimony of dozens of our brothers who have fled the camps set up in the great Algerian south, telling of the conditions of imprisonment of our people, the barbarous and inhumane treatment inflicted daily upon them, the physical liquidations, the collective and systematic massacres of which all who refused to play the Algerian game and submit were victims.

Active Solidarity with Morocco

Other peoples have also witnessed deportations and the taking as hostages of hundreds of members of our tribes by the Algerian army at the time it fell back from positions it was occupying on our soil before the arrival of troops of the Royal Armed Forces.

In the face of these serious events witnessed by the African northwest, in the face of that truth travestied by the Algerian-Libyan coalition, which cares only about its own hegemonic interests, African leaders have an obligation to use every effort to safeguard the principles of African solidarity and fraternity. A solidarity and fraternity which must be based unconditionally on ideological or clan contingencies. On that point we can affirm--without fear of contradiction--that if the African peoples are divided into states and nations, it is nevertheless true that they remain one and the same family, a family which, despite great ethnic and cultural diversity, forms a single mosaic in which each individual must find his own place.

We ourselves are persuaded that the African leaders will examine our case, a living Calvary for our brothers and sisters on Algerian soil, with great lucidity and with that great wisdom which is known to be theirs. We do not doubt, moreover, that the interests of our mother country, Morocco, will be protected against all partiality and injustice.

A retrospective of the last 3 decades of history can only lead the African leaders to realize that it is precisely the courageous attitude of our people and that of their sovereign, their authentically militant solidarity adopted with respect to the Algerian people struggling for their independence, which has caused the process of decolonialization undertaken by Spain in accordance with our country's wishes in these regions of the south to stop mid-way and this was done in a unilateral and arbitrary way by that same Spain which had just returned to Morocco Tarfaya and its region, which was followed by the return of Ifni.

A Single Family

These historical facts, as well as those concerning a legal precedent, explain why the principle of the inviolability of the colonial frontiers according to the OAU cannot be applied specifically to the case of Morocco in the matter of the process of decolonialization involving the regions of the south. One cannot refer to historical references without being obliged to recall, moreover, that all the peoples of the Sahara who were formerly under Spanish domination are from a generological and ethnological point of view only parts of mother tribes, established since time immemorial within the mother country, Morocco. The profound reasons which have provoked that hostility on the part of Spain are due to the pressure from the former colonial powers and are aimed directly at Morocco and its people, who have never faltered in their unconditional support of the Algerian FLN.

It must be noted that if the Moroccan people and their sovereign had agreed to accept the colonial arguments by refusing, because of them, to grant refuge bases to the Algerian fighters, there can be no doubt that no pressure would have been exerted on Spain. Pressure advising it at the time to halt a process of decolonialization, which would have inevitably led several years ago to giving back the Sahara to the mother country, Morocco.

Scorn for International Conventions

Must it be recalled that it is thanks to the political, diplomatic and military support of Morocco that the colonial maneuver of France, which attempted to create an independent state in the Algerian Sahara, was thwarted. Thanks also to the solidarity of the African countries certain "rump" states, which were to be created on purpose, never came into existence (Biafra, Katanga, Cabinda...) and thus was avoided the Balcanization of Africa. And we, authentic native peoples of the Sahara formerly under Spanish domination, are being tortured in camps by the Algerian leaders, in scorn of international law and African fraternity. Torture, massacres and deportation of our families are utilized for hegemonic purposes by that country. We deplore strongly the scorning on the part of Algerian leaders of international conventions, these leaders who have until now refused to take a census, as required by the Geneva Convention, of our brothers held on their soil, just as they have refused to receive any international commission whose role would be to authenticate the native peoples of the Sahara formerly under Spanish domination.

We also deplore the fact that tens of thousands of Malians, of Chadians, of Nigerians, of Mauritanians and of Algerian Sahraouis are shown in Tindouf in showcase camps as being native peoples of our region and constituting a storehouse of subversion for the countries of that region.

The AOSARIO movement which brings together MOREHOB, the first liberation movement born in the Sahara, the PUNS [Sahraoui National Union Party], the FLU [Front for Liberation and Unity] and the Jemaa, all of whom are petitioning the United Nations, express the hope of seeing the African heads of state discriminate between lies and truth in the face of a coalition of Algerian-Libyan interests, of which all africa is fully aware.

AOSARIO SECRETARY GENERAL DISCUSSES ORGANIZATION'S ROLE

Rabat L'OPINION in French 31 Jul 80 pp 1, 3

[Interview with Mr Ahmed Rachid, secretary of AOSARIO by M. T.--date and place unknown]

> [Text] The secretary general of the AOSARIO, Ahmed Ould Rachid, declares in an exclusive interview with L'OPINION: It is necessary to combat and eliminate the harmful activities of the enemy's fifth column.
> Toward the intensification of AOSARIO military action.
>
> The time having come, the historic movements--that is the MOREHOB [expansion unknown], the PUNS [Sahraoui National Union Party], the FLU [Front for Liberation and Unity], and the Jemaa and the AOSARIO--will testify before African and international authorities.
> More than 7,000 regular Mauritanian troops assigned by the Nouakchott regime to the ranks of the mercenaries in service of Algerian hegemonism.
> In a declaration published exclusively in L'OPINION, the secretary general of the AOSARIO explains his organization, its structure and its program for the immediate future.

In answer to the request to define the AOSARIO, Mr Ahmed Rachid emphasizes the fact that his movement has its legitimacy in the necessity to demystify and counteract the allegations of the Algerian mercenaries and to prove, in particular, that our Sahraoui brothers are being held captive in Tindouf.

The moment having come, adds the secretary general of the AOSARIO, the historic movements having struggled against Spanish colonialism and having defended the territorial integrity of the mother country, Morocco, that is, the MOREHOB, the Sahraoi National Union Party (PUNS), the Front for Liberation and Unity (FLU) and the Jemaa will testify before African and international authorities, just as they had already done in 1975 and 1976 before the United Nations.

Mr Ahmed Rachid points our further that it is up to our government, and to it alone, to draw the conclusions which are imposed by past events and those to come.

A Single Struggle

Concerning the role that the AOSARIO ought to fill, he pointed out that it was part of the great struggle led by the Moroccan people in support of their sovereign. "Because, if the uniforms are different, it is nevertheless true that the end result is the same, that is, the struggle against the enemies of our integrity and of our national unity."

"For us," adds Mr Ahmed Rachid, "our country and our people must remain vigilant, more than ever, in order to--not only--oppose the foreign enemy, but also to combat and thwart the harmful activities of that fifth column which is acting openly and is benefiting from a certain immunity which permits it to operate in relative peace."

"I cite, for example," adds the secretary general of the AOSARIO, certain Mauritanians whom we meet, as we travel around to Dakar and other places, and who, strangely, denigrate our accomplishments, while they benefit from considerable advantages right here in Morocco."

To the question of the AOSARIO'S views and future actions, Mr Ahmed Rachid reminds us that the AOSARIO is being used to complete the implantation of the organizational infrastructure in Europe as well as in Africa, and has laid the groundwork for more active cooperation with the international movements and organizations which share its convictions.

Pan-Africanism, Pan-Arabism and Pan-Islamism

"It was for that purpose," Mr Ahmed Rachid adds, "that the AOSARIO met in Paris with Mr al-Bitar, the former Syrian prime minister and co-founder of the Baas Party, 1 week before his assasination by the henchmen of Hafed Al Assad and his brother. Mr al-Bitar was chairing a delegation which, along with other African and European leaders and officials, participated in drawing up a charter intended to promote Pan-Islamism, Pan-Africanism and Pan-Arabism.

"All these organizations," adds Mr Rachid, "have assured the AOSARIO of their full support and have, together, rendered a vibrant homage to the actions of the late king, Mohammed V and to his worthy successor, Hassan II, and that was done for the good of all our peoples who are affected by those actions. These organizations have, in addition, assured our movement of their active and militant support."

Intensified Action

"Our action," the secretary general of the AOSARIO added, "followed by great attention on the part of African leaders, will be intensified and extended to the whole of the continent."

Recalling what President Senghor revealed recently concerning the racist aspect of the Algerian mercenaries, Mr Ahmed Rachid points out that "the president of Senegal has laid bare the nature of a policy that the Algerians modeled after those of Hitler."

Algiers Accused

"Taking into consideration our contacts with "Amnesty International" and certain humanitarian organizations, under the United Nations," adds the secretary general of the AOSARIO, "the massacres ordered by Algiers of Black Mauritanians and Senegalese, as well as hundreds of our brothers and sisters held prisoner on Algerian soil, taking into consideration these contacts we can state that international opinion has decided to judge severely the genocide that Algiers is guilty of. It is in that context that the AOSARIO is preparing a legal dossier which will confound the criminals and show the facts of the genocide based on irrefutable testimony."

On the military level, Mr Ahmed Rachid claims that "it is not impossible, it is even probable that the AOSARIO will intensify and extend its military action to regions where our brothers and sisters are held prisoner." "The action itself," points our Mr Ahmed Rachid, "might possibly take the form of reprisals against all those who would dare interfere in our domestic affairs and especially against those who might try to use our destiny for hegemonic ends."

"I point out," says the secretary general of the AOSARIO, "that the indigenous peoples of the Sahara will never exchange their Moroccan heritage for Algerian welfare."

Mauritanian Provocations

In conclusion, Mr Ahmed Rachid denounces the provocative role played by certain Mauritanian officials, of which the latest provocation against our country was the placing at the disposition of the mercenaries in the pay of the Algerian government of 7,000 troops of the regular Mauritanian army.

ARAB LEAGUE UN ENVOY ON JERUSALEM, U.S. RELATIONS

LD080855 London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 29 Aug 80 pp 22-23

[Interview of Arab League UN Ambassador Dr Clovis Maqsud by 'Muhammad 'Abd al-Mawla in Washington--date not given]

[Excerpt] Some 4 weeks ago the UN General Assembly held a special session to discuss the Palestinian issue and adopted basic resolutions in favor of the Palestinian people and the PLO. Two weeks ago, the UN Security Council held an emergency session to discuss Israeli Decision to annex Arab Jerusalem to Israel.

Irrespective of the results of the Security Council debate, Arab diplomatic efforts will not stop, as Arab League UN Ambassador Dr Clovis Maqsud has told AL-HAWADITH. The Arabs will use all ways and means provided by the international organization to achieve their aims, be they diplomatic, economic or military.

I asked Ambassador Maqsud in his Washington office: But who is to implement these sanctions or military measures?

He replied: The Arabs, of course. The United Nations approves of punishing Israel.

I said: The American representatives at the General Assembly said that the Arabs will not secure the votes of two-thirds of the General Assembly matters if they seek to freeze Israel's membership.

He answered: We guarantee two-thirds of the votes, because the majority of world states are with the Arabs.

I said: Do you believe that the Jerusalem problem will restore Egypt to the Arab camp? Could it be a reason for Egypt to abandon Camp David?

He said: Basically, Israel regarded Camp David as an authorization to continue with its obstinate policy. Since Camp David Israel has intensified the construction of settlements and expanded the existing ones, annexed Jerusalem and persisted in its barbaric attacks on south Lebanon. This means that Camp David is more an American achievement than a Middle Eastern one. Regarding the second part of the question, a change will occur in Egypt and Egypt will resume its natural Arab role.

When we moved on to discuss the American election, I asked Dr Maqsud: In your opinion, who is better for Arab causes: Carter or Reagan?

He answered: Both of them are bad. If the Arabs wish to overthrow one of the candidates, they have only to say that they support him.

Dr Maqsud then spoke about Israel's disregard of all international laws. He said: Israel is a state which has never had a sense of responsibility for its actions. This is a very odd situation.

I said: What about the Arabs' respect for America's interests and America's disrespect of Arab interests?

Dr Maqsud replied: There is an extensive Arab awareness that it is no longer permissible to meet America's demands unless America meets Arab demands. If America has interests, so do the Arabs. The last meeting between King Khalid and President Saddam Husayn on Jerusalem emphasized the aforementioned fact not only with regard to America but also with regard to world states. The decision to take a unified stand against every state that recognizes Jerusalem as Israel's capital is an indication that the Arabs have begun to couple words with deeds. The fact is that the equation between America's insistence on fulfilling its economic requirements and its disregard of crucial Arab interests cannot go on. This equation must be balanced through more dialog, mutual understanding and frankness, without convulsions and by further study of all the legitimate Arab demands. That we should fulfill their demands while they deny ours is also an abnormal situation.

[Question] Is this a genuine posture or just mere words?

[Answer] Arab convictions have begun to crystallize in the behavior of the Arab governments. This was apparent recently when the IMF attempts to reject PLO's admission as an observer and Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and the UAE responded by suspending their contributions. We are now open to dialog, but not a one-way dialog.

[Question] Is this a warning that the Arab League is addressing to the world?

[Answer] Developments demand that the Arabs adopt serious stands. We do not warn; we draw attention. True, we have problems and we talk, but the people have begun to think and talk. Sometimes in the past, we used to think of a subject but not announce it. Sometimes we announce a stand but do not act on it. The process of coupling words with deeds has now begun.

[Question] Why did the Arabs react to the European initiative the way they did?

[Answer] The European proposals are a positive step but not precise. If it represents a final European stand, then it is unacceptable. But if it constitutes a step and a beginning, then we approve of it. The European representative now visiting the area will submit his report. This means that the Europeans will be reconsidering their stance. Therefore, we cannot say that the Europeans' Venice proposals were final.

[Question] Let us suppose that the Europeans' Venice stance is the first step: should not the Arabs encourage them in this direction in order to strengthen their position vis-a-vis the United States?

[Answer] As far as Europe is concerned, the basic factor is recognition of the PLO. Have the Europeans come up with an equation stipulating that the PLO must participate in the peace discussions? The European position is ambiguous. Israel's record proves that it always interprets ambiguities in a manner that serves its occupation and expansion. The European initiative is a fine gesture, but the way it was produced is bad. We hope it will be reporduced in a better manner. We are neither negative nor positive; our position depends on the results.

[Question] Should not the Europeans recognize the PLO as a result of the Common Market's recent mission?

[Answer] If they fail to do so, the Europeans must be wasting a historic opportunity, because they will not have carried out their convictions.

[Interview given to AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM by Philippe (Rondeau), director of the Middle East Section of the French Center for International Political Studies and Research, in Paris--date not given]

[Excerpt] [Question] What is your assessment of the current situation in the Middle East?

[Answer] It must be said that the peace process in the Middle East has now reached an impasse, especially in relation to the Egyptian-Israeli autonomy talks. It is internationally recognized that these talks have failed. The recent Israeli measure annexing the city of Jerusalem demonstrates clearly and definitely the extent of Israel's obstinacy and defiance of all international principles and laws, which make illegal Israel's measures to Judaize and annex Jerusalem its military occupation of the holy city in 1967.

Meanwhile, I am certain that President al-Sadat is aware of the failure of the Egyptian-Israeli talks. Al-Sadat, however, continues to pin hopes on the peace process which he has initiated with Israel, because he does not wish to admit the erroneousness of this process which started with the Camp David agreements and the separate Egyptian-Israeli peace accord. Peace in the Middle East can be achieved only by Arab consensus, because the Palestinian issue concerns all the Arab states.

It is also clear that the situation in the Middle East has reached an impasse because the United States, which can exert pressure on Israel, is now preoccupied with the Presidential election and is therefore giving secondary attention to the Middle East. Also, the focus of international attention, especially in the United States, the country which is primarily concerned with the peace process in the area, has shifted to the Iranian-American diplomatic crisis. By its present policy, Israel is trying to complicate matters and increase tension in the area while it continues to defy the international will, deny the Palestinian people's rights which have been recognized by the international community, and disregard the principles of human rights.

[Question] In your capacity as a politician who has been following the developments in the Middle East, what in your opinion is the way out of the impasse which the Middle East peace process has reached?

[Answer] I believe that the Middle East crisis must be resolved through comprehensive international participation in the peace efforts by putting the Middle East issue before an international conference in which the United States, the Soviet Union, Europe and all the parties concerned with the Arab-Israeli conflict will participate under UN supervision. We are now living in an age of international solidarity and no one state, however strong and mighty, has the right to monopolize the responsibility of mediating to resolve such a complex issue as the Middle East: This issue concerns the entire international community, in view of the fact that the whole world's future depends on the fate of the Middle East area, with its political and economic importance to the world. It is true that the United States is the only country which can exert direct pressure on Israel to follow the road to peace. Therefore, Washington must pressure the Tel Aviv government and participate with the international community in the international diplomatic efforts to ensure stability and security in the Middle East and throughout the world. Everybody is aware that, if the Soviet Union remains outside the peace efforts in the Middle East, it has the means to frustrate any settlement achieved in the area without its participation, because Soviet influence exists in the area whether Washington likes it or not.

[Question] What role can Europe play in the MIddle East peace efforts?

[Answer] If we review the history of events in the Middle East from 1947 through French President Giscard d'Estaing's visit to the Arab area last March, we will find out that Europe used to be content to comment and express views on the settlement plans put forward by the United States for a peaceful settlement in the area. I believe, however, that the statements President Giscard made during his Arab tour are regarded as a historic turning point in the European Middle East role, especially because all the European Common Market member states supported the settlement principles voiced by the French president: the need for Israeli withdrawal from the Arab territories occupied in 1967, for the Palestinian people to have the right to determine their own fate, and for PLO participation in the diplomatic efforts in the area. The European community has agreed to contribute to the achievement of these principles. This is a very positive situation, because some of the European states which adopted these principles previously opposed PLO participation in the international efforts. This European change constitutes support for the Arab cause in international diplomatic circles. European envoy Thorn's tour of the Arab capitals will add strength to this European stance. The day must come for the European community to take an effective diplomatic initiative to contribute to the establishment of a comprehensive, just peace. The European stand must have an impact on Europe's ally, the United States, which must eventually adopt the same attitude as Europe to the principles of a peaceful, just settlement in the Middle East. What I wish to say is that Europe, in its moves regarding the Middle East, is pursuing quiet diplomacy which requires intensive contacts with the parties to the Arab-Israeli conflict before defining the basis of the European initiative, which I believe will one day emerge strong and clear and bring the Middle East crisis back to an international conference to establish the necessary international guarantees for peace between the Arabs and Israel.

EMIGRATION OF ARAB FINANCIERS FOLLOWS THAT OF ARAB CAPITAL

'AL HAWADITH' Detects New Phenomenon

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Jul 80 p 65

[Text] Because Arab oil is considered by those who have it and by the world to be a universal commodity, it is natural that oil funds, or more accurately, surplus oil funds should become global funds roaming the capital markets abroad in search of security, profit or trade. Arab banks would not have been able to accommodate this sudden activity had not Beirut been an advanced center for banking, technical services and business before the oil surge. Beirut had thus acquired a world-wide reputation which it did not lose despite the destructive war. Other European and Arab capitals were not able to take Beirut's place.

Recently, more specifically since the war in Lebanon began, a new phenomenon has emerged: banks and bankers are now moving to the international centers of capital, whereas in the past only capital moved. Some people are saying that this phenomenon is damaging, because it is stripping the Arab world of necessary expertise, and tempting those who have capital to move away from their homelands, thereby depriving these homelands of investment and development opportunities. But other people are saying that this prevents foreigners from carrying out the plunder and the exploitation they used to carry out.

Now that this phenomenon has been established and has become an existing fact, AL-HAWADITH thought it would be appropriate to shed some light on this phenomenon, regardless of its pros and cons and regardless of who its heroes are and what people think of them. This will be the beginning of a journalistic assignment that will in the future assume the character of a meticulous scientific inquiry. AL-HAWADITH met with Dr Bashir al-Zuhayri, Sabih Shukri, 'Ali al-Jammal and 'Abd-al-Karim al-Mudarris. This special supplement is [the result of these interviews]; it is the first in a series of its kind.

Views of Bashir al-Zuhayri

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Jul 80 p 69

[Text] Financial experts estimate that at the end of 1979 oil exporting countries had 200 billion dollars in assets outside the Arab world. They are saying that the conditions which were created by the revolution in Iran--conditions which shrivelled the volume of development projects in these countries--will increase those assets another 100 billion dollars. Those people add, "About 70 percent of these assets which are considered surplus oil money belongs to the countries of the gulf and especially Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates. The amount of these assets which are owned by individuals does not exceed 15 percent, but it does constitute huge accumulations of capital, especially if the population is compared to the amount of these assets."

This situation raises an inevitable question: Where do the Arabs invest their money, and what sectors do they prefer in investment operations? Dr Bashir al-Zuhayri, director of the Arab-European Bank Group in London, says:

"There are Arab investments owned by governments and placed by funds created by these governments; and there are private Arab investments. We must in fact distinguish between these two kinds of investments. Investments that assume a governmental character and constitute a monetary surplus revert to the oil producing countries. Since 1979 statistics have not yet been issued, 1978 statistics did shed some light on the distribution of these investments.

"There are, first, capital investments in international markets, that is, the funds that are in circulation in the capital market--Euromarket. It is estimated that these funds are around 60 billion dollars.

"Second, there are direct investments in the United States, that is, the investments that are made in securities, in investment certificates and in treasury notes. These are usually issued by major banks and purchased by Arab countries that have a surplus when these countries invest part of their capital in U.S. markets. Third, there are direct investments in the industrial countries, that is, a number of Arab countries that have surplus funds are investing part of their capital in shares in major industrial corporations or in joint industrial organizations. For example, shares in the Mercedes Corporation were purchased, and recently Libya purchased shares in the Fiat Automobile Company. Other investments are also made in various sectors. It has been estimated that these investments amount to about 35 billion dollars.

"Fourth, there are loans and aid to developing countries: about 20 billion dollars have already been offered. There are also capital contributions for developing the international development organizations such as the international food funds or the organizations that are affiliated with IBRD. These contributions are estimated at about 12 billion dollars. This sum constitutes the trends that Arab government investments abroad [seem to be taking].

"In return for the joy which the western world feels for its success in luring Arab oil funds to Europe, much criticism is being leveled against these methods of investment. Among such critical remarks, for example, [are the following]: Why are the Arabs investing their capital in dollars when the dollar is in such decline in money markets world-wide? Why don't the Arabs resort to the "currency basket" method? Why don't the Arabs invest in the Arab countries? Dr al-Zuhayri says, "Arab countries sell their oil for dollars; oil contracts are concluded in dollars. When the proceeds of these contracts are collected, these proceeds are in dollars and not in another currency. To protect themselves from currency fluctuations, the Arab countries resorted to--and the world market is still experiencing such fluctuations--diversifying their foreign currency reserves and investments. They began to convert the dollar to other currencies like the pound sterling and the Deutschmark. Thus they gradually formed a kind of currency basket. There is another example: A loan was agreed upon between Saudi Arabia and West Germany. This kind of investment indicates that Arab investments are being diversified.

"Contrary to what is being rumored, I do not believe that pressures are being made on the Arab countries to deposit their funds in specific countries; rather, the funds go where the depositor's interests lie and especially where there are obvious changes in interest rates. If we were to take the last two months as an example, we would see that the interest rates in dollars had risen to 16 percent, and an inclination to invest in dollars emerged. This is because the interest rate is rewarding and beneficial. But to counter this investment in dollars were the dangers that arose as a result of the fluctuations in the other foreign currencies which did not raise interest rates. Deposits were then made wherever payment contracts were to be found, that is, when the Arab countries had obligations to pay for industrial equipment, for basic foods or for any purchases. If these contracts were made in dollars, funds for making those payments had to be deposited in dollars. In this case, the depositor would not assume responsibility for fluctuations in the exchange rates for that currency. It is for this reason that I do not believe there are political pressures, but there are agreements and mutual interests between the Arab countries and the advanced industrial countries.

"There are, of course, conflicting opinions in the hallways of capitalists' chambers around the future of Arab investments and especially Arab deposits. Questions are being raised earnestly about the future of deposits, especially after President Carter froze Iranian funds. It is being said that political intervention in this area has weakened the depositor's confidence in those banks that complied with the measure. Afterwards there was a movement to expand Arab banks so as to create the proper technology that would oversee the growing Arab deposits. The danger to Arab deposits emerged not too long ago when a movement appeared in the meetings of presidents of western banks to draw up a special policy for lending money to developing countries, and the Arab countries are, of course, among them. What does this mean? If this policy is drawn up, it will ultimately mean that it will affect development projects in the Arab world.

"If these countries were to declare, for example, that the loans they will make will be a certain percentage of the capital or of the deposits available in banks, this would mean that the ability to lend money would be determined by this policy, and the countries that will be affected by this policy are the countries that borrow money. These countries need the loans to complete existing projects they have; they need the loans for development operations; for settling a temporary deficit in the balance of payments, or for guaranteeing that basic materials are imported.

"In western countries all this leads to an increase in the quantity of currency that remains uninvested. When this quantity of currency grows, interest rates can be manipulated. When interest rates fall, Arab deposits will be substantially affected. It is this situation that proposes anew the need to create an Arab money market and the need to create Arab financial institutions that specialize in lending operations and in utilizing this interest to benefit Arab interests on the one hand and the interests of Arab investors, on the other."

Views of Sabih Shukri

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Jul 80 pp 73-74

[Text] It is difficult to keep track of the figures as they move on the telex or on the teleprinter. It is even difficult to explain the reasons why these figures change. During the past 15 months billions of dollars have been transferred from the gulf and from Saudi Arabia to Europe. Although it is difficult to determine the amount of these funds, one of the directors of foreign banks in London's financial district, the City, says, "During the first few months of 1979 billions of dollars were taken out of the Middle East and sent to Europe to settle in European banks. After the shock of 1974 [officials in] European banks are no longer astonished when billions of dollars are suddenly moved. That was the time when the cry that was heard in financial and political circles was this: 'What will the Arabs do with their surplus funds' as a result of the fact that oil prices had been doubled?"

If it is difficult to tabulate the real sums of money that are leaving their Arab homeland permanently or temporarily, it is also difficult to pinpoint the single basic reason [for this phenomenon]. Is it the revolution of Iran? Is it the threatened stability in the area and the subsequent intervention of the Soviets in Afghanistan? Or is it the inability of Arab and even international banks in that area to accommodate this surplus? Are these funds being sent to Europe for investment purposes in the form of world-wide loans or what? Before all this [happened], what role did Arab banks play to attract this surplus? The flow of Arab funds to the magic safes in Europe has not stopped. The overflow of funds was sent to the United States and then eastward to South Korea, to Japan and sometimes to Hong Kong. The world is now experiencing the phenomenon of Arab funds without regional or international identities leaving their homeland. This immigrant who needs no passport, no entrance visa and no multi-colored luggage has caused a strange madness in Europe that is still in its initial stages. According to one of the financial experts, the catastrophe has been delayed and no one knows whom it will hit. Will it hit Europe which is receiving the immigrant with an ardent embrace, or will it hit the immigrant's country? What is important is the fact that there are many questions that need answers. We had the following interview with Sabih Shukri, the leading figure in Arab banks in London (as the financial city calls him) and the executive director of the Allied Arab Bank.

[Question] You had advised the late 'Abd-al-Hamid Shuman, the founder of the Arab Bank to open a branch of the Arab Bank in London. You gave him this advice before the June war. He followed your advice, and you did [in fact] open a branch in London in 1972. What is the reason that made you predict that Arab surplus funds will be unexpectedly large after the Ramadan [October] war in 1973 so as to make Arab banks in particular seek those funds in Europe itself?

[Answer] The story began when I was director of al-Rafidin Bank in London. I returned to Jordan late in 1965 as director of the same bank in Amman, and I was in Jordan during the 1967 war. After a careful reading of all the circumstances surrounding the area, and especially the oil crisis and the fear and anxiety that developed therefrom in the world's banking and financial circles as a result of the interruption of oil resources and the closing of the Suez Canal, it became evident to me that oil resources will become the principal question for the world with regard to the Middle East region. Therefore, I thought that all Arab financial institutions should prepare themselves to establish their special presence in world markets so that they would be ready to accommodate the surplus Arab funds in the future. It is coincidental in this regard that I was able to establish the foundations of the bank in 1972 so it would ready for operations early in 1973.

[Question] A few years later you took another step that was more courageous and more comprehensive. You established an independent bank in London in particular. This was not a branch as had been customary. Why did you take this step?

[Answer] It was the same logic that required that this step be made. At that time I thought that instead of having branches of banking institutions outside the Arab countries, there should be Arab banking establishments whose main office and centers were outside the Arab world. These banks could serve as a bridge to connect Arab markets to the present market in London on the basis of the fact that London was their universal center. Currency conversion and investment decisions would thus be more flexible and subject to more liberal conditions with universal guarantees. Such decisions would not be restricted by the political and economic restraints in the Arab countries, and such establishments would be more beneficial than others for Arab financial investments.

[Question] Arab banks then began to be established quickly, and they began to grow quickly. What were the early days of these banks like, or if you will, the branches of these banks?

[Answer] As far as I know the first Arab bank was established in England in 1954. This was a branch of al-Rafidin Bank, which is the bank of the Iraqi government. Afterwards, Arab banks began to establish branches in Britain first and then in the rest of Europe. I do not remember that a bank began operating in Europe before that date.

[Question] Why weren't Arab banks established in Europe before that date?

[Answer] The reason, I think, is that Arab banks in the Arab countries themselves were not major establishments with technical capabilities that would enable them to establish branches in Europe. Al-Rafidin Bank was an exception. Then the Arab Bank was established after it. Al-Rafidin Bank established a branch in London only. I believe that the Arab Bank established a branch in Switzerland and then one in Germany early in the sixties.

[Question] Banks proliferated afterwards. Can it be said that the Ramadan [October] war and the sudden fortunes that were produced by oil were the reason for the proliferation of Arab banks?

[Answer] Yes, after the Ramadan war Arab banks that were governmental and national began to grow in Europe. Arab banks also began to participate in European and world banks such as the UBAF Bank, the Arab Bank and the Allied Arab Bank which was established on a British foundation with Arab funds and Arab management. Attempts were then made in the United States to establish Arab banks there. Zionist resistance, however, was so strong that these attempts were thwarted. It was around this time that the International Saudi Arabian Bank was established in 1974-1975.

[Question] Was the establishment of these banks the result of the development of banking business in the Arab world or was it the result of the increased activity of Arab investments in particular?

[Answer] Of course it was the result of the increased investment activity of Arab funds and not the result of the development of the banking business. There is no doubt that Arab banking activity has undergone unexpected growth and prosperity. The evidence for this is the emergence of joint Arab banking institutions.

[Question] Have these banks been able to accommodate Arab investments and surplus Arab funds?

[Answer] No, not even a small portion of those funds. This is because Arab investments are still going to foreign banks for many reasons, perhaps the most important of them is the fact that Arabs do not have absolute confidence in Arab establishments, that is, relative to their confidence in foreign banking establishments.

[Question] Some people are saying that the flow of Arab funds into foreign banks is part of a plan that is almost a conspiracy against those funds. Iran has learned a lesson from depositing its funds in foreign banks.

[Answer] I have no knowledge of a conspiracy of this kind; but wherever there is money, and especially Arab money in this amount, there would be rumors. It is natural, however, for Arab organizations to deal with Arab investors with [a measure of] sincerity that is consistent with public interests.

[Question] The existence of Arab banks abroad makes them subject to the laws and regulations of the host countries. A law was issued in Britain last year that determined license grades for foreign banks. Parliament gave the Bank of England the authority to implement this law with regard to issuing bank licenses and monitoring [bank activities]. What objective does the legislator have for enacting such a law?

[Answer] I believe that the British legislator intended [to achieve] many goals. Among those goals is that of ascertaining that these banks which are doing business in England are sound and solid regardless of their nationality and the extent of their ability to do business in a proper manner that is consistent with the British economy, with the money market in London and with London's position in the world. The British legislator also sought to limit the proliferation of banks in Britain and to select the best banks by means of these restraints. It is for this reason that the law established three license grades. The first grade is determined by granting the bank a full mandate and full recognition; that bank is called a recognized bank. The second grade means granting the bank a specific license to accept deposits. On this basis such a bank has to refer to the Bank of England when it makes foreign exchange transactions and when it participates in international loans. Banks that are fully recognized do not require such a measure. Third grade banks include financial institutions that have no right to call themselves banks; instead, they are called financial corporations or financial institutions.

This makes it evident that the legislator, which is the Bank of England, had intended for the first grade banks, which are fully recognized banks, to be under the direct observation of the Bank of England.

This is because the Bank of England considers itself accountable to depositors and creditors. It has a financial responsibility to depositors and creditors that goes beyond the moral responsibility to them. Experience has proven, for example, that when a licensed bank has financial difficulties, the Bank of England subsidizes it and offers it financial support. It is for this reason that depositors or creditors have never lost their funds as a result of such a situation.

Views of 'Ali al-Jammal

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Jul 80 p 75

[Text] When Mr 'Ali al-Jammal opened a branch of al-Jammal Bank in London early in December 1978, AL-HAWADITH asked him whether what he had done was the result of the deteriorating security condition in Lebanon, and whether or not by opening a branch bank in London he was relying on the universal rule which proclaims that money is a coward and grows only in peaceful and secure conditions. The reply he made almost a year ago was that Lebanon will continue to be the center of banking in the Arab world even under current emergency conditions.

"But the civil war in Lebanon has not come to an end, and there are no early signs of the stability that is necessary for capital to come out of its hiding, regain its vitality and activity and acquire a reasonable measure of courage." To this statement al-Jammal replied, "Events in Lebanon have never at all led to any decline in banking activities. On the contrary banking business flourished in a manner that exceeded all the cautious expectations and especially those that were made by foreigners. Let me repeat now what I said a year ago: there is no substitute for Lebanon in the area."

It was 'Ali al-Jammal who established al-Jammal Bank in 1971--the bank that is named after him--with a group of expatriates after that group had purchased all the stock of the bank and raised its capital from 3 million pounds to 10 million pounds. Before that the bank had been called the Financial Investment Bank, and it had 3 million pounds in capital. Then the bank expanded in firm and planned stages to North Africa and Europe. 'Ali al-Jammal affirmed that "the reason for the prosperity of banking activity in Lebanon was due to a special quality in the Lebanese character. It is this quality that made Lebanon capable of adjusting and adapting. The services that have been offered and perfected for which Lebanon has gained fame include banking activities. Perhaps this is because of the same reason that I mentioned, which is this special characteristic that made these banking services unique in the world."

'Ali al-Jammal paused suddenly as though the concerns of Lebanon had somehow found their way to his soul and to his mind. Then he added, "We are always after the Lebanese financier wherever we can find him. That is why we came to Europe and to London, in particular. We establish ties between the African continent, where the Lebanese [investor] is active, and Europe which is also tied to Africa and to Lebanese investments. It is rare for any Lebanese investor to abandon his investments in Lebanon. Quite the contrary the Lebanese investor is always seeking to open new markets and to increase these markets."

This insistence on the part of 'Ali al-Jammal makes him appear to be coming from Europe and not from ravaged Lebanon. But he adds with satisfaction on the basis of the principle that something may be harmful in one way but beneficial in another: "Before the events we confined our activities to Lebanon, but after what happened, we created new markets in Europe and we went as far as China. This is the secret of the Lebanese personality: reaching unexpected places and achieving successes that observers doubted were available. I personally increased bank activities in Lebanon threefold. In 1975 the bank had four branches. Now the bank has 10 branches in Lebanon, and 2 branches are being established. We have plans to establish a network of branches so [our bank] would cover all the regions of Lebanon."

From this premise and from the logic of tireless action [which characterizes] the Lebanese personality, according to 'Ali al-Jammal, Mr al-Jammal returned a week ago from a private business trip to Cairo where preparations were underway to open a new branch of the bank in Alexandria after the success of the Cairo branch which was established in 1979. Inspite of the conditions of war and inspite of the logical reservations which characterized the banking activities of the bank, the bank did succeed in realizing accomplishments that many people did not expect. By the end of 1978--except for accounts outside the budget--bank assets had amounted to 184 million pounds compared with 127 million pounds at the end of the previous year. This is approximately a 45 percent increase.

'Ali al-Jammal considers foreign banks and their condition in Lebanon and says, "These banks have limited activities in Lebanon, compared with Lebanese banking activity which proved its trustworthiness in times of crises. Although a large number of banks stopped making payments during the crisis, Lebanese banks met their obligations and did not stop making their payments at all. Many people believe that there is a special secret behind the fact that banking activity in Lebanon is flourishing, but the secret lies in the efforts of the Lebanese people themselves. However, what is important is this prosperous reality which we are seeing now. Many people spoke about the post-war German miracle and the ability of the German people to recreate German industry so as to make it the first industry in Europe. It was the German personality that was the secret behind this. I wish I knew what the Lebanese miracle will be when the Lebanese war comes to an end. I personally want to anticipate events and to re-affirm to you that there is no substitute [for Lebanon] in the area."

Many people believe that 'Ali al-Jammal's trip from Africa to Lebanon--this trip which took al-Jammal Bank from a 3 million dollar bank to a 303 million dollar bank by the end of 1979--bears witness to the secret of his financial personality.

Views of Muhammad Abu Shadi

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Jul 80 p 79

[Text] On the 10th anniversary of the establishment of the Union of Arab and French Banks, which is known as UBAF, Dr Muhammad Mahmud Abu Shadi chairman of the board of directors and general manager of UBAF made a detailed statement from which we excerpt the following:

"When my colleagues, the members of the board of directors honored me by electing me chairman during the first meeting of the UBAF board of directors which was held on 26 February 1970 I made some opening remarks in which I touched upon the broad lines upon which our unique organization was established with regard to its makeup and its objectives. I made special mention of the hopes that have been placed on this organization in the Arab countries, in France and in the money markets of Europe, and [I also spoke about] the objectives of such Arab-French cooperation on the international banking scene.

"Now that 10 full years have gone by it behooves us to pause and to consider what our hopes were and what we achieved of those hopes. Although our goals were ambitious ones, those that were actually realized could never have occurred to anyone. Here is our organization 10 years after being in business:

it did not confine its activities to developing economic and human relations between the Arab world and France; instead, it carried this message to international financial centers so that in 10 years it has acquired 10 banking units that are doing business in Europe, in the Arabian Gulf, East Asia and in the United States of America.

"Whether we look only at this bank in France or at the banking group that it formed, both have become prominent among the banks of the world because of their business activities. This is because the total budget of the bank by the end of 1979 amounted to 16.2 billion francs--that is, over 4 billion dollars. The total budgets of the banks of the group on the same date amounted to 7.5 billion dollars.

"This increase in the total budget of the bank was accompanied by an increase in its permanent funds which include capital, reserves and stock. By the end of January 1980 these amounted to 1,205 million francs. This sum which is equal to 299 million dollars, may be broken down as follows:

Proper funds	343 million francs
Bonds that may be converted into shares	200 million francs
Notes and certificates of deposit for 165 million dollars that are equal to	663 million francs
	1,206 million francs

"It is estimated that the total permanent funds in the banks of the UBAF Group are about 185 million dollars (746 million francs).

"In 1978 our bank in Paris, UBAF France, was in 15th position among French banks with regard to its total budget. It was 11th in credit financing for medium term purchases.

"The bank still has a prominent position among joint Arab banks. Its budget alone represents over 65 percent of the total budgets of joint Arab banks in France.

"UBAF now has a prominent position in the field of organizing and managing loans in the international market whether these loans are for Arab or non-Arab borrowers. UBAF is now leading banking groups that have made arrangements for a number of huge loans in the Euro-dollar market.

"In recent years the name, UBAF, has always been one of the prominent names in this area. It also established the notion of the UBAF Group as a participant in the leadership groups in several major loans.

"Ever since the bank was established in Paris it has participated in 338 loan operations for intermediate and long term [projects], totaling 30 billion dollars. The bank was a prime mover or a participant with the management or co-management group in 132 operations whose total [worth] amounted to 13 billion dollars. It took part in managing 55 operations to issue shares whose total came to 2 billion dollars. It also contributed to promotions and purchase operations in 683 other operations to issue shares whose total amounted to 38 billion dollars. This, of course, was in addition to what the banks of the other groups did, and especially those in London, Hong Kong and New York.

"Now that our organization is 10 years old as I mentioned early in this statement, it behooves me to refer to many of the benefits that were realized as a result of the establishment of this organization. You may find these benefits to be deeper and more effective than a mere comparison of figures.

"Perhaps the most distinguished achievement has been the fact that Arab bankers have affirmed that they are worthy of the respect of international banking circles and that the excellent position which Arab banking has assumed in recent years in money markets is due to the scientific efficiency and the practical experience [of Arab bankers] and not to the financial resources that have come to the Arabs from oil.

"The primary objective of establishing UBAF and other similar joint banks in Paris was to strengthen economic, commercial and financial ties between France and the Arab countries. This was reinforced by factors that placed France in the forefront among nations in its dealings with Arab countries. This is evident in the foreign trade figures between France and the Arab countries. Foreign trade between France and the Arab countries has remained almost stable, in the vicinity of 2.5 billion dollars per year during the sixties. In 1973 that figure jumped to more than double (5.7 billion dollars); and in 1978 it tripled to 17.4 billion dollars.

The following data reflect that fact by means of comparing the volume of Arab trade with France with the volume of Arab trade with other industrial countries in 1978:

The Country	The Volume of Trade in Billion Dollars
The United States of America	25.1
Japan	25.1
France	17.4
Italy	15.6
Germany	14.4
The United Kingdom	11.2

"UBAF and the other Franco-Arab banks can therefore be proud of the operations they carried out in the past few years and of the atmosphere of friendship and understanding they established with all officials in the Arab countries and also with the French financial, monetary and banking authorities. They are also to be proud of the relations that grew out of this friendly atmosphere between Arab and French businessmen which undoubtedly had some effect on the fact that the volume of trade did reach this level.

"Among the other important effects of the establishment of UBAF is the fact that it provided the opportunity for strengthening direct relations between Arab bankers and their colleagues in Europe, Asia and America.

"In fact, one of the most important achievements of UBAF ever since its establishment is the fact that it brought together around one table French banks, other banks in other countries and Arab bankers and financiers who are citizens of countries whose political and ideological methods and whose economic systems differ [from those of France]. UBAF thereby provided the opportunity for the creation of bilateral or multi-party business ties between them; this is besides the personal relations. In some cases this resulted in the parties cooperating to establish independent financial institutions and to conclude joint funding deals that served the interests of their organizations and those of the Arab economy.

"As I look at the strides we have made 10 years after the creation of this organization and the continued support that this organization has received from its shareholders and its friends in the Arab world and outside the Arab world, I can only express my confidence in the future of our group and in the major role it can play in strengthening economic and financial relations between the Arab world and the other countries.

"I cannot fail to mention also the sincere and tireless efforts that are being made by the French and Arab workers on all levels, nor can I fail to express to them my utmost appreciation and admiration."

Views of 'Abd al-Karim al-Mudarris

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Jul 80 p 83

[Text] When 'Abd al-Karim al-Mudarris speaks about the creation of Anglo-Arab chambers of commerce and when he speaks about the Arab-British Chamber of Commerce in particular as a model for these chambers, he does not speak as the secretary general and the executive officer of the London chamber only. He rather speaks [with the voice] of the positions he had held before coming to London to manage the office of the Arab League there. He had worked 25 years in the General Secretariat of the Arab League in Cairo; he had been adviser to the legal department of the league and the officer in charge of the league's Organization of Management Sciences. This was in addition to the diplomatic post he had had as minister plenipotentiary, commissioned by the Iraqi government.

He responded to our question about how Arab-foreign chambers of commerce came into being. This is what he said:

[Answer] The idea of joint chambers of commerce is a new idea that found its place and its home in the Arab League which adopted it. The idea had come originally from the Federation of Chambers of Commerce, Agriculture and Industry in the Arab World. It was based on the fact that these organizations can be strong factors in strenthening relations between the Arab countries and the industrially advanced countries and especially the countries of western Europe.

The Arab League had entrusted the General Federation of Arab Chambers of Commerce with the task of overseeing and monitoring the affairs of the chambers. This federation played a prominent role and, undoubtedly, made a noticeable effort in putting down controls and appropriate guidelines that seek the pan-Arab interests of the Arab side as well as the interests that the Arab and foreign sides have in common.

[Question] Have joint chambers been established now in all the countries of western Europe?

[Answer] There are chambers in existence now in the most important capitals of Europe. Some of them have been created recently, and some of them are engaged in effective activity. This is, of course, within the framework of the capabilities that are available.

[Question] Some of these chambers, however, are being criticized quite frequently. It is being said, for example, that they have not even achieved the minimum goals for which they were established, the most important of which is that there be additional communications channels to further understanding between nations and to develop equal relations.

[Answer] I don't think I can make an evaluation of these chambers because each chamber has its own circumstances.

[Question] It seems that the Anglo-Arab Chamber of Commerce has been unique among all the chambers due to the numerous confrontations it has had. Even when it was created in 1975 some agencies tried to impede its creation.

[Answer] The fact that it faced numerous obstacles was expected, and I do not wish to comment on it. It was the political dimension of the chamber, according to what these agencies believed, that made those agencies in question resist the creation of an Arab-British chamber of commerce under conditions when the Arabs began to exercise the influence that a group of countries had never before exercised. This was because of the fortunes and the oil they have and also, of course, because of the tremendous markets. In spite of all this there was a number of British [subjects] who worked tirelessly for the establishment of the chamber. I can say that the conditions under which the Arab-British Chamber of Commerce was established were difficult. No other chamber had faced them, but we, of course, were able to overcome these difficulties.

[Question] Then you were faced afterwards with the Zionist campaign in the British parliament when the pro-Zionist Lord Byers proposed a foreign boycott bill for the purpose of achieving Israel's goal of closing the boycott circle after it had succeeded in the United States.

[Answer] There is no doubt that the notion of proposing a foreign boycott law was the first feasible test of the chamber's ability to take action against a law which would have had tremendous results on Anglo-Arab relations had parliament passed it. It was natural that opposition to this bill be one of the chamber's principal functions on the basis of the fact that it was the only Arab organization that was on the front line in the struggle, if one can use that expression. The bill did in fact stipulate intervention in the freedom of British corporations and organizations in selecting whomever they wished to deal with. There was no doubt that Zionism, tempted by its successes in the United States and in other countries, decided to try its luck in Britain on the basis of the fact that the Zionist lobby was quite strong. This is a fact that everyone knows. The chamber participated in the general debates in the House of Lords, and its secretary testified about the effect that the law may have on Anglo-Arab relations. It seems that some people understood that Britain would be the first one to get hurt by this bill. This is what British experts themselves acknowledge.

[Question] What is curious is that Zionism succeeded in France even though there is no Zionist lobby in [the French] parliament!

[Answer] A similar bill was in fact proposed to the French parliament in the context of the Israeli plan to do away with the Arab boycott as it is known. Although French parliament approved it, the French government had reservations about it because this bill included the Arab boycott of Israel. Attempts were made in the Netherlands, but the Netherlands is known for its support for Israel to the point that that support has become part of its political traditions.

[Question] You testified in the House of Lords to scuttle this bill. Were you personally or was the chamber subjected to campaigns from the Zionists?

[Answer] It is true that I testified in front of a select committee. I was invited by that committee, and the invitation was extended in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Council of Arab Ambassadors. It was this council that had appealed to the chamber to oppose this bill. As far as the story about pressures is concerned, I prefer not to talk about them at the present time.

[Question] There are campaigns in the media directed towards building a distorted image of the Arabs and to creating a frame of mind that is against them. These campaigns have been so vicious that some Arab observers believe that the organized media has succeeded in creating a measure of hatred and malice [for the Arabs]. Are you in a position that would enable you to oppose such campaigns effectively and positively?

[Answer] If you mean our position on the publicity campaign that was carried out by the London branch of one of the French automobile companies which created an uproar in Arab circles, this is true. The fact of the matter is that this company suddenly began an advertising campaign for the purpose of marketing its cars in Britain. On the 13th and 17th of June last year it printed an advertisement on a full page of a number of British newspapers that was entitled, "How To Make a Sheikh Shake!"

The company claimed in its advertisement that the Arab countries were delighted with the increased consumption of fuel in western countries because this justified the action they took to increase oil prices and amass huge fortunes. This company's car was so economical in fuel consumption, it would make the oil sheikhs tremble. [The company also claimed] that the reason for high gasoline [prices] in Britain was the result of increasing oil prices. It was inevitable of course that we take a position on these advertisements that were derogatory of the Arabs. So we told company officials that whoever wanted to deal with the Arabs had to respect them and that it was absolutely impossible for any commodity to enter Arab markets if the manufacturers of that commodity insulted and slandered the Arabs. We have always rejected in all our activities this way of dealing with the Arabs, that is, [we expect] that the Arabs be treated with respect. We also reflect this inclination in the printed material we publish and in the round table discussions we hold. We have a magazine that publishes special issues regularly about each Arab country.

[Question] And now what will become of the two projects you had announced recently and turned over directly to the Arab world?

[Answer] The fact is that the two projects are in the final stages. The first project which we announced a few weeks ago is for training the technical cadres in the Arab countries. For the second project the chamber has allocated a portion of its income to be spent on gifted, needy Arabs. We hope that through this fund we will have established a new dimension to our activities. Unlike what the Yugoslav proverb says, we do not stand outside the city walls to publicize our activities.

FATAH LEADER KHALID AL-HASAN INTERVIEWED

Kuwait AL-SIYASAH in Arabic 14 Jul 80 p 12

[Report on interview with Fatah leader Khalid al-Hasan by Fathi Sharif; date and place not given]

[Text] The decision made by the Arab ministers of foreign affairs to reject UN Resolution 242, which was passed in 1967 to establish a solution to the Middle East crisis, has provoked far-ranging international reactions. Political observers have provided various interpretations of this action, some describing the rejection as an Arab appeal to wage war. Others, [however], interpreted it as a kind of tactical intransigence by a number of Arab countries. Still others explained it in terms of Arab pressure on the United States and Europe to achieve a new formula for a peaceful settlement that would call for the return of the Palestinian people [to their homeland] and their pursuit of their destiny on their soil.

In view of this conflicting analysis on the part of many political observers, AL-SIYASAH conducted an interview with Mr Khalid al-Hasan, one of the Palestinian leaders and member of the Central Committee. It presented to him the sum total of ideas and reactions over the Arab consensus to reject Resolution 242.

Khalid al-Hasan said, "Yes, this rejection cannot mean anything else but war. Otherwise, we would be tricking ourselves. I hope that the rejection of the resolution will be the definitive expression of the Arab position that favors the full liberation of all Arab territory that has been occupied since 1947 and not only the territory which has been occupied since 1967, even if circumstances required that the struggle be scheduled so that territory occupied in 1967 be liberated during a first stage. This would be the decisive stage that would determine the stages that would follow."

Responding to a question about whether or not the Arabs were now prepared to undertake a deterrent military action against the Israeli enemy, al-Hasan said, "Naturally, I cannot say this because the resolutions are based on regaining a military strategic balance with the Zionist enemy and on tying the economic position to the political position and tying all this to the position of the media and to the international diplomatic movement. This means drawing up a strategy to prepare for a military confrontation or at least to reach a level of strength and earnestness if a plan were drawn up and implemented so that the international society would force the Zionist enemy to withdraw unconditionally to the 1967 truce lines."

Regarding the nature of the next Arab step that will be made after the resolution was rejected, the member of the Central Committee of the Fatah Organization said, "The most prominent of these steps are [as follows]: first, a joint military command is to be formed; it is to include basically Syria, Iraq, Jordan and the PLO. This command should have room for Arab forces and Arab volunteers who wish to join and to build a military force that would be capable of taking action in the context of an integrated, comprehensive military plan.

"Second, an Arab economic central command is to be formed. It is to tie Arab economic activity to the pan-Arab economic goals that emanate centrally from the question of Palestine.

"Third, there is to be a central political leadership to coordinate Arab diplomatic and media activity.

"Fourth, no Arab party is to undertake any political, media or economic action that is in conflict with, contradicts or assumes a neutral posture on all this."

Khalid al-Hasan continued his conversation with AL-SIYASAH on the nature of the next Arab step and said, "Whether the Arabs decide on a partial war or on an all-out war or whether they decide to restore the strategic balance to strengthen [their] negotiating position or [to prepare for] a military confrontation, what is important is that they adhere to that decision. The first step to adhering to a decision involves not monopolizing the responsibility and acknowledging the existing fact that there are four forces that must be fused, united or consolidated into one force that is generally coordinated by a joint command for implementing any Arab strategy that may be approved.

"These four forces are Syria, Iraq, Jordan and the PLO."

Al-Hasan added, "Any Arab army that prepares for the battle without having in its midst or with it a quarter of a million Palestinian fighters cannot be taken seriously. Likewise, any one of these powers that excludes itself from unified action to restore strategic balance cannot be taken seriously in its consent to the Arab resolution. This is regardless of those powers' internal problems or the disputes they have among themselves."

Concerning the seriousness of implementing Arab resolutions on the basis of previous experiences, the member of the Central Committee of the Fatah Organization said, "Any reading of the hundreds of resolutions that have been adopted by the Arab countries in Arab League meetings, in summit meetings or in foreign alliances since 1948 would find them to be good resolutions. But I do not know if it would be possible to adopt new resolutions in that context. Let us take, for example, the resolutions of the last three summit conferences in Rabat, Baghdad and Tunisia. These were in fact good resolutions whether or not they are described as representing the minimal [demands]. The recommendations of the Amman Conference asked that the next summit support these resolutions. In my judgment, however, the important point lies in the implementation tool and in the mechanics of action to establish central military, economic and media commands that would undertake the task of drawing up a plan and carrying out the collective resolutions that were adopted so that they would be taken seriously by the world and thereby force the international community to respect Arab will and Arab action and to take our positions seriously at least once in contemporary history. Many, many things would then change on the scene of the Arab struggle."

Khalid al-Hasan went on to say, "The Baghdad Resolutions are over 2 years old, and the Tunisia Resolutions are almost 1 year old. Has any resolution on a confrontation with the enemy or with the United States of America been implemented?

"I believe that the principal reason for the Arab inability to carry out such resolutions is due to a provincial mentality and to a provincial style that find themselves incapable of carrying out pan-Arab resolutions [because of a lack of] self-confidence and because of mutual fear."

Khalid al-Hasan also said, "The rejection of Resolution 242 is not new for the question of Palestine; it is rather a continuation of the past. It is known that Resolution 242 is concerned with removing the effects of the 1967 aggression. When the United States tried to make Resolution 242 the basis for solving the question of Palestine, the liberation organization and all the Arab countries without exception turned this down.

"The Arab countries that had approved Resolution 242 had done so so as to have the effects of the 1967 aggression removed. The Arab countries that had approved the resolution had done so through their approval of Resolution 338, and they had expressed reservations that explained their approval.

"But as far as all factions of the PLO are concerned, the organization rejected 242 ever since it was issued whether the resolution applied to the Arab position or to the Palestinian position. When the United States proposed recognizing the organization in 1977 in return for the organization recognizing Resolution 242, the PLO rejected this openly and clearly."

Khalid al-Hasan expressed his belief that the decision to reject Resolution 242 required that basic amendments be made to the resolutions of the Baghdad and Tunisia summits which were described as minimal resolutions. These amendments would bring the resolutions up to the level of rejecting Resolution 242 which has no relationships [whatsoever] to the Palestinian question.

Likewise, the only meaning of the collective Arab position to reject Resolution 242 is that of rejecting Resolution 338 also, provided that this rejection not become a media position or a temporary position. Approval or rejection of such positions must be made in the context of an integrated Arab strategic position."

Khalid al-Hasan was asked about the degree of Palestinian military preparedness if talk of war and liberation were to be imposed on the Arab position at this stage.

He said, "To the Palestinian people, going back to the method of liberating Palestine by force is the tune they wake up to in the morning and go to sleep by at night. If we were to say that any nation can mobilize 10 percent of its citizens in a real war, the Palestinian nation can easily mobilize and arm a quarter of a million men and women. This army will be at the vanguard of any joint military action undertaken under a unified Arab command."

Al-Hasan was asked about the future of any joint Arab military action if the four powers were to continue their disputes around the method and the strategy of the next stage.

He said, "We are asking these four Arab powers to rise above their disputes and to settle them for the Palestinian question. We are asking them to realize that the liberation of Palestine is the greatest economic development project in the Arab world because it would do away with all the economic drain that is the result of building the Arab armed forces for defense [purposes]. There is also a pan-Arab significance to the liberation of Palestine: it would promote the practical application of pan-Arab goals much more quickly than any political observer could have imagined."

Regarding the repercussions he expected would befall the U.S. position after the collective Arab rejection of Resolution 242 and the prevalence of the hardline approach in the Arab positions, Khalid al-Hasan said, "If the hardline or semi-hardline Arab position were clear and serious in stating what it wanted, and if it were taking action through a central command in the context of a plan whose implementation was characterized by earnestness and practicality, the positions of our friends will become much better. The positions of our enemies will also be improved, and our enemies will reconsider those positions." Al-Hasan was asked if Israel could undertake any pre-emptive military action at this stage to strike any kind of gathering or to try to break up the Arab hardline formula.

The member of the Central Committee of the Fatah Organization said that that was very possible. "It is not unlikely for Israel to carry out a military operation as an adventure. This is part of its strategy. We must know, however, that the strategic reserve of the Israeli and the U.S. policy is based on Arab fragmentation. Accordingly, the earnestness and the unity of will of the Arab position in the struggle will resolve all these questions even if Israel were to carry out any unanticipated adventure. This is because reducing oil production by half or stopping production [altogether] will become a justifiable and a legitimate action and it would impose hostile positions on the Israeli enemy."

Regarding the European position and the possibilities for change that may take place following the rejection of Resolution 242, which Europe had declared would be the foundation for the basic ideas behind any initiative it undertakes, Khalid al-Hasan said, "If the goal of the Amman recommendations which will be submitted to the Arab Summit Conference will be to reach a step-by-step political settlement from a position of strength, then cooperation with Europe for a future initiative becomes desirable. But if the objective of these resolutions is ultimately to get out of the settlement process and to move into a prologue to a military confrontation, then the need for any European or non-European initiative will become unjustified."

"I believe that the nature of the Arab position at the next meeting of the UN General Assembly [that will be held] this July 22 to discuss the Palestinian question will explain the ultimate dimensions of the Amman resolutions and the directions that the resolutions of the next summit meeting will take. What about the Palestinian position itself?"

Al-Hasan said, "When it meets next September 4 the National Council will be called upon to draw up a new strategy for Palestinian action in the light of what happened in Amman and what will happen at the UN meeting."

I told Khalid al-Hasan, "During a tour you made recently in a number of western European countries you proposed a five-point action program that would form the basis for any new European initiative. Some leaders of Palestinian organizations criticized this proposal and objected to it. What is your evaluation of the reactions that happened on the Palestinian and European scenes?"

He said, "I did not propose five points; I proposed a large number of points. The most prominent of them was recognition of the PLO and Europe dealing with the liberation organization and with the Palestinian people. I also proposed another number of points that were derived from the resolutions of the Palestinian National Council. Some organizations had some objections but these objections were abstract and were made without any objective discussion."

He said, "The method which some news agencies used to convey their understanding of the ideas which they announced was flawed. This method must be reviewed carefully. A person can only suffer over the words that some fellow secretary generals used in making their remarks. I cannot use those words in any counter-criticism. Ultimately the masses of the Palestinian people will pass judgment: they will be judge and arbiter.

KUWAITI DAILY INTERVIEWS PFLP OFFICIAL ON ROMANIA VISIT, INITIATIVE

GF021850 Kuwait AL-RA'Y AL-'AAM in Arabic 1 Sep 80 p 18

[Interview given by Taysir Qubba'ah, PFLP Political Bureau member and official in charge of foreign relations, to AL-RAY'Y AL-'AAM correspondent Salih Qallab in Beirut--date not given]

[Text] [Question] A number of questions have arisen regarding your recent talks in Bucharest in view of the fact that the Romanian side announced a Middle East initiative during your stay there, and also because you were the most recent Palestinian delegation to visit Romania on a specific political mission.

[Answer] First of all, I should make it clear that our visit to Romania was not linked to a specific event. The PFLP had received an invitation from the Romanian Communist Party a long time ago. The invitation was within the framework of strengthening relations between the two sides. The circumstances of our struggle prevented us from responding to this invitation in the past.

The PFLP command decided recently to send a delegation to strengthen relations between the Palestinian and Romanian peoples and to inform the Romanian leadership of the conditions of the Palestinian people, especially in the occupied territories.

During this visit we held several meetings with Romanian Communist Party Politburo members. We also met with Romanian Foreign Minister Stefan Andrei. Our last meeting was with President Ceausescu. We explained to him the Palestinian and Arab struggle in the present stage--a struggle characterized by opposition to the Camp David conspiracy both within and outside the occupied territories.

During these meetings we explained that the Camp David conspiracy is aimed at Syria and the Lebanese national movement as well as the Palestinian resistance so that the Arab nation would accept the Camp David plan now that Egypt has done so.

We stressed to the Romanian officials, led by Ceausescu, that the present task of the Palestinian revolution and the Arab progressive forces is to thwart the Camp David plot and the conspiracies against the Palestinian revolution, the steadfastness front and the forces of the Arab liberation movement.

[Question] It has been noted, however, that Romania declared its stand during your stay in Bucharest. Indeed, AGERPRES deliberately reported that the announcement of the Romanian initiative was made during the presence of a PFLP delegation in Bucharest.

[Answer] Romania's announcement of its initiative may have taken place during our stay in Bucharest, but Romanian officials expressed their point of view in this regard a long time ago. They discussed their view with other Palestinian leaders who visited Bucharest recently.

President Ceausescu proposed an international conference to resolve to so-called Middle East question. Our view was completely at variance with his, not only as regards the convening of such a conference but also as regards the understanding of Camp David and the nature of the conflict in the Middle East as a whole.

[Question] If such a conference is convened under an auspices and with the Soviet Union's guarantees, will you oppose it?

[Answer] We in the PFLP oppose any conference under the umbrella of the Camp David policy. We have taken a clear stand on the European initiative and regard it as complementary to the Camp David accords. Once again I stress that our task and the task of our allies in the present stage is to negate the Camp David policy and its results and to look for a new initiative that makes it more acceptable or develops it.

[Question] Even if the conference is based on the [October 1977] U.S.-Soviet statement, would you still be opposed to it?

[Answer] We have a very clear view: We believe that any conference held under the Camp David umbrella is complementary to the Camp David policy.

[Question] It is said that, in addition to proposing an international conference, Ceausescu also proposed to you the United Arab Kingdom plan with Jordan.

[Answer] President Ceausescu did not propose this matter in a clear manner. However, we explained to him the reasons for our rejection of the United Arab Kingdom plan. We warned him of Jordan's role, especially after the next Israeli elections. We explained that if the Israeli Labor Party should win the elections it is likely that it would offer Jordan parts of the West Bank and Gaza within the framework of a solution at the expense of the Pelestinian people and within the framework of the United Arab Kingdom plan.

[Question] Nevertheless, while you are expressing these apprehensions, the PLO's relations with Jordan are becoming firmer and more solid.

[Answer] We do not agree to the present formula [of relations] between the PLO and the Jordanian regime. So that these relations can have a basis, we demand freedom for the Palestinian resistance's presence along the Palestinian borders on the Jordan River. We demand freedom for the Palestinian resistance to work among its masses in Jordan. We also demand an end to the persecution and harassment of nationalist elements in Jordan and noninterference in the Palestinian people's affairs in the occupied territories.

In any case, let us not be idealistic and stray too far in our dreams. The structure of the Jordanian regime does not allow for coexistence with the Palestinian resistance.

[Question] Jordan, however, has declared and continues to declare its rejection of Camp David.

[Answer] I believe that there are two reasons for the Jordanian regime's rejection of Camp David: First, in its past stage there was nothing in the Camp David policy that tempted Jordan to join it. Second, in return for formal rejection of Camp David the Jordanian regime obtained from the Baghdad summit conference $1.25 billion by which it strengthened itself in preparation for its coming role.

[Question] In light of the foregoing, it may occur to some that postponement of the Palestinine National Council is related to these matters.

[Answer] We in the PFLP call for convening the Palestine National Council at the scheduled time. We are continuing our fight to convene the council as soon as possible. There are many developments in the area that require study and the determination of a revolutionary stand toward them. Moreover, the tasks of the present stage require the election of a new Palestinian leadership that is capable of implementing Palestinian decisions and continuing the efforts to achieve national unity.

We should not remain idle in the face of the intensification of plots against the Palestinian revolution, within the occupied territories, in Lebanon or on the international level. Hostile forces in Lebanon are continuing to prepare themselves at a fast rate to assault the Palestinian resistance. Moreover, the Palestine National Council is responsible for defining a clear stand that is compatible with our people's aspirations on all the initiatives that are being proposed, be they the European initiative or the international conference.

Regrettably, some Palestinian forces are still stalling on the issue of convening the Palestine National Council at the scheduled date. We in the PFLP see no justification for such stalling, whether on the pretext of awaiting the result of the U.S. Presidential elections or on any other pretext.

[Question] With regard to the forthcoming Arab summit conference in Amman, do you believe that its resolutions will complement those of the Baghdad and Tunis summits?

[Answer] We do not pin great hopes on Arab summit conferences. Many summit conferences have been held only to yield weak resolutions that could not be implemented. The reason is that the balance of power in such summits has always been in favor of reactionary forces allied to imperialism.

The Baghdad summit conference resolved to boycott completely the Egyptian regime. Despite this, as you know we are daily witnessing blatant violation of this resolution politically and economically. We also assert that he who wants to fight Israel cannot be a friend of the United States because the United States and Israel are two sides of the same coin. Therefore, what is required is, at least, to reduce the supply of oil to the United States and other capitalist countries so that they can feel the danger to their interests in our region.

GUIDANCE COMMITTEE PRESS CONFERENCE--Engineer Ibrahim Daqqaq, a leader of the national guidance committee in the territories, said that the Palestinians recognize Israel's right to exist, and they are willing to negotiate with it. But they demand a state for themselves. Ibrahim Daqqaq spoke at a press conference in Jerusalem to protest the confinement order that was issued against him. Also appearing with him were the three editors of East Jerusalem newspaper that were confined to their residences. They claim this was done out of political vindictiveness, because of their opposition to the Camp David agreements. [Text] [TA171323 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1300 GMT 17 Sep 80]

BETHELEHEM AID FROM JORDAN--Bethlehem Mayor Ilyas Frayj issued a statement that the Bethlehem Municipality is suffering an acute financial crisis. According to Frayj, its deficit amounts to over 1 million Israeli pounds monthly, and the mayor expressed the concern that soon the municipality would no longer be able to extend services to its residents. In the meantime, Frayj asked the military government for permission to go to Jordan to present the crisis to the Jordanian authorities and seek a solution to the problem. SYRIAN GROUP RECEIVES JORDANIAN FUNDS--Damascus, 17 Sep (SANA)--Amin al-Asfar, official in charge of military training in the Muslim brotherhood organization gang, said he had received 500,000 Syrian pounds in installments via Jordan to finance sabotage operations in the Syrian Arab Republic. In an interview with Syrian Arab television last night, the gang member said he has used the money to buy different kinds of arms and ammunition, to be used by the gang in its criminal operations. He affirmed that the brotherhood gang forges passports and is associated with hostile foreign quarters. At the end of his statement, he admonished Muslim brotherhood gang members and the public in general to avoid sedition, as it serves the interest of imperialism and Zionism. BRIEFS

TEACHERS CALLED INTO ARMY--According to reports from Afghanistan, the Karmal administration has called teachers for military service to strengthen the army. Kabul Radio has been repeatedly making announcements calling upon teachers to join the army for military service as part of their sacred duty. It may be noted that due to the rise in unemployment during the last five years, qualified young men were hired by the education department on the condition that, if necessary, they would serve in the army. However, according to recent reports, a large number of teachers quit their jobs for fear of being enlisted in the army. This has been confirmed by a correspondent of the BBC who also reports that a large number of Afghan soldiers have either deserted or joined the ranks of the Mujahidin, thus forcing the Soviet soldiers to carry out even very ordinary chores. Mark Tally, the BBC correspondent in New Delhi, confirmed the reported assassination of a Soviet Brigadier by unidentified persons outside his residence in Kabul last week. It is also reported that the revolt of the 14th Afghan Battalion, though under control, has cut the number of its men to half their previous total. MUBARAK ON TALKS WITH FRENCH PRESIDENT

LD111535 Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 9 Sep 80 pp 1, 15

[Report by Muhammad 'Abd al-Mun'im: "Mubarak Discusses Middle East With d'Estaing; Vice President says: Agreement on Jerusalem Necessary for Tripartite Summit"]

[Excerpts] Paris, 8 Sep--Vice President Husni Mubarak said following his 90-minute meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing today that a certain amount of consensus on the Jerusalem issue is necessary before a tripartite summit can be organized among Egypt, Israel and the United States or the Palestinian autonomy negotiations resumed.

The vice president also emphasized the importance of the role Europe can play in the Middle East crisis. He said that Europe can play a major role and expressed the belief that the resolutions issued following the EEC summit in June in Venice constitute a strong support for the peace process.

Mubarak said that the "climate of trust" between Israel and Egypt must be restored before contacts between the two parties and the United States are resumed to prepare for a tripartite summit or the resumption of negotiations on autonomy for the Palestinians. The restoration of the climate of trust between the two countries is up to Israel, he added, and said: As soon as this is achieved meetings can be held in the United States to prepare for the tripartite summit.

Mubarak explained that President al-Sadat believes that it is necessary to hold a meeting of the three countries at summit level in order to seek a way out of the present impasse since the United States is a full partner in the negotiations. He also said that President al-Sadat believes that Europe has an important role which it can play in solving the Middle East crisis.

Observers described the meeting between Mubarak and the French president as extraordinary and as indicating both the importance of the subjects discussed as well as the rapprochement between the Egyptian and French stands.

Speaking once again about the Jerusalem question in response to questions by journalists on the subject, Mabarak said that Jerusalem is a sensitive issue and one of the major issues in the autonomy talks. Therefore it is natural that it should be the basic and major problem from which any talks should start.

Husni Mubarak said that "Jerusalem is part of the West Bank whether we like it or not" and that the talks should deal with it whether we accept or not. "We regard Jerusalem as an extremely sensitive issue because it concerns 800 million Muslims in the world and, as a holy city, it concerns more than 1 billion Christians. It does not concern the Jews alone."

Husni Mubarak said that talks with President Giscard d'Estaing dealt with bilateral relations, the Middle East problem, the entire Arab situation and world events affecting the area. The Egyptian vice president praised the relations between Egypt and France, saying that they go back many years. He said that President al-Sadat and the Egyptian people will never forget the aid that France gave to Egypt even before the October war.

Husni Mubarak said that he discussed the question of Jerusalem with Pope John Paul when he met with him last week. He said that the pope views the problem from a religious standpoint while Israel looks at it from a political standpoint.

MUBARAK: JERUSALEM NO 'INSURMOUNTABLE OBSTACLE' TO MIDEAST PEACE

LD101205 Paris LE MONDE in French 10 Sep 80 p 6

[Interview with Egyptian Vice President Husni Mubarak by Jacques Amalric in Paris: "Israel Must Restore an Atmosphere of Confidence Particularly With Regard to Jerusalem"--date not specified]

[Text] [Question] Why has President al-Sadat gone back on his decision to suspend negotiations on Palestinian autonomy sine die? Have you received assurances on more flexibility in the Israeli positions?

[Answer] We have not changed our position. Our objective is still the same but we must adapt to the situation. We are in fact facing a new situation.

This new situation has been created by President Carter and Mr Begin's agreeing to another tripartite summit. It is the prospect of this new summit which enables us to resume negotiations--whose failure could be disastrous--on Palestinian autonomy. In any case, this resumption cannot take place before 15 October and, if the summit is to take place, Israel must take the necessary steps to restore the atmosphere of confidence which no longer exists, particularly as regards Jerusalem. A summit requires very serious preparations.

[Question] What do you think has destroyed that atmosphere of confidence?

[Answer] Negotiations reached deadlock for three reasons: The Knesset's adoption of the fundamental law on Jerusalem, the rumors from Israel on a bill providing for the annexation of the Golan Heights and Israel's military attacks on Lebanon, not to mention the Israeli policy of setting up new colonies.

[Question] Can the Jerusalem affair be settled?

[Answer] I do not believe that it is an insurmountable obstacle; Jerusalem concerns 800 million Muslims and 1.2 billion Christians. Do not forget that Sinai was annexed and that during the negotiations on withdrawal the Israelis tried for a long time to keep some colonies in that territory.

Finally, they gave up and the problem was settled. As regards the law adopted by the Knesset, do not forget that a law passed in 1957 provided for the annexation of Sinai.

Nonetheless, it was on Jerusalem that President al-Sadat was forced to send an initial letter to Mr Begin. However, in his reply Mr Begin avoided all the questions. The president then sent Mr Begin a second letter proposing a new tripartite summit with the U.S. President. That idea was accepted by Mr Carter and then by Mr Begin. That is the new situation which has been created.

[Question] By asking Mr Carter to organize a new summit, has President al-Sadat not above all given the democratic candidate for the White House an election gift?

[Answer] We may be prepared to help our friends, but only to a certain extent. Therefore, when Mr Carter's Middle East adviser Linowitz wanted to come to Cairo in August to make us resume negotiations on Palestinian autonomy, we refused. However, you must understand that for us the Camp David agreements constitute a pivot--the only pivot: it is the only document which contains Israeli promises.

"Arab Countries Incapable of Putting Forward a Coherent Plan"

[Question] Are you not afraid that the possible election of Mr Reagan could call into question the entire U.S. Middle East policy?

[Answer] We do not deal with individuals but with states whose leaders must take account of their public opinion. President Carter has often said that he cannot thwart his public opinion. The same applies to the European leaders. However, it is true that Mr Carter is deeply involved in the Camp David process. Mr Reagan will probably need time to understand it, but U.S. public opinion will still be there.

[Question] Do you note a change in the stances adopted by Riyadh and Amman toward negotiations on Palestinian autonomy?

[Answer] What, in your opinion, is the real influence of Jordan or any other Arab country? What proposals can they make to promote a solution? You see, we were expecting those taking part in the November 1978 Baghdad summit to make specific proposals. We saw nothing emerge. They could do no more than insult Egypt and offer us $9 billion to break off negotiations and prepare for a new war. Even if that financial offer had been credible, Egypt will never sell its national independence even for more billions than that. The same happened at the Tunis summit: they stepped up the war of the airwaves and took ineffectual sanctions against us.

For 30 years the Arab countries have been incapable of putting forward a specific plan. Conventional solutions, whether war or UN resolutions, have achieved nothing. That is why we are prepared to accept any alternative solution.

[Question] Do you still think, to cite President al-Sadat, that the United States holds 99 percent of the diplomatic cards in the Middle East?

[Answer] Yes, even the European countries admit that. All the European leaders told me that during my tour.

[Question] Including Mr Giscard d'Estaing?

[Answer] We did not discuss that specific point. But, tell me, what can the Europeans really do?

[Question] Is Cairo still as skeptical about the Europeans' intention to launch a diplomatic initiative in the Middle East?

[Answer] We are not in the least skeptical: Such an initiative exerts pressure on the United States, and that prompts Washington to exert pressure on Israel in turn.

[Question] And yet are you aware that most European leaders no longer believe in the Camp David process?

[Answer] If that is the case, what alternative solution is there? Once again, this is the only document which contains Israeli promises on the Palestinian problem.

[Question] Do you think that Mr Begin's departure could make the negotiations easier?

[Answer] I do not want to dwell on that question, so that Israel cannot say that I am trying to divide public opinion from my government. Mr Begin is the government leader; he carries the responsibility. Nonetheless, I am sure that Israeli public opinion favors peace.

[Question] What is the state of Egyptian-Libyan relations, and what do you think of the plan to unite Syria and Libya?

[Answer] Al-Qadhdhafi is an unstable, unpredictable, arrogant man. You never know what he will do next. He is a leader without a people and he claims that Egypt is a country without a leader. However, with 42 million inhabitants we are able to find a leader without help from al-Qadhdhafi.

As regards the plan for union with Syria, the matter is simple: al-Asad hopes to receive money from Libya, and al-Qadhdhafi will give him nothing.

MUBARAK TELLS ISRAELI PAPER JERUSALEM LAW NOT INSURMOUNTABLE OBSTACLE

TA101144 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 10 Sep 80 p 1

[Report by Tamar Golan: "The Existence of the Jerusalem Law Is not an Obstacle Which Cannot Be Overcome"--Paris, no date]

[Text] The problem of Jerusalem will be the main issue in the next contacts between Israel and Egypt and certainly also at the tripartite summit and, despite its being most complicated, it is not insoluble.

This view was expressed by Egyptian Vice President Gen Husni Mubarak in a talk with us here on the eve of his departure from Paris to Vienna and Bucharest.

The Egyptian position as presented by General Mubarak and Dr Usamah al-Baz is that a distinction should be drawn between agreement on the city's final status, which will be discussed at a later stage--and apparently also by the highest echelons--and those aspects linked with the Jerusalem issue in the framework of the Camp David agreements, which involve autonomy. In Egypt's view, the arrangements for self-rule--security, local elections and education--also apply to the inhabitants of East Jerusalem.

In a talk with us, as in the series of interviews with the French communications media, the Egyptian vice president stressed that even if his country sharply condemns the Jerusalem law, the very fact of this law's existence does not appear to him to be an obstacle that cannot be overcome. The Egyptians are not making the resumption of the autonomy talks dependent on agreement on the Jerusalem issue, but are now claiming that this will be a main issue in everything involving their future contacts with Israel.

It appears that, because of the intensive diplomatic contacts conducted recently between Washington, Cairo and Jerusalem, there has been a "flexibility" in the Egyptian position. The use of the term "preparatory talks for the summit" is intended to replace talk of a "resumption of the autonomy talks" and this will be a sort of honorable way out for Egypt, which unilaterally stopped the talks.

In his talks with French leaders and in all his public appearances here, General Mubarak often spoke about the need for goodwill and an atmosphere of trust, especially on the issue of Jerusalem.

Vice President Mubarak is leaving Paris with the feeling that there has been an easing in the relations between Egypt and France and that President Giscard d'Estaing has returned to his previous stand, of friendship to Egypt and recognition of the fact that it is the main power in the Middle East and the Arab world.

Although some of the Egyptian vice president's advisers are not so optimistic about the talks held here, there is no doubt that the Egyptians think the ice has been broken, and there will again be close contacts in the future between President Valery Giscard d'Estaing and his friend Anwar al-Sadat. On the practical level it appears that Egypt would prefer economic and, primarily, military cooperation with France to cooperation with Britain.

ANIS MANSUR ON AL-SADAT-BEGIN MESSAGES

LD050957 Cairo OCTOBER in Arabic 31 Aug 80 pp 8-11

[Article by Anis Mansur: "Al-Sadat's Reply in 300 Words; So That We Will Not Look Back and Say: Were All These Complications Necessary?"]

[Excerpts] At the very beginning of the meeting between President al-Sadat and Israeli Ambassador Dr Ben-Elissar the ambassador said: Mr President, I have nothing to complain about this time.

The ambassador was referring to what he had always complained about--that he is being isolated, that the steps to normalize relations are slow and that so far he has been unable to find an apartment to live in.

So the ambassador no longer has anything to complain about either because the reasons for complaint have ceased to exist, or because the ambassador has gotten accustomed to this atmosphere, which has therefore become something ordinary, or because the discussions between Egypt and Israel have reached such a high level as to lessen the significance of any other discussions or complaints of any sort.

But it was President al-Sadat who had more than one complaint. The talk with President al-Sadat lasted 90 minutes. After the talks the Israeli ambassador said that President al-Sadat is optimistic and that he believes that there must be a solution.

President al-Sadat discussed every viewpoint and expressed astonishment at the misconception of much of what is being said. He expressed the view that the Israeli Government is extremely nervous.

As the negotiations stopped it was natural that the exchange of messages between President al-Sadat and Mr Begin should stop too and for the same reason. The negotiations became pedantic, revolving around themselves, and not moving onto new ground. They are twitching but not moving. And if there is any movement at all it is from Alexandria to al-Jizah or to Herzeliyya. But nothing new is being said and there is no hope either.

This is one of the difficult situations that Israel has created; there has been intransigence, time-wasting and attempts to make the world believe that Israel is being serious about reaching or attaining something.

Violent decisions and provocative challenges to Egypt and the whole world followed. The negotiations stopped but were not discontinued.

Then came the turn to negotiate on paper, that is the exchange of messages between President al-Sadat and Mr Begin. However long these negotiations went on they were bound to stop because Israel created situations under which it was difficult to exchange messages, since otherwise such exchanges would mean accepting these situations. In the messages, just as in the negotiations, there were pedantic discussions on the part of Israel as well as oratory addressed to the Jewish peoples everywhere. There was also touchiness and great misunderstanding.

For example, when President al-Sadat said that the Jewish history begins here, that is in Egypt, and that it appears to be Egypt's destiny to end this history here too, Mr Begin's reply was: No, this is not true. The history of the Jews begins in the city of Ur in Iraq when Abrahma left for the land of Canaan and stopped at Elon Moreh.

This is a historical fact known by any junior student of the history of ancient civilizations, or the great migrations in history, or comparative religions. But what President al-Sadat meant, but did not wish to mention because of his awareness that such a reference would hurt and pain the Jews, was the suffering of the Jews in Egypt, their bondage, and their exodus behind Moses and the beginning of the exodus from Egypt and from all the other countries as well as the beginning of the diaspora and wandering in Sinai and in the world. What President al-Sadat meant to say was that with peace the historical suffering can end and that it is Egypt's destiny once again to end Israel's historical diaspora and fear.

Among other things, President al-Sadat said to the Israeli ambassador: What has Israel gained now? It has gained the enmity of hundreds of millions of Muslims and one billion Christians. It has not satisfied 14 million American and European Jews and has lost Europe's traditional friendship. The Israeli prime minister could have done without all this.

The aggression against Lebanon then followed and Israel went on building settlements. All this and the statements in Mr Begin's messages created difficult conditions and unbearable pressures on the Egyptian negotiator. We therefore decided on a pause for reflection.

But we must ask: Why all this? Does Mr Begin want to bring pressure to bear on Egypt, or embarrass it, or drive it to break the negotiations as if we had never agreed on dialog, without which there would have been no peace agreement?

Will this Israeli hardline attitude lead to the weakening of Egypt? What benefit would Israel gain if this happens? If some of the extremists imagine that it is possible to isolate Muslim and Arab Egypt with its ancient history from the rest of the Arab and Islamic world and separate it from roots that are 60 centuries old, is this not indulging in belief in myths?

There are other questions that are difficult to answer in the short time it takes to write these lines but it is an established fact that Israel now stands alone against the whole world. It believes that it alone is right and the rest of humanity is wrong.

If this is not sheer madness then it is megalomania.

It is unfair to say that what the Israeli Government has done expresses the aspirations and dreams of the people or the Jewish peoples everywhere. Rather, it is only a handful of hardliners who believe in this.

But we must not forget that the most important thing that President al-Sadat's initiative has achieved is that it has proved that there is no other means than dialog. We have put aside arms as well as mistrust, fear, enmity, and blind rejection. This tremendous gain, which the generations after us will inherit, must not be wasted.

Therefore, the exchange of messages between the Egyptian and Israeli leaderships was a continuation of the dialog but in a different manner.

The suspension of these messages was but a kind of search for a different approach. Will the dialog to follow be between Egypt and Israel with a dialog between Israel and the United States followed by a dialog between the three parties?

The subject of the dialog will be very simple: the decision to annex Arab Jerusalem to Israel--an annexation which Israel believes to be legitimate and which we believe to be a violation of the Security Council Resolution, the Camp David agreement and international law.

We will not discuss now the draft law which [Knesset member] Guela Cohen will submit for the annexation of the Golan in October nor will we discuss the project to dig a 61-mile long canal between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea through occupied Arab territories because this would be premature.

EGYPTIAN OIL MINISTER ANNOUNCES NEW OIL STRIKES

NC041912 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1542 GMT 4 Sep 80

[Text] Ra's Gharib, 4 Sep (MENA)--Eng Ahmad 'Izz al-Din Hilal, deputy prime minister and oil minister, has announced that new oil discoveries have been made. He added that detailed statements will be made when the new wells begin to produce oil in commercial quantities.

Hilal affirmed that Egypt has entered the phase of serious oil services, because Egypt is now drilling its own wells. In the past, foreign companies alone made such drillings. He said that Egypt wants to fulfill its objective of producing 1 million barrels of oil daily.

Hilal was speaking at a ceremony marking the beginning of the operation of the huge oil rig (Senefro), which is the property of the Egyptian drilling company. The rig is a whole city floating on the high seas; it is capable of working in 225-foot deep water.

The ceremony was held in the Ra's Gharib area in the Gulf of Suez. It was attended by the members of the ministerial production committee, the chairmen of the People's Assembly industrial committee and the National Democratic Party committee, and executive and workers leaders in the oil sector. The ceremony was also attended by the Japanese ambassador in Cairo, who represented his country. It is worth noting that Japan built the rig at a cost of $30 million, drawn from the Japanese loan to Egypt.

Engineer Hilal noted that the new rig saves Egypt $26,000 daily, which was paid to foreign companies in the past in the form ofoil quantities. Furthermore, he stated, the rig provides workers with technical training opportunities, because all those working on the rig are Egyptians.

He said that another huge rig will arrive in Egypt next April. It is now being built in Japan at a cost of $40 million.

The minister pointed out that these rigs will not operate in the Gulf of Suez only. They will also operate in the Mediterranean Sea for the purpose of promoting oil development and exploration processes.

Engineer Hilal had begun his speech by conveying President al-Sadat's greetings to the oil sector workers and his congratulations on their diligent work. Engineer Hilal noted that new and joint Egyptian and foreign companies will be established to work in the oil industry. He said that this signifies that the economic open door policy is not just one for importing consumer commodities, but--and in reality--it is primarily a production open door policy.

AYATOLLAH BEHESHTI SEES DIFFERENCES WITH BANI-SADR AS HEALTHY SIGN

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 21 Aug 80 pp 1, 7

[Interview with Ayatollah Beheshti, Chairman of the Iranian Supreme Council; "Beheshti to AL-SAFIR: Our Differences With Bani-Sadr Are Healthy Phenomenon; Lebanese and Palestinians Must Unite Their Capabilities"]

[Text] Tehran--Ayatollah Beheshti is one of the main names on the Iranian political arena at present. He holds the official position of chairman of the Supreme Council, which is the highest judiciary position under the new regime. But his "actual" and more important position is that of being "the number one man" in the Islamic Republican Party and the main rival of Abol Hasan Bani-Sadr, the president of the republic.

Ayatollah Beheshti is a respected personality even though there is a lot of talk regarding his popularity, considering that President Bani-Sadr's circles focus on the weakness of this popularity. However, this doesn't seem to change things much so far. Beheshti's position in the existing main balances is an influential position, whether in the circle of Imam Khomeyni or in the important political circles of present-day Iran, be they the circles of the Consultative Council (of which he is not a member), the circles of the Council of Ulema [al-hawzah al-'ilmiyah] in Qom or other centers.

In the past, Ayatollah Beheshti was far from the lights. But in recent weeks, he has begun to appear in the media, both in the streets where posters supporting him have begun to show on Tehran's walls or in the press, the radio and the television. But so far, he rarely speaks to the non-Iranian media.

AL-SAFIR has conducted this interview with him at his office in the Supreme Court (Diwan 'Ami).

In this interview, Beheshti has discussed the disagreement between the Republican Party and Bani-Sadr, Mohammad Ali Rajai whom the party has imposed on the president of the republic by virtue of its majority in the Consultative Council, Iran's Arab relations, the Iranian position toward the Soviet Union and its position toward southern Lebanon.

[Question] It is the opinion of many that Rajai's government will not last long because of its being "a de facto" government imposed on the president of the republic by the majority in the Consultative Council. Do you think so?

[Answer] It is difficult to talk affirmatively about something that hasn't happened yet. But hope for the success of brother Rajai's government is very strong.

[Question] President Bani-Sadr is raising the banner of the "tolerant Islam" and of defending the liberties in his disagreement with the Islamic Republican Party. This slogan contains an explicit accusation that you represent the radical religious current confronting the private and public liberties.

[Answer] It is the opinion of the Islamic Republican Party that observation of the liberties permitted by the constitution is the duty of everybody, be he President Bani-Sadr or anybody else. Therefore, the disagreement cannot be over this point. The disagreement is over preserving the pure Islamic system versus the tolerance that opens a door or a mini-door for the influence of the non-Islamic systems in the Islamic republic. The party and the majority underline their rejection of this and stress the need to preserve the pure Islamic system. All intellectual and practical movement and all the dynamism must be within the framework of the pure Islam. Dynamism is something that we welcome whereas opening the door to the thinking alien to Islam is something that we prohibit and fight.

[Question] You have talked about the "un-Islamic systems" that you reject. What do you mean?

[Answer] Yes, there is a mixture of Islam and capitalism, a mixture of Islam and socialism or a mixture of Islam and secularism and there are factions inclined toward each of these mixtures, thinking that it is Islam. It must be stressed that government employees, teachers and similar people who have an impact on determining the content and form of the modern Islamic social system must have a purely Islamic thinking and must abide practically by the tasks of the Muslim. However, the others should be given an opportunity to express their opinions in the intellectual meetings and symposiums on the various issues. Every man will thus have the freedom to express and defend his opinion and to hear the various other opinions. This constitutes a free election [intikhab] of every opinion on the one hand and a preservation of the Islamic identity of the revolution and of the regime on the other hand [sic.]

Disagreement With Bani-Sadr

[Question] There is an opinion that says that the disagreement between the party and President Bani-Sadr is more than a difference of views on the system of Islamic rule and that it is a struggle in whose light the nature of the political authority of the future Iran will be determined.

[Answer] In any case, we believe that the broad religious and political bloc which is making great strikes and playing an important role inside and outside the Consultative Council must be represented in a position of power. Any reaction on the part of this bloc is for the sake of God, may He be praised, and for the sake of avoiding war to get political power. However, this bloc will continue its struggle to achieve the pure and advanced Islamic system. The efforts exerted should not be considered a loss. "Man is a loser, except for him who has believed and has done good deeds and has advocated what is right and preached patience." [Loose translation of Koran phrase]

[Question] The revolution's triumph is not 2 years old yet. However, many heads have fallen in the political struggles that have erupted since the overthrow of the shah. Are these disagreements, including the current disagreement between you and President Bani-Sadr, a healthy phenomenon in the course of the Iranian revolution?

[Answer] In fact, if the reason behind this disagreement was personal, then the disagreement would not be a healthy phenomenon but rather a sickness suffered by the revolution and its makers. But if the cause of the disagreement is the wish to underline preservation of the pure Islamic entity of the revolution, then such disagreement is healthy and it strengthens the revolution and makes it sounder and more active. Every revolution that has lost part of its original intellectual identity and that has allowed foreign intellectual identities to oppose its rule has exposed itself to elimination from within and from outside. God forbid that this should happen to our Islamic revolution.

Four Priorities

[Question] What are the priorities of the program on whose basis the forthcoming government will rule and how do you view the matter in your capacity as leader of the majority in the Consultative Council?

[Answer] First, I do not consider myself leader of the majority in the Islamic Consultative Council because thinking and action in our bloc are collective and not individualistic and because the leadership is collective and not individualistic. Second, the priorities of our program are:

A. Use of the revolutionary youth who have pure faith in Islam and who are trained in a revolutionary manner to run the government.

B. Stress on the cultural revolution in its comprehensive sense.

C. Stress on mature and successful economic planning in agriculture, industry and trade according to the modern method whose principles we have outlined in the constitution.

D. Establish a strong cultural, political, economic and ethical Islamic movement that will have an impact on preserving the moral and social personality in a manner compatible with Islam so that our youth may become a progressive revolutionary Muslim generation that loves the jihad [holy struggle], that fears no danger and that desires no entertainment that hinders man from proceeding toward God, may He be praised, and from struggling for His sake.

[Question] Do you think that the current phase in Iran is the phase of laying down the foundations of the state or the phase of the priority of spreading the call for revolution in the Islamic world?

[Answer] I personally find no conflict between these two tasks.

Relations With Soviets

[Question] It is said that nearly 3,000 Soviet experts are working in Iran. It is well-known that there is an economic cooperation agreement concluded between the two countries. On the other hand, there is a deep disagreement between Iran and the Soviet Union over many issues, foremost of which is the issue of Afghanistan. What is the truth of the relations between the two countries and how do you view the future of these relations?

[Answer] We prefer to have constructive relations between us and the various peoples. However, we stress preservation of the Islamic values and ideology, not only in writing but also in deeds and in reality. As long as the economic and political relations are subject to the clear Islamic positions, they will last. As soon as such relations require us to concede our concern for these [Islamic] values, we will preserve the values, even if at the expense of abandoning the relations.

Southern Lebanon

[Question] You are aware of the situation in southern Lebanon. How do you view the matter and do you have a special position insofar as the relations between the Shi'ites and the Palestinians in that area are concerned?

[Answer] The truth is that the responsibility of defending southern Lebanon is the responsibility of every Muslim. We wish the circumstances allowed us to do more toward this responsibility than we are doing at present. I ask the Lebanese brothers in Jabal 'Amil and the Palestinian brothers to unite their capabilities against the Zionist enemy. I also ask them not to disappoint their brothers in the struggle against the infidel enemy.

[Question] It is well-known that Iran enjoys positive relations with some Arab countries. Does the improvement of these relations have, in your view, special significance to Iran or is Iran interested only in concentrating its positive ties with Syria, Libya, Algeria and the PLO alone?

[Answer] We stress on positive relations between us and the Muslim peoples. But a few regimes dominating these peoples have stood as a stumbling block between the revolutionary Iranian Muslim people and the fraternal Muslim peoples that are being persecuted by the tyrannical rule of their governments.

All these peoples must rise against the tyrannical rule dominating them, against world imperialism and against Zionism that is allied with this imperialism.

I have a word to address to all the Muslim youth in Lebanon: Rise with God's will, clear your conscience, prepare all your capabilities and unite your ranks against your enemy and God's enemy. Know that God will give you victory and do not fear the enormous military and economic capabilities that your enemy possesses. The experience of modern history is enough to confirm the belief that a revolutionary and faithful people can trample and overcome such capabilities. God is worthier of your fear if you are believers.

[Question] We read in the Iranian publications certain criticism of the Palestinian policy. Some of this criticism censures the Palestinian revolution for something which may consider unrealistic, namely the failure of this revolution to adopt the Islamic ideology. We noticed a few days ago that Jalal-al-Din al-Farisi, your colleague in the Republican Party, answered this criticism, urging the Iranians to appreciate the special circumstances of the Palestinians and not to embarrass them with the slogan of "neither eastern nor western." Do the statements of al-Farisi, who is closely connected with you, reflect your view and how do you evaluate the Iranian-Palestinian relations under the present circumstance?

[Answer] Beheshti declined to answer this question

UNEMPLOYMENT, ECONOMIC ISSUES DISCUSSED BY BANI-SADR

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 22 Aug 80 pp 5, 6

[Text] President Abol Hassan Bani Sadr, accompanied by a number of Majles representatives, left Tehran for an inspection tour of Kerman. Accompanying him are representatives from Kerman, Birjand, Gonbad, Tabas, Ferdows and Torbat-e Jam. Also accompanying the President are his cultural and legal advisors.

The aircraft, carrying the President and his party, landed at Kerman airport at 11:30 am. Welcoming the President at the airport were the governor general of the Kerman Province, and high civilian and military officials. Immediately after his arrival, Bani Sadr left for Takhti stadium in the city.

The President was greeted at the stadium by the Imam's representative in Kerman, Hojjatoleslam Ja'fari, who praised Bani Sadr for the appointment of Raja'i as the head of the government, calling him fit for the job. He also added that the Moslem people of Kerman expected the President to take proper action regarding security in the city. He then called for unity and cooperation in the Islamic community and called for eradication of unemployment in the country. This was followed by the shouts of "Bani Sadr, Bani Sadr, we support you," which filled the stadium, after which people chanted "Bani Sadr, Bani Sadr, God be with you."

In his speech at the stadium, Bani Sadr said he hoped that people in Kerman would strive to advance and rebuild, saying that the nation faced similar problems everywhere.

Bani Sadr pointed out that during his visit to Khorramabad he had received 990 letters from people 65 percent of which concerned economic problems. Security, he said, was the second important problem which, he said, must be solved by legal means instead of by force. He said that resorting to force could make the revolution meet the fate of other revolutions. He said he believed there was another method for taking care of the security problem, that of going everywhere, meeting people, exchanging views in free debates and creating a sort of Islamic order by an informed public and establishing a spirit of brotherhood everywhere. Thus, an informed public and society would abandon the use of force and destructive methods. If we succeed by adopting this approach, our Islamic revolution will be the first in the history to have achieved its ultimate.

Referring to economic problems, Bani Sadr talked about the reopening of various plants in the country, saying that if the government was expected to do all that over the country how could it be expected to tackle other more serious and basic problems. He said that every individual in the country must do his part.

Our success in Iran today depends on being able to inform the public of all that is happening in the country, the President said. He declared that as far as he was concerned, he was prepared to do his job in rebuilding the country through basic and fundamental changes which, he believed, was not possible without advanced planning.

The President concluded by emphasizing the importance of spirituality, saying that resolving the many problems the country was faced with and setting up an Islamic government were quite impossible without planning. He noted that spirituality was one of the most fundamental conditions for the implementation of comprehensive planning.

The President then talked about the setting up of the Organization for Scientific and Industrial Development. He said that talented individuals with creative minds will be asked to join the organization to help build an independent and prosperous Iran, self-sufficient and free from foreign domination.

DISSENSION FORESEEN WITHIN ISLAMIC REPUBLIC PARTY

[Text] According to reports from Tehran, criticism from within the Islamic Republic Party of Mohammad Ali Raja'i, the Party's candidate for Prime Minister, who was nominated despite Bani Sadr's disapproval, have already begun. His most important critic has been Jalaleddin Farsi, the party's theoretician.

Farsi has declared that preference of Mohammad Ali Raja'i over the Islamic ideals is contrary to the country's political and economic necessities. He has declared that "a true Moslem is one who is able to create a balance between Islam and education."

Such criticism had so far been reserved for the moderates. Bani Sadr had expressed his lack of enthusiasm for the selection of Raja'i but agreed to his appointment because the Islamic Republic Party held a majority in the Majles.

Foreign Minister Sadeq Qotbzadeh has indicated he will not join the government formed by Raja'i, and, despite the fact that Jalaleddin Farsi had said he was not seeking any position in the new government, his name is being mentioned as the possible new foreign minister.

Farsi had been the first choice of the Islamic Republic Party for the premiership but had been rejected by Bani Sadr. Farsi, who had served with the Palestinians, and was a popular candidate for President, withdrew his candidacy at the last moment due to his Afghan origin.

Raja'i, who was supposed to introduce his cabinet yesterday, has said his ministers will be committed to Islam one hundred percent.

Referring to repeated statements by Raja'i in the past that he will be following the line of the Imam, Farsi has said that this alone was not sufficient for one to become prime minister. "Many claim to be followers of the Imam's line and, therefore, should qualify to become prime minister."

On Wednesday, Bani Sadr issued a decree appointing Raja'i as the new head of the government. He was told that his first task was to establish unity in the country. Raja'i was scheduled to present his government to the Majles Thursday, yesterday. The delay in doing so is said to have been the result of differences between him and some members of the Islamic Republic Party. Party members had wanted that all, or at least the majority of the new cabinet members, be chosen from among the party members.

HOSTAGE ISSUE, SHAH'S DEATH DISCUSSED BY MAJLES DEPUTY

[Text] Majid Ansari, Consultative Assembly representative, said during an interview: The shah's death is something which has now come to pass. However, there is another issue more important than the shah's death which is occurring in the United States today. In connection with the issue you raised, the shah's death was something foreseen from the very first day. We were sure that the United States would not deliver the shah. The reason for this was that the shah's delivery would have meant delivering documents and crimes of the United States itself, and would have meant disgracing all the presidents who had supported the shah. We knew from the first day that the United States would play around so that perhaps the hostages would be freed; if they were not freed, they would at last kill the shah. I personally consider it very unlikely that the shah's death was a natural one, particularly when we see that the United States waits until the Majles is convened, and when it is on the verge of deciding, the United States does this so that perhaps the Majles will reduce their demands.

Furthermore, the shah's death is nothing to us, it is an ordinary matter. The important issue is that we will show no deviation whatsoever in relation to the hostages, although the shah is now dead. Very well, the shah's wealth exists, these associates of the shah, close associates of the shah who are plotting against the revolution today, exist. Again, for the sake of the Islamic spirit and the imam's commands, we will make this concession, i.e. that they return the close associates of the shah who are busy plotting, and similarly all the nation's wealth that he stole and placed in foreign banks.

We will free the hostages with a degree of reduction in our demands. Otherwise, the Islamic Consultative Assembly will even make a firm stand, and God willing, the hostage issue and their trial will be raised, and the Majles will take the appropriate decision.

In any case the issue is that the Iranian nation must prepare itself to struggle with the United States. The nation will not be expecting us to return the hostages and let the United States come and kiss the nation's face and make up, this is impossible. If we retreat, the United States will advance. God willing, our struggle with the United States will continue until the world is free from the domination of the U.S. government and every other superpower.

Today the United States strives to display the hostage issue as a fundamental issue, while this is not so. The hostage issue is a minor problem and our position in relation to it is explicit. If we give them the hostages the background of this issue will be destroyed.

If they act as they have promised, we will give them the hostages, and in this way we are victorious and have not been defeated. If the United States surrenders to our words, we have advanced a step, and we will attack again.

Today the United States has the Palestinians and Jerusalem hostage. It has the Middle East hostage. It exploits all the Islamic nations of the world and because we are Moslems we must struggle for their deliverance.

When we struggle for Palestinian freedom, it means we are struggling against the United States. When we aid the Philippine and Eritrean Moslem fronts and other liberation movements, we are battling with the United States. It is not only an issue of hostage-taking.

Ansari added: The United States with its imperialistic essence is always plotting, and until the time that the imam's line and the revolution's line have been drawn to compromise, it will go on plotting. Our war with the United States is perpetual. Our revolution in its foundation and essence is in opposition to U.S. imperialism and all world imperialism. One problem is U.S. stupidity, stupidity meaning that they want to lay plans here based on their own materialistic standards. They do not know and ignore the fact that essentially it is spirituality which carries our revolution forward. In their fantasies they think that if they make a coup d'etat and kill four persons, the people will be frightened and stay quiet, just like the fantasies which caused the Rey Cinema and the Kerman mosque and...to be set on fire, and 17 Shahrivar [8 September 78] was brought about. Imagining that the nation will be frightened. But they cannot comprehend the spirituality ruling our revolution nor the blessing of martyrdom which is the wish of all of us.

But that which is real and which makes the United States hopeful of carrying out a coup d'etat is the existence of counterrevolutionaries in Iran. These elements are in the army. Elements associated with the former regime are plentiful in the army, and the army must be completely purged. Although we approve the army as a whole, and it must be approved, there are Savakists in it who unfortunately were not crushed after the revolution and who were strengthened by some officials. There are persons who have been harmed by this revolution and whose interests are endangered in some way, and who furthermore cannot be in those slimy materialistic programs.

There are leftist groups who in the imam's words are U.S. leftists, those tied to the east and west. There are holders of deviationist leftist thoughts, and even leftists pretending to be Moslems who have formed a coalition to act with them and have adopted a hypocritical attitude.

They are all elements who have made efforts to weaken the leadership and the Islamic republic domestically, and have prepared an area of hope for the United States. The path to collision with them is definite. We must decisively confront the plotters.

The true school of Islam believes in free discussion one hundred percent, and respects this kind of thing. However, discriminations must be made. It is not possible to hold free talks and discussions with everyone. Boundaries must be determined. There is the obscene Feda'i-ye Khalq group which has directly declared war against the Islamic Republic of Iran and whose weapons the entire disturbance in Kordestan revolves. What talks can we hold with them, and upon what issue can we come to an agreement with them? With someone for whom the issue is truly not clear and who has an opinion, fine, we will sit down and talk. But whenever we feel that they are plotting in the wings of this discussion, and that they account free discussion as a rostrum for their propagandizing, we must prevent this. People are important, and people must not listen to these rumors and provocations.

The people vigilantly neutralize the efforts that U.S. agents make inside the country, such as creating shortages and producing a lack of security and creating an unfavorable atmosphere on the basis of rumors. I am certain, God willing, that with the spirit governing the revolution, as the imam says, the United States cannot do a darn thing, even though it lays plans for a hundred coup d'etats. As the imam says, an airplane which takes off is compelled to land, and it is this nation which will stand up against that airplane with its fists.

If they had wanted to be able to do something with a coup d'etat force, they would have had to do it with the army that they held, the Savakists they had, and with Mohammad Reza. They were not able to then, and now it is definite, unless, God forbid, differences develop among the people, and officials, instead of thinking about the struggle with imperialism and about the revolution, fall into a power struggle.

These matters cannot be a suitable field for a U.S. plot. An individual whom we say is in the U.S. line does not necessarily have U.S. identification papers. We have no more than two lines: Islam and non-Islam. Whatever is not in an Islamic direction is non-Islamic, and today whatever is to the advantage of the United States, whether or not it supports the Soviet Union or China or whomever, is non-Islamic.

GENERAL PALIZBAN'S COUP OPERATION DESCRIBED

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 2 Sep 80 p 13

[Text] Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt Supplied Financial Aid to the Shah's Affiliates and Mercenaries.

Palizban, Bakhtiar and Ashraf Gave Speeches for the Mercenaries at Iraq's Military Camps.

Kermanshah--KEYHAN reporter: In the course of the operations of the recent abortive coup in Iran, some 20,000 mercenaries in the West of the country were scheduled to move on Qasr-e Shirin, Eslamabad and Kermanshah on Palizban's order.

KEYHAN's reporter despatched to Eslamabad from Kermanshah has been talking to a group of the deceived members of the Qolkhani tribe. This tribe has recently returned to Iran from Iraq at the behest of the Devouts of the Imam. So far some 2,500 members of this tribe have arrived in Iran and given up their arms.

Haji Tahmasebi, in charge of the Headquarters of the Devouts of the Imam, spoke to KEYHAN about the manner of organizing of the headquarters on the border strip. After the counterrevolution used the Qolkhani tribe and had the members of this tribe hired by Palizban and Oveysi for sabotage work inside Iran, an organized group of the Qolkhani tribesmen who had preserved their solidarity with the Islamic Republic were called on to close ranks with a number of non-natives and with the Revolutionary Guards Corps to form the Organization of the Devouts of the Imam. After the formation of this organization, some 50 members of the "committed" people of the region banded together within this organization and tried to disrupt the air of suspicion among the Qolkhani tribes people toward the Islamic Republic of Iran and toward the purging of the areas in the grip of the counterrevolutionaries. They succeeded in this disruption.

In his interview with KEYHAN's special correspondent, Haji Tahmasebi added that long before the coup d'etat "we found out that persons like Palizban, Oveysi and Bakhtiar intended to use the tribes of this region. We, therefore, diverted all our energies and efforts to this region." Haji Tahmasebi added, "We gave frequent speeches in the region and gave the people political awareness." The Qolkhani peasants were told "Be alert! They want to use you for the criminal United States and its stooges Saddam Hussein and the like of Palizban and Oveysi." This was the way "we countered the coup," he said. The supervisor of the Devouts of the Imam added, "Also by re-organizing the Devouts of the Imam and by strengthening their organization we managed to attract into our fold group after group of those people who had been deceived; those who aimed their weapons at us until yesterday have now joined us. Our force has thus burgeoned to 1,300 strong."

It was thus that the conspiracy was foiled at the scheduled time, Tahmasebi said. "At present, group after group of the deceived Qolkhani tribesmen join us and our organization expands extensively. By setting up cooperative societies and enlisting the support of the Reconstruction Campaign Organization, we have made efforts to obviate the problems of the region. Our force has restored tranquility in the region since four months ago. We have covered under our security umbrella a vast area extending from Salas Babajani to Qasr-e Shirin."

In conclusion Tahmasebi said, "We gave the counterrevolutionaries five days to surrender their arms. Failing to do so, they will be in for the most severe punishment and we shall confront them in the harshest manner."

Seyyed Nasreddin Heydari, the leader of the Society of the Patrons of Righteousness (Jame'e Ahl-e Haqq) who carried a letter announcing the allegiance of a group of Qolkhani folks, numbering around 2,500, talked to KEYHAN's despatched reporter. He said, "The shah's regime sent a number of the Qolkhani tribesmen to Sar-e Pol-e Zahab town during the revolution as club-wielders by offering them money and by threatening and intimidating them. In the ensuing clashes there a number of people were killed and wounded. This angered the people against the Qolkhani tribe and they blocked their supply and transit route. The puppet government of Iraq availed of the opportunity and befriended a large number of the tribesmen by supplying them with provisions and weapons."

Regarding the place of training of the deceived and counterrevolutionary groups he said, "The counterrevolutionaries are receiving military training in various camps from fugitive officers (of the previous Iranian regime) and from the agents of the Iraqi Ba'thists." But he pointed out that their most important training camp was located at Charkolav. The families of the trainees, he said, were kept in a separate area as hostages until such a time when their husbands and relatives carried out their missions and returned to their camps.

The religious leader of the Society of the Patrons of Righteousness also spoke about funds funneled to "these mercenaries" and said that the monies were primarily supplied by the affiliates of the shah. But, he added, it had recently been arranged for them to receive financial assistance from Arab reactionary countries such as Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Jordan via Iraq.

Concerning the strengthening of the Ba'thist Iraqi armed forces with support from Arab armies, Seyyed Nasreddin Heydari said, "The groups returning to Iran say that a force put together by Jordan, Kuwait and Egypt has entered Iraq and been deployed on the borders, although these countries are opposed to Oraq on certain scores."

In conclusion he pointed out that Iraq had heavily counted on Qolkhani tribe--comprising of some 20,000 households. However, the tribesmen did not deign to become mercenaries. Many of them, he added, had written letters and expressed willingness to declare allegiance to the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Nosoor Khosravi, one of the tribesmen who has joined the rank of the Devouts of the Imam together with 50 members of his clan said, "The Iraqi Ba'thist agents deceived us. They promised us money and weapons." Every day, he added, a counterrevolutionary lectured to the tribespeople. "One day it was Palizban, another day it was Bakhtiar and later it would be Ashraf." However, he added, when a group of the Devouts of the Imam visited their villages they realized that all the propaganda of the counterrevolutionaries had been false. "That was how," he said, "we embraced the Islamic Republic of Iran which we shall support to the last drop of our blood."

Hatam Arzhang, another member of the Qolkhani tribe who had been contacted by the counterrevolutionaries, said that one day they went to him and told him, "Bring one hundred men and receive a monthly salary of nine thousand tumans from us." But, he said, he did not accept the money and instead volunteered to join the Devouts of the Imam at its headquarters in Kermanshah.

Hamid Nameh'i, a vigilante in the region, too, said, "I ask the brothers who have been taken in not to be deceived by Imperialism. The monies that are supplied to you is the blood money of all the martyrs of the cause of freedom."

HEAD OF CENTRAL BANK DISCUSSES MAJOR ECONOMIC ISSUES

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 20 Aug 80 pp 8, 9 10

[Text] In a press, radio and TV interview, the head of the Central Bank of Iran, Ali Reza Nowbari, discussed issues such as retirement and forced retirement plan for employees of banks, foreign exchange reserve, effect of the reduced oil export, unemployment and the return to Iran of the former shah's wealth.

With reference to the order issued by Imam Khomeyni to the effect that Iranian workers in the Persian Gulf area were religiously duty-bound to sell their foreign exchange earnings to the Central Bank, Nowbari said:

"Workers in the Persian Gulf area should not bring Iranian currency with them to Iran because their money will be confiscated at the airports and at the border and, according to regulations, it will not be returned to them. This had created a lot of headache for both the bank and our Iranian brother workers."

On the retirement plan and the forced retirement of bank employees, the head of the Central Bank said: "The plan is designed to determine the fate of those employees whose services are no longer needed by their respective organizations. Under the new plan, employees with 15 years of service could be made to retire by another 10 years to their service."

He said that under the new plan retirement of those with 25 years of service is mandatory. He also said that payment of 2,000,000 rials had been considered to employees who will be forced to retire.

Concerning foreign exchange reserve and the effect of the reduced oil export, the head of the Central Bank said: "Oil export during the month of Tir [22 June-22 July] had reached 570,000 barrels a day, which is a very small figure in view of the country's economic needs and budgetary calculations for the fiscal year 1359 [21 March 80-20 March 81]."

He said that under these conditions the nation's budgetary deficit will be three to four times higher than was expected, which is a serious threat to the nation's economy and will put the country in a financial squeeze. But he added that the issue was not an economic problem but a political one requiring political solution.

Regarding unemployment, he said that some 700,000 young labor force had entered the market this year without any plans for their absorption.

On returning the wealth of the deposed shah to Iran, the head of the Central Bank said that legal measures had been taken for the return to Iran of 32 billion tumans the deposed shah had stolen from the nation's treasury. He added that the pursuing of the matter required favorable political atmosphere.

Speaking about Iranian workers in the Persian Gulf area who are paid in foreign exchange, the head of the Central Bank said that these workers had preferred to exchange their earnings through private exchange dealers at a higher rate, higher than that of the Central Bank.

This made it possible for the foreign exchanges earned by Iranian workers to be smuggled to America, Europe and elsewhere. In its place, Iranian currency was being brought back to the country by the same workers which, in turn, created two basic problems.

One was that it helped supporters of the old regime with foreign exchange and the money left the country. Another problem concerned workers themselves. As we know, regulations do not permit anyone to bring into the country foreign exchange in excess of equivalent of 2,000 tumans. Many workers bring much more which very often is confiscated at the airports, putting great pressure on them.

Imam Khomeyni has granted permission to purchase foreign exchange from these workers at a lower rate provided they sell their exchanges through official Iranian bank branches of the Central Bank only.

Nowbari further added that by this method Iran will be able to earn between 200 to 300 million tumans additional income every year. But he said that the additional income was not the main thing. The important issue, he said, was the creation of a second source of foreign exchange reserve.

He noted that the goal was the adoption of a method to earn up to one billion tumans a year in foreign exchange in order to set up a second source of reserve, second to that of oil.

He announced that all Iranian bank branches in the Persian Gulf area had been mobilized to handle the purchasing foreign exchange from Iranian workers and transferring a substantial amount of the purchased exchange to their families in Iran. This will be done, he said, with the help of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Regarding the forced retirement plan of the bank employees, he said that it had been approved by the banks' General Assembly which is composed of 6 cabinet ministers, and was something similar to that of the government with the exception that the plan for the banks had its own peculiar problems because a number of banks had been part of the private sector and had then been nationalized by the government.

Therefore, he said, there were differences in pay and benefits between state banks and the previously private ones, and the main problem now was to merge them [into a single system].

He said that the new plan allows bank managers to retire those employees who feel they could engage in productive activities by paying them for their years of services in their respective banks.

ARMY INVESTIGATION PUT ON FIRMER FOOTING

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 20 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] The Seminar on Studying and Selecting a New Investigation System for Military Agencies was held at the Inspection Office of the Ministry of Defense. Attended by the representatives of the three branches of the armed forces and the Ministry of Defence and the General Staff, the Seminar is now underway.

The manner of the dismantling of the inspection system of the army which is considered to be a legacy of the previous oppressive regime of Iran is on the seminar's agenda. The obsolete system made only for misappropriation of the taxpayer's money and for burgeoning the bureaucratic machinery and for specious show-off. The system is not compatible with the humane and Islamic spirit of the Islamic Revolution of Iran. It, therefore, has to be superseded by a new system which meets the need of the Islamic Revolution.

Secondly, the new system, which is yet to be put together, should be armed with a revolutionary, Islamic and humane spirit. In order to be thus armed, the system in question should be primarily equipped with a spirit of piety and expertise. These two qualities are mutually inclusive. The army should train such inspectors who besides being expert are endowed with the spirit of piety, sincerity and purity.

Third on the agenda is the manner in which these inspections are carried out and an atmosphere of harmony is created in the relationships between the various units of the army, on the one hand, and between the army and revolutionary institutions such as the Revolutionary Guard Corps, on the other. Inspection was a managerial tool, the seminar was told. If there were healthy and bona fide inspections, then productivity and efficiency would rise commensurately. Therefore, to ensure that the army inspection interfaced with revolutionary, Islamic and humane criteria, and in order to ensure that the army met the Islamic revolutionary requirements, radical changes would have to be introduced in the army inspection system.

The representatives of the tripartite forces and of the Ministry of Defence and the General Staff spoke about the problems and the inadequacies beleaguering their respective units. Enumerating the problems they also put forth solutions for making up the deficiencies.

The seminar is scheduled to make the outcome of its deliberations known to the Iranian public through a resolution on 8 Shahrivar [30 August].

At the closing of yesterday's session of the seminar, Col Aziz Dizaji, Chief of the Inspection Department of the Ministry of Defense and Secretary of the Islamic Association of the Military Personnel talked to KEYHAN's reporter. He said, "Our Islamic revolution has grown several months old but it is most regrettable that the laws governing the army do not yet fit the spirit of the Islamic Revolution." For instance, he said, in the unit that he served, the thinking, approach and tastes applied to the matter of inspection were not Islamic at all. "We, therefore, thought," he said, "a seminar should be organized to assess and assign an Islamic inspectorate system in the army to ensure that the inspection system of the army has an Islamic and human character." The seminar, he said, was underway and "we are confident that it will bear positive and desirable fruit."

Referring to the characteristics of an Islamic inspection he said, "Previously, under the oppressive regime, inspection was a convenient and hypocritical means at the disposal of the chiefs of the army so that they would be entitled to receiving considerable rewards by scoring the 100 mark." With such externalism, they tried to sweep under the carpet the harsh realities and the deprivation rampant in the army, he said. They indeed made quite a job of it. We had a straw army and an impious one at that, he added. Now that the revolution has succeeded, we should pay more attention to the "contents" rather than the "container"; we should build an ideologically oriented army.

To achieve this, in Col Dizaji's view, first of all we should identify the faults. He added, if we try to remove the wrongdoer without understanding the wrong, that wrong will stay with us forever. Inspection should, therefore, make for guidance and supervision. In other words we should seek out the faults, understand them, analyze them and, in order to arrive at fundamental constructiveness, we should put forth corrective solutions.

Asked if he cooperated with the Ideology Section of the army, the Inspectorate Chief of the Defence Ministry said that each section of the army worked independently. Undoubtedly, he said, there should be a measure of cooperation and coordination among various sections. He said that what his unit did was to establish order and discipline among the various productive units of the army. The operations of various units, he explained, are kept under observation and control. In order to prevent the various inspection functional areas from clashing or overlapping and in order to have inspection duties well covered, he said, we should establish coordination among the inspection sections of various governmental and even non-governmental organizations.

Citing a case of cooperation between the inspection section of the army and the revolutionary institutions, Col Dizaji said, some time ago one of the committees informed us that some people were trying to transport the army's electronic equipment abroad. We went into action immediately and saw that they wanted to take the army's electronic equipment out of the country. We prevented that and put the thieves under arrest. Col Dizaji expressed hope that the system that would be announced after the conclusion of this seminar would put an end to the many problems now besieging the armed units.

SHAH'S LAST CHIEF OF STAFF DEFENDS ACTIONS

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 19 Aug 80 pp 13, 14

[Text] Several contradictory reports have so far been published regarding the role played by General 'Abbass Qarebaghi during the last days of the former regime and the early days of the new one. Up to now, the last chief of staff of the army of the deposed shah had not himself commented about the reports.

The army officer who, according to the opponent of the regime, was responsible for preventing the continuous bloodshed and the total disintegration of the armed forces, but, according to the supporters of the old regime, surrendered the army to revolutionaries, has sent us a statement which we are hereby publishing in its entirety. Should we receive additional information on the subject from our readers we will, no doubt, publish them as well.

"I am an Iranian. This is my motto. I am proud of my patriotism. My dear compatriots. My suffering buddies and you, the personnel of the armed forces who, under the rule and domination of the mullahs have been dishonored and humiliated. I am talking to you after 16 months in hiding and forced silence. I take my soldierly honor as my witness to talk to you, as always, truthfully. I have no doubt that history will be the judge and the truth will become known. I have written all the facts about the recent events in full detail which, after choosing a foreign country for my residence, will divulge the facts in a press interview first, and will then publish my notes so that the noble people of Iran could pass its judgement. These documents will provide logical and documented answers for the ill-informed but patriotic groups who, unlike today, were all out supporters of cooperation between the army and the people throughout the various stages of the revolution. After discovering the real nature of the revolution and the true identity of its leaders they were disheartened and now try to justify their cooperation and their sense of guilt by bringing false accusations against me. In my writings, I also answer those who know the secrets of the revolution and are aware of the behind the scene facts. This group is ill-intentioned and, for personal and private reasons, would like to smear my integrity and my soldierly honor by taking advantage of the situation and prevent me in my struggle aimed at ridding my dear country from the yoke and domination of the dark rule of the mullahs.

"My survival, which has been variously interpreted, by the grace of the Almighty, has been the result of an accident and devotion and sacrifices by honorable individuals whose identities should not be divulged at the moment for the sake of their security and protection.

Army Communique

"The Iranian army is responsible for the defense of the nation's independence and its territorial integrity. It has, so far, remained aloof in the internal turmoils and, by supporting the country's legal governments, has performed its duties in the best possible way. In view of the recent events in the country, the High Council of the army convened at 10:30 on 23 Bahman 1357 [11 Feb 79], and in order to prevent further chaos and bloodshed, it unanimously agreed to announce its neutrality in the present political disputes and ordered all army units to return back to their respective bases. The Iranian army has and always will support the will of the noble and patriotic people of the country.

The above communique was, no doubt, a logical response by the armed forces to the wishes of the nation on that date. If the nation had not been able to foresee what treatment they were going to receive from the leaders of the revolution after coming to power in the name of the Islamic Republic, this held also true for the army commanders who, while giving in to the wishes of the people, were not able to predict how they would be treated by those who had revolted in the name of God and, at the same time, pretended brotherhood with the armed forces personnel. This concerns all segments of the Iranian society. Furthermore, nowhere in the communique was there a mention of the surrendering of the army garrisons. While giving general instructions regarding protection of the army garrisons at the end of the meeting, I personally ordered that the headquarters of the General Staff be defended by all forces after it had come under attack. I refer to the statements by Lt Gen Firuzmand made at the so-called Islamic Revolutionary Court which was printed in edition 69 of the ISLAMIC REPUBLIC newspaper on page 2 of Wednesday, 31 Mordad 1358 [19 Aug 79]. Relying on my 40 years of devoted services as a soldier I declare that at no time that I have been hiding I cooperated with any organization, council, political or clerical official. I disclaim all rumors and during the time I was in hiding in Iran I was never under the protection of officials of the present regime, political or religious.

In conclusion, I beg the noble people of Iran that until all the facts are known and are presented for public judgement refrain from having any doubt about my integrity. Greetings to the souls of the true martyrs of Iran. Long live the armed forces."

General 'Abbas Qarebaghi.

GENDARMERIE PERSONNEL ASKED FOR SELF-SACRIFICE

LD121048 Tehran Domestic Service in Persian 0930 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] The commander of the gendarmerie of the Islamic Republic of Iran issued the following statement today, addressed to all regions, regiments, posts, bases, training centers and other organizations of the gendarmerie of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

In his exalted name. My brothers: Today, our Islamic Revolution, our Islamic Republican country and our heroic nation need for self-sacrifice. Today, no element can keep us from carrying out our mission. Today--in front of the great leader of our Islamic Revolution and the Muslim nation of Iran--nothing but self-sacrifice could make us proud. Today, it is our blood that could be the guarantor of the stability of the regime of the Islamic Republic of Iran and of the exercise of its sovereignty. Today is the day of hopelessness for the enemies of the Islamic Revolution of Iran. Today is the day for the oppressed to overcome the world oppressors. Today is the day for striving, self-sacrifice and martyrdom. Therefore, considering the sensitivity of this period, as the commander of the gendarmerie of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I declare to all the gendarmerie personnel, including officers, NCOs, gendarmes, (?javanmard) and clerks that no one--under any pretext--may leave his position vis-a-vis the enemy, or surrender his weapon to the enemy, or commit any form of negligence or go-slow in the performance of his assigned duties.

Everybody should resist in face of any foreign aggressor, or any internal counterrevolutionary, until the last man and the last breath, and rub the snouts of every enemy and traitor.

My brothers, only one thing can save our honor and integrity: self-sacrifice. Naturally, he who shows courage, zeal and [words indistinct], deserves all kinds of encouragement and honor. But, he who adopts cowardice, fear and lack of zeal, deserves all forms of reprimand and the worst punishment.

This is my ultimatum to all you dear brothers, peace.

RIYADH BANKING CONFERENCE--'Ali Reza Nowbari, governor of the Central Bank of Iran, returned to Tehran last night after heading the delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the recent Riyadh conference of governors of central banks of Islamic countries. Nowbari told PARS the conference's objective was to seek appropriate means for economic, financial and banking coordination among Islamic countries. Nowbari added that we achieved comprehensive success at the conference in condemning the United States for having frozen Iranian assets deposited in U.S. banks. The governors of central banks of Islamic countries stated that this U.S. measure is a form of robbery disruptive of the international banking and monetary system. This is a great victory for us. Nowbari added that another result of the conference was the adoption of a policy that will enable Palestine to participate as an observer in the RMF meetings to be held in a month. He added that there are big and weighty opportunities for establishing an Islamic countries' common market similar to the EEC. FRG CAMPAIGN AGAINST MUSLIMS--The Bonn Government seems to be apprehensive these days over the increasing number of Muslims in the FRG. Most of these Muslims are immigrants, as the Germans who converted to Islam do not exceed 1,200. The FRG Government has no precise statistics available on the number of Muslims among immigrants to the FRG, most of these Muslims coming to the FRG to work. However, estimates which appear to be close to the truth indicate that the number of Muslims exceeds 1.5 million. Turks make up the greater number of these Muslims, coming to 1.3 million. The Yugoslavs, who are far behind, number 100,000 and are followed by Iranians, Arabs and Pakistanis. The FRG Government is apprehensive over such a spread of Islam since it fears that this would lead to the incitement of political disturbances. Indeed, the FRG press has lately launched a racist campaign against Islam under the justification that the rate of crime has increased in the areas where Muslims reside. PERSIAN GULF NAVAL EXERCISES--The 5-day exercises by the navy of the Islamic Republic of Iran which began in the warm waters of the Persian Gulf ended with complete success Wednesday. In the exercises the valiant soldiers of Islam demonstrated their heroic readiness to confront the aggression of the arch-Satan, the bloodsucking United States, and its allies in the area. They also demonstrated their readiness to defend Islam and Iran. [Text] [GF131555 Tehran International Service in Arabic 1500 GMT 13 Sep 80]

MINISTER DISCUSSES OIL PRICING, PRODUCTION, TIES WITH FRANCE

LD021525 London AL-DUSTUR in Arabic 25-31 Aug 80 pp 18-19

[Report on interview with Oil Minister Tayih 'Abd-al-Karim in Baghdad by 'Abd al-Wahhab al-Qaysi--date not given]

[Text] Baghdad--As this is the most important question being asked by all the people of the world, Tayih 'Abd-al-Karim was asked if there is a world energy crisis. He replied: First of all, I can say that there is no real energy crisis because what we are producing at present is more than the world oil market demands. It is over 50 percent more than what we were producing 2 years ago when a surplus of more than 3 million barrels was available daily in the market. The disappearance of this surplus is due to the strategic stockpiling being carried out by the major companies or the major consumer industrial states. The real shortage has not yet occurred but it is expected to occur in light of the increasing consumption of this strategic material.

By the end of this century the world will face a real shortage and crisis in the world oil market. It will also face a great imbalance between supply and demand because it will be difficult to meet the world's real consumption of this commodity in the next few years.

Asked about higher oil prices and the effect this has on the developing countries, 'Abd-al-Karim said: With regard to reconciling the sharp increase in prices, the problems of the developing states and world economic problems, any sharp increase and jump in oil prices will harm the economies of the developing states in particular. It will also cause confusion in the economies of the world states in general.

Iraq's policy, however, lies in effecting a gradual price increase which takes into consideration the rates of inflation and the rate of decline of the dollar on the basis of which our oil revenues are calculated. In other words, Iraq's price policy is against an upswing and a sharp increase in oil prices. Meanwhile, we are against freezing prices as long as rates of inflation continue to spiral because this inflation is exported to us in the form of commodities and technology.

'Abd al-Karim continued by talking about the aid Iraq is giving to the developing countries to cope with the increase in oil prices. He said: Iraq has given and continues to give long-term loans at token rates of interest or without interest to our friends and brothers in the Third World. Moreover, President Saddam Husayn has proposed the establishment of a world fund to help protect developing countries and the Third World states against oil price increases.

The proposal stipulates that the industrial states undertake to compensate the developing countries for every hike in oil prices and that all the funds that result from increases in the rate of inflation be distributed among the developing countries in the form of interest-free long term loans to enable them to meet their needs and protect their economies against inflation.

Asked about Iraq's oil deposits, 'Abd al-Karim said: Iraq is one of the states that has large deposits. I cannot give you a specific figure for this but we are making extraordinary efforts and intensive plans to conduct a geological and seismic survey of Iraq in order to determine the real size of deposits. This point was neglected in the past by the oil monopolies and before Iraqi oil was nationalized. I am receiving new figures about the size of deposits every day. I can say that Iraq is one of the states which has enormous deposits. In this respect I would like to cite President Saddam Husayn who said: One of the last two oil barrels produced in the world will be Iraqi.

'Abd al-Karim then emphasized the following fact: I would like to say that Iraq does not rely completely on oil, which is an exhaustible commodity. Iraq is a first class agricultural country. It has adopted the slogan: "Agriculture is perpetual oil." Iraq is now experiencing a major agricultural and industrial revolution.

I would also like to point out that during the Abbaside era Iraq's population numbered 30 million people who lived by agriculture despite the fact that their methods were primitive. If Iraq utilizes most of its land, the yield of wheat and barley will suffice the Arab homeland.

Iraq is earnestly trying to achieve this and it is working according to a large-scale plan in this respect. Iraq is an agricultural and industrial country.

AL-DUSTUR asked 'Abd al-Karim if Iraq is prepared to increase its oil production and if there is a specific plan in this direction. He said: Certainly. Iraq has programs to increase oil production. These plans are no longer connected with or subject to the world market demand. Our plan to increase our production capacity is subject to national criteria based on the revenues needed for our development plans, on our pan-Arab and international commitments toward our friends and brothers in the Arab homeland and on the situation in the world oil market. In our production policy we coordinate with the OPEC countries in order to create a state of balance between supply and demand and to avoid increases that would encourage to consumers [as printed] or an oil surplus that would upset prices. We are trying to establish an actual and practical balance between supply and demand.

[Question] However, we see clear differences in the prices charged by the OPEC countries? What is your position on this?

[Answer] Iraq does not approve of the policy of having different oil prices in OPEC; Iraq hopes that OPEC will achieve a standard price policy during its next meeting.

'Abd al-Karim went on to explain: Iraq does not see any need for exorbitant oil prices which are only exploited by the industrial states in order to export inflation.

[Question] The world has fears about the possibility of there being a great oil shortage. How do you view this?

[Answer] Within the next 2 years the world market will experience an oil shortage compared to demand. This will be due to diminishing deposits in the producing countries. By the end of the 1980's the shortage of oil supplies in the world market is expected to be from 6 to 10 million barrels daily--that is if the problem is not tackled seriously.

The industrial states must understand that the remedy rests in their hands. The remedy is to quickly find alternative resources to oil like coal and atomic and solar energy. Should the world experience such an oil shortage it would face real danger.

The talk then turned to France and the nature of economic and political relations between Iraq and France--relations which have provoked the interests of the world information media for a long time, especially after the two countries signed an oil agreement followed by an agreement on cooperation in the field of nuclear energy.

'Abd al-Karim said: My meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing and Prime Minister Raymond Barre was a pointer to the development of these relations. I sensed a true desire for more comprehensive cooperation between the two countries in their mutual interests. We aim to expand the horizons of cooperation so as to set an example to the industrial states and the developing states of the world and to strengthen the possibility of reaching greater understanding in the dialogue which we are trying to achieve between the north and the south--between the industrial world and the developing world--in order to establish a new economic system that is more just and equitable in the relations among the peoples of these states.

Asked what new agreements have been reached between the two countries, 'Abd al-Karim said: We have established the foundations of cooperation and have discussed the obstacles. What we have achieved is regarded as a step forward in the direction of deepening and expanding economic cooperation between the two countries. We have given France a privileged status since the nationalization of Iraqi oil in view of France's attitude toward Iraq and the Arabs.

As for giving preference to French commodities, this is subject to considerations and criteria which we adopt in the implementation of our projects or regarding the volume of the trade exchange--criteria based on competition, the quality of the commodity, advanced technology and the conditions for implementing the contract on schedule.

'Abd al-Karim went on to explain: The developed relations between the two countries are due to France's understanding of the Arab-Zionist conflict in the area and France's sympathy with the Arab fateful issues as well as its attitude, which is different from that of the rest of the European countries and the industrial world, toward our pan-Arab issues and the question of development in Iraq, and France's readiness to provide us with technology and to have its companies participate in the implementation of development projects in Iraq.

He concluded by saying: We are prepared to establish relations with the various states of the world irrespective of their political systems, in the light of the principle of respect for sovereignty, on the basis of equal relations and noninterference in internal affairs and in the light of the principles and aims in which we believe and use as a guide in our relations with all the states of the world to achieve our national interest and the sublime interests of our nation.

CP STATEMENT ON INTERNAL SITUATION CITED

LD150941 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 27 Aug 80 p 6

[Report: "Iraq-Repression at Home and Alinement With Arab Reaction"]

[Text] In a recent statement made by its Central Committee, the Iraqi Communist Party [ICP] expresses the view that "an internal struggle among the Iraqi Ba'th regime leadership is, in fact, taking place." The main result of an alleged coup against President Saddam Husayn last summer has been the execution of 31 current Ba'th Party leaders and the imprisonment of scores of military and civilian cadres and hundreds of activists, the ICP recalls, emphasizing that a "power crisis" is rampant in Baghdad.

At the same time, opposition is growing in Kordezstan, where most of the Iraqi army is mobilized making the entire region look like an occupied country.

In the south, the Saddam Husayn government is mainly opposed by Shi'ite Muslims, who represent some 60 percent of Iraq's total population.

Democrats--especially communists, Kurds and Shi'ites--are being put down by force. "Hundreds of death sentences are being imposed without trial. In addition, there have been deaths under torture, secret assassinations and large-scale liquidations which have even affected the army," the ICP states, disclosing that hundreds of opposition members were arrested in July 1980. Some of them have died under torture.

This is what happened to Jabbar Hadi, an ICP regional committee member for the Central Euphrates region; Ismail Khalil, a communist official whose body was returned to his family with bullet holes in his head; and Hani Wahhab, a communist worker who was run over by a "security" vehicle.

The list of names of imprisoned democrats about whom there has been no news for several weeks is long. Some of them have been arrested with their wives and young children.

Repression at home, rapprochement with the most reactionary Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, and increasing economic integration in the capitalist system--these are in short the main aspects of Baghdad's policy. "Some fabulous contracts with big multinational companies are being signed to the detriment of both the Iraqi people's real interests and a genuine development of the country's economy" (these contracts provide for supplies of arms, manufactured products and so forth), the ICP states.

In the oil sphere, Iraq has also made up its mind on whose side it stands. Apart from Saudi Arabia, it is the only country which has advocated within OPEC a crude oil price freeze and an increase in production merely to please big oil companies affected by Iran's and its own cutbacks "black gold" production. "In 1979, as a result of the sale of Iraqi crude at a price lower than that charged by other OPEC members except the Saudis, Iraq lost $8 billion," the ICP states. As for the big companies, they gained a similar amount!

Saddam Husayn's recent visit to Saudi Arabia sanctioned the Baghdad Ba'th regime's rapprochement with the Wahhabite monarchy and, consequently, "indirectly with the United States." "To make it possible to challenge Syria and other steadfastness front countries opposed to the Camp David accords (Algeria, Libya, Democratic Yemen and the PLO) within the Arab world, the Baghdad-Riyadh axis is to be extended and pass through Amman."

During the Baghdad Arab Peoples Conference (in March 1980), the ICP statement emphasizes, various attempts were made to spread discord not only within the "steadfastness front" but even within the Palestinian movement.

Furthermore, the statement concludes, "the Venice summit European initiative aimed at saving the essence of the Camp David accords' content and [word indistinct] Jordan and a few Palestinians in some dubious settlement has been encouraged and supported by the Iraqi Government."

OILFIELD BOMBINGS--Beirut, 13 Sep (AFP)--Two oilfield installations in northeast Iraq's Kirkuk Province were bombed on Wednesday, the Lebanese newspaper AL-SAFIR reported today. Quoting sources in Baghdad, the newspaper said that one of the blasts took place at a crude oil distributing center with a capacity of more than one-half million barrels daily. The other explosion was at a natural gas pumping station. The news sources attributed the blasts to the Islamic Al-Da'wah Party, which sympathizes with the Iranian revolution. The newspaper gave no details on the amount of damage. [Text] [NC130905 Paris AFP in English 0847 GMT 13 Sep 80]

NATION'S RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ANALYZED

TA051254 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 5 Sep 80 p 6

[Commentary by Hirsh Goodman: "Facing Facts"]

[Text] Premier Menahem Begin was apparently very upset when one of his interviewers on television's Moqed on Wednesday night implied that U.S.-Israel relations were at an all-time low. The prime minister was quite correct to cite both 1948 and 1956 as examples of lower ebbs; but what he forgot to mention was that never before were we so dependent on the United States on the one hand, and so isolated on the other.

He also failed to recognize that the "special relationship" that has been axiomatic in describing bilateral relations between Israel and the United States over the past 15 years, is being dissipated. And not necessarily because of the policies of the Begin government, but because of changing strategic realities that have led American policymakers to greener pastures.

While it is true that President Jimmy Carter, presidential aspirant Ronald Reagon and all manner of American officials continually rededicate America to upholding Israel's well-being and safeguarding its security, the reality unfolding behind the rhetoric gives cause for concern.

To be sure, the Begin government has made it easier for those in the White House, the Pentagon, the State Department and Congress to rationalize the gradual movement away from the special relationship.

The real reasons for the withdrawal, however, are far more complicated than a settlement here, the passage of a Jerusalem law there. And, with all due respect to the prime minister, who cited oil and petrodollars as the prime causes, they are not exclusively to blame for the state of affairs either. Constant reference to these is an over-simplification that only serves to divert attention from the actual challenges we face.

The reasons for the U.S. shift are manifold. Prime among them is the realization that the fulcrum of conflict in the Middle East has moved dramatically from the Mediterranean basin to the Persian Gulf. This has necessitated a search by the Americans for stable allies in the Gulf region, with Israel reduced to secondary importance in the strategic equation.

The Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty, coming within the same period as the rise of Khomeyniism in Iran, could not have been more propitious for the United States. Egypt was the strategic planner's dream, for conditions in the country, coupled with its geographical location, provided the precise constellation for the establishment of a U.S. bridgehead in the Gulf area.

Whether we like it or not, or whether or not we or the Americans are prepared to admit it, this new special relationship between Egypt and the United States must come at the expense of the old Israeli-U.S. model, especially as the three parties concerned are in the middle of a delicate negotiating process. The Egyptians suddenly find themselves holding a card they previously did not possess, while Israel's hand is clearly second best.

Furthermore, the Arab attitude to the Camp David Accords, and Egypt's almost total isolation in the Arab world, have provided both parties with the excuses they have been looking for to justify the relationship. When Israeli officials express concern over the flow of sophisticated weaponry to Egypt while the peace treaty is still in the embryonic stage and the possibility of war still exists, the U.S. answer is quick and logical.

Al-Sadat has to be protected, from both internal and external threat. The army has to be placated, and the upper echelons of the Egyptian bureaucracy have to be satisfied that the price Egypt is paying for the peace treaty is worthwhile. If the United States were to refuse elementary aid requests to an Egypt rejected by the Arab world, Al-Sadat would not last long. Needless to say, add the Americans, nor would the peace treaty.

This was recognized by 'Ezer Weizman, who as defense minister, also realized that it would be wise for Israel to become an active partner in the U.S. effort rather than be excluded. But he also realized that simultaneously, Israel had to stress its own strategic importance to the Americans, and work towards an Egyptian-Israeli axis.

It was in this context that he offered the Americans the use of Israeli bases countless times, almost to the point of national embarrassment, only to be refused. Israel, it seems, is simply not necessary at this juncture, and certainly not within the global consideration of the men sitting in America's strategic think-tanks.

The implications should have been clear to Israel when the Americans consistently refused to take Weizman up on his offer. Instead, they established bases in Egypt, Kenya and Somalia, where their establishment would not have the embarrassing political repercussions that building a base in Haifa or Ashdod would have had. That would not only have caused a further rift with Arab allies such as Saudi Arabia and Jordan, but would have virtually precluded any U. . overture to Iraq.

The latter's importance has increased both because it is sitting on the second-largest known reservoir of oil, and because it lies at the heart of the region and has common borders with Iran, Syria, Jordan, Kuwait, Turkey and Saudi Arabia.

In the light of these facts Israel has met growing difficulties in arguing the thesis that it is of vital strategic importance to the United States. This was demonstrated clearly in April, when Israel was totally excluded from the plan to rescue the U.S. hostages in Iran.

Despite the fact that Israel possessed perhaps the best intelligence on Iran, no request was made for it. And its proven expertise in missions of this kind was likewise ignored. Communications assistance was not sought. Israel was not even asked to prepare hospital beds in case of an emergency.

So completely was this country left out of the picture that the first the general staff heard about a rescue operation was the news of its failure that came over the wire services. Egypt, on the other hand, played a key role in the whole operation, both during its preparation and when it was put into action.

The growing exclusion of Israel, other than as a preferred customer for sophisticated weapons, coupled with the deepening U.S.-Egyptian military bond, as demonstrated by the joint air maneuvers and the building of U.S. installations in Egypt cannot be ignored. Nor can the increasing U.S. criticism of Israeli actions in the Lebanon and the suspension of the Israeli-U.S. strategic dialogue, as admitted by Premier Begin on Wednesday night.

The signs of erosion are clear. What is less clear is why Begin is trying to paper them over, rather than admitting the widening chasm.

The new realities call for a basic strategic reassessment in Israel itself, and a clarification of where this country fits in the new equation. That clarification is possible, but only if the trends are recognized and isolated. And if Premier Begin can switch off the rhetoric and take a close look at events in his capacity as defense minister--a job to which, he claims, he devotes "day and night."

Despite the premier's efforts, one has the distinct impression that our strategic thinking has stagnated; that we are always on the defensive, running after events as they overtake us: that we are totally consumed with the here and now, instead of projecting into the future; and that we rely too heavily on cosmetics or righteous indignation (depending on whom one is speaking to or about) when dealing with chancing alliances in the Middle East.

There is no question that Israel constitutes an important and integral strategic asset to the United States. Now all we have to do is find out why and explain it.

DAYAN ASSESSES ISRAELI-U.S.-EGYPTIAN-PALESTINIAN RELATIONS

[Editorial Report] Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew at 0705 GMT on 13 September carries a recorded interview with former foreign minister MK Moshe Dayan by political correspondent Shim'on Schiffer broadcast within the framework of the yearly newsreel. MK Moshe Dayan says that "there is an ebb in our relations with the United States; there are differences of opinion" with the impact expected to be felt in both economic and military aid "if things continue to develop along these lines, namely that they think our policy contradicts theirs. A first sign of this was their refusal to veto the UN Security Council resolution." However, in order to reach an understanding with the United States, Israel should, nevertheless, "not give up major and principal things," even if we have to pay an economic price for it. These principal things are, for instance, "the settlements in the territories," which Dayan favors "even if the United States says it is an obstacle to peace or illegal as per the Geneva convention," or "Jerusalem as the capital of Israel--and I am talking about the western part of the city." On the other hand, "the transfer of the prime minister's office...to east Jerusalem, this is not essential." Dayan maintains, however, that "the root of the difference of opinion is the Palestinian issue." Dayan says that the history of the differences of opinion on the Palestinian issue--between the Rogers plan and our plan "not to return to the former borders" as was the view of "all the governments since 1967"--goes bach many years.

Even though Dayan refuses to assess Carter's personality in terms of his being a friend or a foe of Israel, he says "I would like to say this to his credit and in praise of him: that he did more than any other president for peace between us and Egypt as well as for progress in peace with the Palestinians." However, he adds that "he may have done so for U.S. interests or Egyptian interests."

Regarding the European front, Dayan says that "we do not have to make life easy for ourselves and say that it is oil and that the moment Europe has enough oil from the northern region this problem will be solved." Still, he says, "I do not think that Europe is, as far as we are concerned, lost." The key is for Europe to know that "we are insisting" on our positions: "We will not give up on our basic issues, say Israel's security." Europe should not talk to us like "those who sit with us and tell us what to do."

Regarding his assessment of the future of the autonomy talks and their chances of success, Dayan says: "I indulge in no hopes about these negotiations for two reasons which are the two sides of one coin: the first reason is that neither the Palestinians nor Jordan...will join the Camp David accords or the negotiations based on them. He says that the alignment's Jordanian option is "the West Bank" and so is the Palestinian issue. They are both the same. Therefore, an agreement with the Egyptians will be no more than an agreement with the Egyptians, but "we need an agreement with the Palestinians, not with the Egyptians." The Israeli Government, Dayan says, is not prepared to "abolish the military government without negotiations." But on the other hand, he says negotiations with Egypt, "even if they resume, will not solve the problem." The first question that should be presented to the West Bank mayors is: "Can you or can you not, do you or do you not want to maintain security and prevent terror acts in your towns? In that case, we will withdraw. If not, we will not leave because we are not prepared to commit suicide." Yet, we should not only "take their word" for it, but we should also tell them: "If we withdraw and you introduce the PLO, we will be back in 15 minutes. The Palestinians have no tanks or aircraft or army. They can stage demonstrations." If one party does not honor an agreement--and that applies to Egypt as well--Dayan says that "the agreement is not binding on the other party and that party should take the steps it sees fit." Dayan adds: "First of all, I do not think an agreement with the Palestinians is possible. Not one of them will sign or come or sit" with us. He does, however, think that "they will first consult with the PLO" in which case one of the following two alternatives is possible: "One, that the PLO will try to torpedo" the agreement for various reasons, including Soviet influence, or that it will regard this as a first step toward a Palestinian state and independence by "first of all seeing the Israelis out." At the same time, Dayan asserts that he does not believe a Palestinian state will be established. "If we do not permit it, it will not come about, and I think we will not permit it."

"I am not disappointed with what I had expected this peace to achieve," Dayan says. The most important thing Dayan had anticipated as an outcome of peace was for Egypt "to be removed from the circle of war against Israel," which "is unrelated to normalization" but is connected with "Egypt's interest in improving its economy" by having no more wars and is also related to "the U.S. involvement." Any war Egypt might want to indulge in in the future will have to be carried out with U.S. arms and aid and will also entail "violating an agreement Carter signed," and "overcoming those U.S. forces that will be found in the buffer zone instead of the UN forces." Dayan believes Egypt will not do so, "not even under another leader."

CHIEF OF STAFF COMMENTS ON WAR THREATS, MUSLIM NUCLEAR OPTION

TA100814 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 0405 GMT 10 Sep 80

[Interview with Chief of Staff Lt Gen Refa'el Eytan by military correspondent Shmu'el Tal; date not given--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] We have recently witnessed a massive reinforcement of the Syrian army, an increase in Jordan's air power and changes in the Saudi Arabian army. How much of a threat is posed to Israel by all this, and how is the IDF preparing to meet the threat from the East?

[Answer] Today the eastern front is the threatening factor, or one that may threaten the security of the State of Israel, in comparison with the southern front, or that in the south, where the peace agreement with Egypt was signed and the IDF is deployed differently. The eastern front is being reinforced, and not just in Syria recently; Syria is being equipped and is absorbing the most modern types of weapons and equipment in a permanent process. The same applies to Iraq and Saudi Arabia and Jordan, although this is being done in Jordan rather more slowly, because Jordan depends on Western weapons whose supply is more controlled than that of eastern weapons supplied by the Eastern Bloc. However, Jordan may now be turning to the Soviet Union for equipment and this would burst all the dams curbing Jordan when it was being supplied from elsewhere. The eastern front will be a danger to the State of Israel if it materializes, if the coalition in the East is integrated into a single force, or if it coordinates action within itself. Single countries, separate within the eastern front, are not a danger. That does not mean that integration jeopardizes the very fact of our existence, because our reaction and our countermoves toward the eastern front will be the determining factor if there is any danger, or if this danger becomes greater or smaller.

[Question] In view of the massive hyperactivity on the Golan Heights at the moment, are we in any immediate danger from Syria?

[Answer] This activity is not unusual in Syria. It is carried out every year in this or other frameworks. The very fact of this activity is not a danger. We are following these things alertly and, if necessary, we take the appropriate steps.

[Question] The chief of the intelligence branch said at the end of last week that Iraq and the Muslim countries are realizing the nuclear option now. What steps does this development require the IDF to take?

[Answer] We have had to follow, to know exactly what was being done there in Iraq. The possession of nuclear weapons in the Middle East by one of the Arab countries is a threat both to Israel and to the world, since it is impossible to know exactly where they will be aimed if they have nuclear weapons. They may threaten neighboring countries, they may threaten us, they may threaten anyone who has interests contradicting theirs. In my opinion, this is an international problem of prime importance: how and with what measures the world will prevent such extremist countries from possessing such weapons.

[Question] In your opinion, as a result of this development in the nuclear issue, will the superpowers' involvement in the area increase?

[Answer] This may occur, but we must remember that the West is dependent on Arab oil and its activity is dictated by this dependence on oil and the Arab countries--Saudi Arabia, Iraq and the Gulf principalities--may decide to use pressure, to use the oil weapon so that the West should not intervene in the nuclear issue. This is what must be decided: whether the West prefers to leave nuclear weapons in the Arabs' possession or to suffer from an economic crisis. I very much fear that the West is split on this issue and will not be able to reach an understanding and unanimity.

[Question] A precise examination of the political-military circumstances: Does it lead you to a forecast of a war between Israel and its neighbors, or some of its neighbors in the coming year?

[Answer] I do not want to speak about time, but as long as the Palestinians want to destroy the State of Israel and Syria makes the same statements and Iraq, certainly, and Jordan do not want to make peace, and Saudi Arabia is spurring them all on to a holy war and Libya is ready to enter any such conflict [last word in English], in this form or another, as long as this is the situation, there is a danger of war.

[Question] Can we expect war in the foreseeable period?

[Answer] Maybe yes, maybe no. It depends on us to a great extent: how strong we appear from the outside, how united, and how much we insist on our rights.

[Question] Chief of state, can we expect a change in Jordan's approach to the terrorists in view of the relations now being strengthened between King Husayn and Yasir 'Arafat? Can we expect a resumption of terrorist activity from Jordanian territory?

[Answer] Recently there have been several attempts to infiltrate from Jordanian territory. I presume that this was without the knowledge of the authorities, but it is reasonable to assume that if other sectors are sealed off to them, they will try to come from the border of Jordan, which is a long one, and from their viewpoint, a breachable one. Husayn may be forced to accept dictates and act in contradiction of his tradition to date, that of preventing terrorist activity from Jordanian territory. This may certainly occur.

[Question] Does our dependence on the United States as our primary supplier of weapons, perhaps our only one, other than local industry, harm our freedom of action?

[Answer] In my opinion, no. It is true that we receive a great number of weapons from the United States, but we can supply our own needs to a certain limit, which is a high one, for almost all the items needed to run an army. There are many items we produce ourselves which cannot be purchased anywhere else in the world because they either are not suitable or they are not good or they are not sold for political reasons and we rely upon ourselves. Here the problem is much more internal: the degree to which the security, the military industry is recognized as an economic and security factor by the nation, in my opinion, can contribute greatly to our security industry working at full impetus and speed to supply us with items that are unique to the IDF. It will supply jobs for many thousands of people and will permit long-term development, for many more years.

ABSENCE OF FULL-TIME DEFENSE MINISTER DISCUSSED

TA051010 Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 5 Sep 80 p 13

[Commentary by Ze'ev Schiff: "Discordant Notes From the Qirya"]

[Excerpts] Prior to the Begin-Arens meeting [when MK Moshe Arens rejected Begin's proposal that he become defense minister] I heard an assessment in the defense establishment that Begin would continue in his post as defense minister and would not transfer this important portfolio to Arens. This was not because of the problems that Ari'el Sharon and Mordekhay Tzipori would have created inside and outside the party, each in his own separate and inimitable way. Nor was it because of the threat from Weizman's direction that he would vote against an Arens appointment because of the latter's stand against the Camp David accords. The appraisal was that Begin would retain this portfolio because he feels wonderful holding it. In any event, it was said, it would be a major surprise if he were to let it go.

This is the first time since he became prime minister that Begin is truly ruling and governing. True, this has come to pass in one sphere only, but that sphere is an extensive and important one. And what is no less important: he is being accorded full honors, as is the custom in a military hierarchy. His contact with those in uniform, the personnel of a Jewish army, captivates him to the point of hypnosis. It is thus that his national activity as prime minister--which he so greatly esteems--is given expression. In his position as defense minister, Begin sums things up, and issues orders and directives. Nor are these orders that are translated into talk only, but ones that are translated into deeds, military operations, sorties of aircraft and naval vessels that penetrate enemy territory, security contacts abroad, arms sales, development of arms systems projects and the promotion of senior officers. None of this is to be compared with the bitterness Begin has experienced more than once in the prime minister's office. In short, Began has been rejuvenated in his position of defense minister. This is perhaps the best medicine against a feeling of depression--so why should he forego it?

The pressing problem lies in another direction. Begin does not have enough time to devote to the Defense Ministry. He is filling that post as a part-time job only. One day a week. On that day things go as they should. I do not come to judge his decisions as defense minister, but on that day meeting follows meeting. Minister's staff meeting, operational discussions, meetings in various forums on urgent and current matters, personal sessions with senior officers. If Begin could devote the whole week and all his time to defense issues, he would certainly not prove any less of a defense minister than Levi Eshkol.

When Tzipori and the chief of staff were asked whether this is not detrimental to the administration of the defense establishment, they replied, evasively, that it is always possible to get in touch with the defense minister. And what else could they say? Substantively, the method of running the IDF and the defense establishment by remote control, via the telephone or a walkie-talkie, is unacceptable. This is the largest and most sensitive system in the country, and its administration cannot be based on the giving of approvals from afar. What is worrying is not necessarily the possibility that operations will be carried out without the approval or knowledge of the political echelon. The defense establishment requires a leader, someone to run and direct it, someone who will follow things first-hand and will push people to implementation and to thought. And on this matter there are already indications of various delays which are liable to grow into genuine problems in the future.

As for the phone connection, it must be borne in mind that the tendency is not to bother the prime minister needlessly. Everyone remembers that he has just recuperated from an illness, and will think three and four times about whether to disturb him during his rest and sleep hours. So far there have been no hitches, but in the reality around us unexpected situations must also be taken into account, such as occurred when a Libyan passenger plane burst into Israeli airspace and a fateful decision had to be taken within a minute. It is quite probable that a situation will arise in which the chief of staff will make a fateful decision on his own, within a minute. And in the state of affairs that exists today in the defense establishment hierarchy, it cannot be said that, in Begin's absence, the deputy minister-chief of staff team can be relied upon--and that is another problem.

Weizman succeeded in directing the complex of relations among the deputy minister, the chief of staff and the Defense Ministry's director general, each was in his place, and despite the occasional differences of opinion the three were properly coordinated. Ever since Begin assumed the defense portfolio, deep differences of outlook have emerged between Deputy Minister Tzipori and the chief of staff. The impression is that these two are operating on two nearly separate and at times conflicting courses in the defense establishment. Sometimes one of them acts and the other brakes him. There is a view in the Defense Ministry that the chief of staff acts without taking into consideration the civilian aspect. The claim is that often the army does not report things to the Defense Ministry in time. And since Begin's support and his inclination go to the chief of staff, the deputy minister is no longer a full-fledged deputy. The differences of opinion and the conflicts between the deputy minister and the chief of staff prevail on virtually every serious subject.

But it is Raful [the chief of staff's nickname] who sets the tone. This applies also to a central and vital subject such as the defense budget. This was usually the main instrument of the director general for controlling the system. However, in the debate over the defense budget it was not the deputy minister or the chief of staff who represented the defense establishment, but Lieutenant General Eytan. It was he who set the tone for the debate. The defense minister himself refrained almost entirely from intervening and was, in his second post as prime minister, a kind of referee. The result was that Raful pulled the defense budget reins in his direction. It is possible that Begin found this move amenable, but it is more likely the result of the fact that there is no full-time defense minister.

If Begin were holding a different second ministerial portfolio and not that of prime minister, one could legitimately argue that he should forego the other portfolio and concentrate on defense affairs, since what is involved is the position of prime minister and defense minister, it is clear that as long as this situation continues--with Begin a part-time defense minister--new problems will crop up in the defense establishment and solutions will be put off.

The infirm relations at the top will only worsen. And what is more serious: we are liable to face unexpected and dangerous situations. Raful is more and more playing the crucial part of chief of staff and a kind of deputy to Begin, and is influencing the civilian side of the defense establishment also. In this situation the ministerial defense committee is charged with a more important role than ever with respect to the civilian supervision of the IDF and of its military and operational plans.

POLL INDICATES MAJORITY AGAINST CONCESSIONS IN JERUSALEM

TA110932 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 10 Sep 80 p 3

[Hanokh Smith Public Opinion Poll: "Ninety-One Percent Are Opposed to Concessions in Jerusalem"]

[Text] The Jewish residents of the State of Israel are strongly united behind the government's opposition to territorial concessions in East Jerusalem. This emerges from the results of the public opinion poll conducted by the Smith Institute among a representative sample of over 1,200 Israeli Jews who were interviewed between 20 August and 4 September.

A decisive majority of 91 percent were not prepared for any territorial compromise in East Jerusalem in return for peace with Jordan; 5 percent were prepared to return only part of the old city; and only 2 percent were prepared to return the entire eastern part of the city.

A large majority--85 percent--also expressed opposition to territorial concessions in the Golan Heights as a gesture to Syria.

The views on the issue of Judaea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip were much more divided. On the question of the West Bank the views were divided almost equally: 50 percent opposed any territorial concessions in return for peace with Jordan while 47 percent were prepared for concessions, although most of them supported partial compromise only.

On the matter of the Gaza Strip the Israeli public was much more forthcoming: 58 percent supported a return of part of the Gaza Strip in return for peace, and surprisingly enough, 37 percent were ready to return the entire strip.

"In return for peace with King Husayn of Jordan just as with Al-Sadat of Egypt, would you be prepared to return territories and which?"

	No	Only part	All	No opinion
East Jerusalem	91	5	2	2
Judaea and Samaria	50	37	10	3
Gaza	38	21	37	4
The Golan Heights (a concession to Syria)	85	10	2	3

This question has not been recently posed in the Hanokh-Smith Institute's public opinion polls, but when a similar question was presented in April 1977, months before Al-Sadat's initiative, the Israeli public revealed greater flexibility. Those polled then were asked a general question: Which territories are you prepared to give back in return for peace with the Arabs? In that poll 81 percent said they opposed any territorial compromise in Jerusalem; 63 percent opposed returning territories in the Golan Heights; and only 44 percent opposed territorial compromise in the Gaza Strip. In addition, 39 percent were opposed to returning territories in the West Bank and 24 percent to returning territories in the Sinai.

In comparison with the situation on the eve of the 1977 Knesset election, today, after most of the Sinai has been returned to Egypt for peace, there is a general toughening among the public on the question of additional territorial concessions in return for peace, this time with Jordan. The only exception is in the Gaza Strip where the approach has become more flexible.

The assumption that the Israeli public has grown tougher on the question of territorial compromise in East Jerusalem and some of the occupied territories can be inferred from the swings in public opinion on the settlement policy in the territories. In March 1980 a poll was conducted among a representative sample of the Jewish residents of the country. In that interview those polled were asked to choose among five possible settlement policies. An identical question was posed to the participants in the present poll.

"On the Judaea and Samaria settlements, which of the following positions is closest to yours?"

	March 1980	August-September 1980
The Sharon or Gush Emunim position--wide settlement in Judaea and Samaria	14	22
The 'Ezer Weizman position--controlled settlement in well-defined blocs.	20	19
The position of part of the opposition--settlement only in strategic areas that are not populated with Arabs such as the Jordan Valley	21	20
Against new settlements now but for strengthening existing settlements in the territories	9	11
Against settlements in Judaea and Samaria in these days of peace negotiations	21	14
Other, write it down	4	1
No answer, do not know.	11	12

The results indicate two important trends in the Israeli public's views. First, there is no national concensus on settlement policy. None of the possibilities presented to the public gained a clear preference. Second, the extreme positions, Sharon-Gush Emunim on the one hand and halting settlements during the peace negotiations on the other, both gain considerable support.

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Israel's recent defeats in the international arena and the criticism leveled at Israel on the Jerusalem and settlements issues by its friends have caused a defensive reaction among the Israeli public reflected in a toughening of public opinion.

This has also curbed the decline in Prime Minister Begin's personal popularity but did not curb the deterioration of his government's popularity. It may have even increased their deterioration. This issue will be discussed in following reports.

'DAVAR' EDITOR DISCUSSES AUTONOMY STRATEGY

TA051155 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 5 Sep 80 p 11

[Commentary by Hana Zemer: "Autonomy: Play the Game"]

[Text] "Begin wants, he wants very much indeed, to reach agreement on autonomy before the end of the government's term in office"--this was said to me, to my surprise, by an Egyptian source who would be described by commentators as a well informed source. Not that he knows the Israeli prime minister's inner soul, but he knows the Egyptian evaluations very well indeed. One could say he is one of the people who formulate them.

I asked him why, in his opinion, Begin is so interested in an autonomy agreement. Is it in order to show the voters an achievement on the eve of the polls?

"It goes deeper than that," the Egyptian source explained, "it is even more ideological than electoral: As we see it, Begin fears that the alignment will come to power and make a territorial compromise." (I asked him, in an aside, whether he thought that a territorial compromise was a realistic political possibility. His reply was in the positive, but only in the framework of an interim agreement.) "In any event, Begin must take such a possibility into account. And he wants to block it as long as he can. Signing an autonomy agreement would indeed be a block to territorial compromise."

Interesting, I said, and logical, too. But if this is your evaluation, why are you pessimistic about the chance of an autonomy agreement, to the point of severing the talks?

"Because he wants but is incapable," my interlocutor replied. "That is, Begin wants to conclude the autonomy talks on his own conditions. He is incapable, by the very fact of his view, of agreeing to our minimal logical conditions. From the substantive aspect, in our estimation, Begin has exhausted all he is capable of giving and we have nothing to expect from continuing negotiations with him."

So what is your conclusion, I wanted to know.

"My conclusion is not so important since the president decides," he said. "I can only analyze, just as you can analyze and the Americans, the Europeans and the Arabs can analyze. If we were to follow the pure logic embedded in the talks themselves, there would be no point in continuing the talk."

Why?

"Because we have been going around dizzily for 14 months and we have not reached anything. Because we have agreed to everything that could be agreed and we have solved all the problems that did not exist. But we have not made an iota of progress on any important, disputed question. And because Begin's objective, in contrast to the aim of the Camp David agreements, is not to leave any option open for any other permanent arrangement than Israeli rule over the West Bank. And as long as he conducts the negotiations, that is how it will be in the future, too. Except that the sole logic for an agreement is not the only logic playing here."

What else is playing, in your opinion?

"The game of politics, and especially strategy," my Egyptian interlocutor said. "Politics--that is clear: Out of the three leaders who signed what they signed at Camp David, Carter appears to be the most pressed at the moment because his election is so close. In fact, he is less pressed, since he has done nothing that contradicted traditional U.S. policy or that committed him to concessions. Begin did do this and Al-Sadat even more so. For those two to come and admit that they made a mistake, that they got onto the wrong road, that they made sacrifices that did not justify themselves, that is not simple." That is politics.

"But there is something more important than this, certainly from Egypt's viewpoint: President Al-Sadat's strategy was the global shift, severance from the Soviets and building the infrastructure for regional defense linked to the United States and relying on Egypt, North Africa, Saudi Arabia (Iran has been eliminated). Peace with Israel fitted in with this view, as you know."

"For Egypt to get back Sinai is a great thing per se," my interlocutor continued. "I think that even the historian will judge President Al-Sadat as having been right in all the policy that led to this. But the best card is the strategic one. The concept is linked with the United States, with any president in office there, and it is this that dictates the moves, even if the logic of the talks requires that they be stopped, politics (as mentioned) and strategy (as mentioned) require that we continue with them or find an alternative to them and play this until the approaching moment of ability that will permit more than a game."

This conversation, held a week ago, makes it possible to evaluate the significance of the announcement about the resumption of the talks and the somehow contradictory interpretations given in the various capitals.

There is no new breakthrough here, there is no return here to the tracks of before the talks were stopped. There is a "game to be played" for the reasons mentioned above, and even this is for the best, or, to be more precise, it is not for the worst.

MAPAM'S SHEM-TOV READY FOR PEACE TALKS EVEN WITH PLO

AU061755 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 4 Sep 80 p 5

[AZ report on exclusive interview with Victor Shem-tov, secretary general of MAPAM, the Leftist-Socialist United Labour Party of Israel, in Vienna on 3 September 1980]

[Text] Vienna--"We are of the opinion that Israel should negotiate on a peace treaty with Jordan and with any Palestinian 'factor' that is recognizing Israel, that is ready to sign a peace treaty with Israel, and that rejects terrorism as a weapon for solving conflicts. This also applies to the PLO, if it accepts these conditions." This was stated by Victor Shem-tov, secretary general of the Leftist-Socialist United Workers Marty of Israel (MAPAM) in an ARBEITER-ZEITUNG interview on Wednesday.

This position has been named "Shem-tov-Yarif formula" after Shem-tov, who in the Golda Meir and Rabin cabinets was minister of health, and after former information minister Yarif.

Shem-tov, who on Tuesday had a 1 and 1/2 hour talk with Chancellor Kreisky, chairman of the Austrian Socialist Party [SPOE] added that "we will immediately recognize the Palestinians as a nation and their right to self-determination in the framework of a comprehensive Middle East peace, as soon as we are sitting at a table with such Palestinian representatives and are negotiating a peace treaty."

Unfortunately, he said, the PLO has so far not found this road and does not recognize the State of Israel, but on the contrary has again decided that the destruction of that "Zionist structure" is its main goal. Hence the door is also closed for contacts.

The MAPAM secretary general also believes that the Palestinian problem is the focal point and the hard core of the conflict. "Within the framework of a comprehensive settlement, and in order to solve the Palestinian problem in all its aspects, Israel must be ready to return the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, after new borders have been established in negotiations which give Israel the necessary security. We are not interested in annexing the West Bank."

What MAPAM would like best would be a federation between Jordan and the Palestinians because the Palestinians are living on both sides of the Jordan River and the Palestinian nation therefore should establish one single state. A prerequisite for that would be, however, that the West Bank would be demilitarized and would absorb all refugees and exiles, he said.

As far as Jerusalem is concerned, Shem-tov declared that in the Knesset MAPAM voted against Begin's Jerusalem bill because MAPAM regards it as superfluous, unnecessary and harmful. Jerusalem is united and will remain united as Israel's capital, but the question of Jerusalem is also open for negotiations in peace talks.

In MAPAM's opinion a modus vivendi for Christian and Muhammedan Arabs should be found. The city should get a status similar to that of the Vatican State, with extraterritorial rights for the holy shrines, with flags and symbolic militay units for Muslims, Christians and Jews. There would also be a possibility for East Jerusalem to become the capital of the Jordanian-Palestinian federation. However, the Jerusalem question should only be dealt with at the very end.

The reason for the trip of Shem-tov and of Dov Zakin, MAPAM secretary for international relations, which took the two of them first to Bonn to Socialist International (SI) chairman Willy Brandt, then to London, and now to Vienna to see SI Vice Chairman Kreisky, was to promote MAPAM's admission to the SI as a full-fledged member. MAPAM would like to acquire SI membership--at the side of the Socialist Democratic Israeli Labour Party (MAPAI) which already is an SI member--under an arrangement similar to that applying to Italy and Japan, both of which are represented by two socialist parties in the SI. (Both MAPAM and MAPAI belong to the labour bloc in Israel.)

There are good chances of MAPAM to become a full-fledged SI member as early as at the next SI congress in Madrid in November. Shem-tov, who stressed the long-standing friendly relations with the SPOE and with Chancellor Kreisky, discussed with the SPOE chairman and government chief not only MAPAM's application for SI membership but also the Middle East and the world situation.

RAMALLAH DEPUTY MAYOR CALLS ON NATION TO NEGOTIATE WITH PLO

TA181129 Tel Aviv 'AL HAMISHMAR in Hebrew 18 Sep 80 p 2

[Report by Gavri'el Stern: "West Bank Personality Calls on His 'Jewish Brothers' To Negotiate With the PLO"]

[Text] Deputy mayor of Ramallah, the Anglican priest ('Uda Rantisi)--currently replacing Karim Khalaf who is undergoing medical treatment in the United States following the terrorist assassination attempt against him and Nabulus mayor Bassam Ash-Shak'ah--this week issued an emotional call on his "Jewish brothers" to put themselves in the place of the Palestinians.

(Rantisi) added: "We do not believe in a state of war and hatred and the more we sit together and attempt to reconcile our troubles the better. The Israelis should put it out of their minds that we, Palestinians, want to kill or expel them. On the contrary, we want them to go on striving for the sake of peace and to realize that we are a nation that has the same right to exist as they do."

(Rantisi) has served in his post for 4 years on behalf of the nationalistic bloc. [sentence as published] (Rantisi) emphasized that the PLO is the only legal representative of the Arab Palestinian people and that if Israel really wants peace then it should negotiate with it. As a Christian Palestinian and devout religious man dedicated to the issue of human rights, (Rantisi) claimed he advocates peace founded on justice and mutual trust and not on the expropriation of land, imprisonment and oppression.

(Rantisi) was interviewed by Elyas (Zananiri), an editor of the English-language AL-FAJR, which is aimed at the Israeli public and also publishes articles written by Israeli journalists. (Rantisi) revealed that he has received anonymous telephone threats that he is "the next in line" after the [Ramallah and Nabulus] mayors. (Rantisi) stressed the opposition of the Palestinian leadership to the autonomy. He also rejected the claim that the settlements in the West Bank would bring about peaceful coexistence because they were being established on expropriated land. If they really want peace, the Israelis should return the houses they confiscated from us. (Rantisi) added that, at least, goodwill gestures should be made in order to reduce the gap dividing the two peoples.

GUSH EMUNIM PLANS CONTINUED SETTLEMENT ACTIVITY IN WEST BANK

TA160730 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 0505 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Text] Gush Emunim claims that according to promises it was given by senior government personnel, the intention is to continue with the settlement project even after the establishment of the 10 settlements that are supposed to complete the settlement program for Judaea and Samaria. Amana [truth], the Gush Emunim settlement body, is now preparing for a large, encompassing settlement project. Among other things, it intends to prepare Shave Shomron B, Teqo'a B and the territory seized between Jerusalem and Ma'ale Ha'edumim. Our correspondent on settlement affairs, Avraham Ben-Melekh, says that at this stage Gush Emunim does not intend to settle without government approval.

[Ben Melekh] The government does not intend to stop settlement in Judaea and Samaria. This is the impression the Gush Emunim settlement personnel gained from their talks with government people. Hanan Porat said it was explained to him and his colleagues that the publicity about Israel's intention to stop settlement as soon as the 10 settlements remaining to complete the government's settlement program are established is incorrect.

[Begin Porat recording] It was explained to us that this publicity is unfounded. What we were told indicates that this is unfounded and settlement will continue. [end recording]

[Ben-Melekh] Amana, which is the Gush Emunim settlement movement, according to evidence provided by Amana coordinator Uri Ari'el, is now preparing some nucleii to move into the land.

[Begin Ari'el recording] We are going to set up several more nucleii in the very near future. We are now dealing with them. The short-term program is to civilianize and establish the places decided upon by the government and, beyond this, additional places that appear in the settlement program, which has certainly not been concluded: among other things, Shave Shomron B, Teqo'a B and Mikhmash. Later, we will certainly be discussing a continuation of the settlement impetus in both urban centers and such rural settlements as (Matot) to close the area from Neve Ya'aqov to the urban quarter of Ma'ale Ha'edumin. [end recording]

[Ben-Melekh] Gush Emunim also intends to settle in Qarne Shomron D and Mizpe Govrin and is now locating other places. A construction impetus, Hanan Porat added, is also affecting the existing settlements now.

[Begin Porat recording] In most of our settlements that have, at least superficially, been given a temporary character, there are the beginnings of consolidation in the great majority of them, including breaking ground and also houses that are being constructed. The foundations for the permanent buildings are already being laid. [end recording]

[Ben-Melekh] However, in spite of all this, Gush Emunim is concerned and Uri Elitzur said: This government is speaking in two voices.

[Begin Elitzur recording] On the one hand, the Israeli and international press is writing as though there was a promise that after four more settlements, no more settlements will be established in Judaea and Samaria; on the other, the government says [words indistinct] and it is completely clear to us that we do not have to believe the communications media. We are concluding one settlement program with those four settlements and after that we will begin with a stage-two settlement program. [end recording]

[Ben-Melekh] The people from Amana say that they are prepared for the possibility that the government will indeed freeze settlement, and they are also prepared for the possibility that it will continue with it.

POLL SHOWS SLIGHT RISE FOR LIKUD IN AUGUST

TA051052 Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 5 Sep 80 p 1

[Dr Mina Tzemah Public Opinion Poll: "A Slight Rise for the Likud--at the Alignment's Expense"]

[Text] If the Knesset elections had been held in the second half of August, the Likud list would have gained four more seats in comparison with the first half of July, while the alignment and NRP would have lost two seats each. This emerges from the monthly public opinion poll conducted for the MONITIN monthly by Dr Mina Tzemah, the director of the Dahaf Company's research institute.

The elections forecast, conducted on the basis of replies by 1,232 interviewees, gives the alignment 59 seats (61 in July), the Likud 28 seats (24 in July) and the NRP 9 seats (11 in July). However, if the alignmen list was headed by MK Yitzhaq Rabin, it would have won 64 seats (65 in July), the Likud would have won 25 seats (21 in July) and the NRP 8 (11 [in July]).

The forecast also shows that the electoral potential of a list headed by 'Ezer Weizman has not altered between the two polls: in August, as in July, this potential totals 12 seats.

Together with the variations in the relative strength of the lists, the August MONITIN poll also shows variations in the relative popularity in public opinion of the four people who lead in the race for the premiership. While MK Rabin has, in fact, kept his strength and status at the head of the quartet, and enjoys the support of 34.7 [percent] of the people who were interviewed (35 percent in July), there has been a slight rise in Begin's popularity, from 22.5 percent to 25 percent, and a rise in 'Ezer Weizman's popularity, from 12.8 percent to 14.3 percent. On the other hand, there has been a drop in the popularity of MK Peres, from 19.7 percent in July to 15.8 percent in August.

As is done by several polls, the August poll again also examined the position of the four people from the aspect of their credibility among the public. The following scale was shown by the replies: Rabin: 34.8 percent; Begin: 27.9 percent; Weizman, Peres: 10.5 percent, while Rabin and Begin enjoyed a rise in their credibility in the public view, Weizman and Peres suffered a drop in this credibility.

The relative stability of Rabin's public status in comparison with the drop in that of Peres is reflected on the poll on another question. Replying to the question: Which of the two would be more suitable for the post of prime minister, the gap between those who prefer Rabin and those who prefer Peres was widened. While the July poll gave this gap a total of 27.7 percent (57.8 percent against 29.6 percent) in August it reached 36.3 percent (61.1 percent as against 24.8 percent).

POLL SHOWS DECLINE FOR LIKUD; RISE FOR ALIGNMENT

[Hanokh Smith Center Poll conducted between 20 August and 4 September: "The Likud Went Down to 18 Percent; the Alignment Rose to 40 Percent"]

[Text] Despite the inflexibility shown by the Jewish voters in regard to a territorial compromise in return for peace and in regard to the settlements in the occupied territories and in spite of the fact that Menahem Begin's personal popularity has not gone down since the public opinion poll of March 1980, the public support for the Likud has continued to decline. In a poll conducted by the Smith Research Institute between 20 August and 4 September among a scientifically selected cross section of 1,200 Israeli Jews, only 18 percent of the Jewish voters said that had the elections been held now they would have voted for the Likud whereas the rate of those who said they would have voted for the alignment went up to 40 percent.

Aug-Sep 1980	18	40	12	7	23

Compared with the poll conducted 6 months ago, the Likud lost 2 percent while the alignment won 3 percent. Compared to May 1979 the Likud went down by 8 percent and the alignment went up by 7 percent. There were negligible shifts among the other partisan groups. The striking phenomenon in these polls was the constantly steady, large number of voters who were undecided, totalling--on the average--one of every four voters.

It should be pointed out that these polls represent only Jewish voters. If these are added to the minority votes and compared to the last election, a clearer picture emerges as follows:

(Figures in Percentages)

Date	Likud	Alignment	Religious parties	Other Jewish parties	Arab parties	Undecided
Aug-Sep 1979	16	37	12	7	6	22
1977 Knesset elections	35	25	14	20	6	--
1973 Knesset elections	30	40	12	12	6	--

Whereas in comparison with the 1977 Knesset election the alignment gained remarkably, it still needs some of the undecided voters' ballots to reach the overall rate of 1973.

Both the Likud and other Jewish parties suffered heavy losses of voters, caused almost exclusively by the total disappearance of Yiga'el Yadin's DMC, which received 11.6 percent of all the votes in 1977, whereas in the last poll it got less than 1 percent. Since there are grounds to assume that most of the alignment's share in the DMC's votes of 1977 returned to their original party, one can rather assuredly surmise that the lion's share of the undecided voters were made up of former Likud voters who could not find an alternative party to support and from the DMC voters who do not regard the alignment as a satisfactory alternative. The small remainder from this group (of undecided voters) includes several religious voters who were undecided or voted for small parties as well as some former voters for the alignment who are undecided. It will not be easy for the alignment to gather many votes from these hesitant voters.

As far as the small parties are concerned it seems that, at this stage, they only attract a few voters. Between the March and the August-September polls, "Hatehiya" received only modest gains. The Shay movement, Sheli and Shulamit Aloni are probably guaranteed a margin above the 1 percent, but none of them received over 2 percent of all the voters in any of these polls. The status of Flatto-Sharon's list is unclear and Yiga'el Yadin's DMC, to repeat, has hardly any support at all.

However, all these results should be regarded with caution. One should note that in the periods between elections, most of the polls basically reflect the public's reaction to the ruling government and thus serve a good cause. Yet, when the election itself gets nearer, the opposition parties have to attract voters to maintain their supporters' camp. Thus the rivalries among the cabinet ministries directly affect the popularity of their party in the public's eyes because the results of those arguments directly affect the public. On the one hand, squabbles within the opposition do not have such a grave impact on support for the opposition because they do not have an immediate outcome but, at the same time, these quarrels may have greater weight with the voter as the election date gets closer in the course of 1981 and the voter has to cast only one ballot.

In accordance with the assumption that until the election campaign itself opens attention should focus on the performance of the people in power, let us examine the fluctuations in public opinion about the cabinet's functioning and the functioning of those personalities who led it in the course of the four polls.

Since the 1973 Knesset election, the Smith Research Center polls have presented a standard set of questions on the citizens' evaluation of the government's success. The percentage of those who believe that the cabinet either succeeded or largely succeeded in the various fields of activity were summed up in all of the four polls.

"In your opinion, has the cabinet succeeded in the following areas or has it not?" (the percentage includes those who maintain that it did succeed as well as those who believe that it has largely succeeded)

	Current poll Aug/Sep 1980	Poll of Feb/Mar 1980	Poll of Sep 1979	Poll of May 1979
Handling the economic sphere	14	18	11	11
Handling the social sphere	18	15	18	18
Handing security affairs	56	61	69	72
Handling foreign affairs	20	31	44	58
Your overall opinion of the cabinet	17	20	25	--

On the whole, these figures indicate that a small number of Israeli voters believes the cabinet is either successful or largely successful in the economic and social spheres. The fluctuations in the figures regarding the economic sphere are worthy of special attention. When the first two polls were conducted, Simha Ehrlich was finance minister; while the February-March poll was held a few months after Yiga'el Hurvitz was appointed finance minister and reflects increased faith in him as a result of his activities. Similarly, the decline in the latest poll reflects a certain degree of lack of faith with regard to the cabinet's economic performance. The public's immediate reaction to Hurvitz and his policy will be examined at a later stage. The crux of the matter is that only a small percentage of the public believes that the cabinet is successful in the vital domestic areas of its social and economic policies. This lack of confidence may be costly in the 1981 election, just as it was in 1977, when similar polls conducted by the Smith Center predicted that only 15 percent of the voters thought the outgoing government was successful in the economic sphere and 24 percent held that view regarding the social sphere. Thus, the failure of the internal policy contributed a lot to the fall of the alignment government.

The most dramatic change in the assessment of the government's performance can be seen in the area of foreign relations. Since May 1979 there has been a steep decline in the percentage of the public who believes that the cabinet is successful in that respect: from 50 percent to 20 percent. The fall from one poll to the next was most dramatic and there has been a further 11-percent decline since the poll of 6 months ago.

As for defense, the decline probably reflects more the general feeling of lack of faith in the government's operation than a real lack of confidence in the way security is maintained in the country. 'Ezer Weizman's resignation from the Defense Ministry also may have somewhat contributed to the decline. One should add that on the eve of the 1977 election the percentage of those who believed that the cabinet was successful or largely successful in the field of defense and foreign affairs was 57 percent.

The question about the overall opinion about the cabinet was first introduced in the September 1979 poll. It, too, points to a steady fall in the number of those who think the cabinet succeeds or largely succeeds in general. In a poll that has only now been completed, only one of the six Israelis thought that the current government as a whole either succeeds or generally succeeds. In view of these results, it is not at all surprising that the percentage of those who would be prepared to vote for the Likud if the elections were held today has gone down and that the DMC has lost public support. What continues to amaze us is the constant support for the religious parties. They are especially lucky in that they have an almost regular support backbone. Also, they face their challenges well.

NABULUS MAYOR COMMENTS ON MEASURES AGAINST MUNICIPAL COUNCILS

LD090935 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 6 Sep 80 p 1

[ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT Bureau Report: "Israel Escalates Its Arbitrary Measures and Plans To Bring Down Municipal Councils"]

[Text] London--Bassam al-Shak'ah, mayor of Nabulus in occupied Palestine, has issued a statement in London, in the name of the municipal councils in the occupied territories, in which he appeals to world opinion to take note of the arbitrary and repressive measures which the Israeli occupation authorities have been taking particularly in recent times.

In his statement Al-Shak'ah, who is now receiving treatment in London for the serious wounds he suffered as a result of an Israeli terrorist bomb exploding in his car in Nabulus and causing the loss of both his legs, said: "The Israeli military occupation authorities are taking a series of measures to subjugate or bring about the downfall of municipal councils in the occupied towns."

Reviewing the Israeli measures, Al-Shak'ah said that after dismissing the municipal councils of Bayt Jala and Qabatiyah the Israeli authorities divested Janin Municipal Council of its administrative powers, thus impeding construction work and public services.

Al-Shak'ah said: "The expulsion by the Israeli authorities of the mayors of Hebron and Halhul and their attempt to assassinate the mayors of Ramallah, al-Birah and Nabulus was aimed at implementing a plan to paralyze and render ineffective all the municipal councils. But the Israeli measures have now reached a new and escalating stage aimed at imposing the so-called autonomous rule or administrative rule, so as to enable Israel to achieve its ambitions in the occupied Arab territories according to its racist and aggressive plans."

Continuing, Al-Shak'ah said: The recent Israeli measures were as follows:

"Banning the Palestinian-Jordanian committee in 'Amman from sending money to the municipal and village authorities, so that the occupation authorities can prevent the councils from carrying out their plans;

"Freezing the municipal council budgets and giving the occupation authorities control of the councils' assets in banks;

"Refusal of the Israeli authorities to pay their financial obligations drawn from fuel tax and property tax, which the Israeli military authorities collect on behalf of the municipalities in return for a 10-percent collection fee--something which has made many municipalities unable to pay their employees wages;

"The imposition on all West Bank mayors of forced residence in their towns and of a ban on their contacting public opinion, through either the media or the press."

Al-Shak'ah said that the municipal councils in the West Bank are now considering the idea of suing the military occupation authorities in the appropriate courts, in order to end such measures. The municipal councils are strongly protesting against the military governor's actions, and the citizens are expressing their discontent with the measures taken by the military administration authorities.

Concluding his statement on behalf of the municipal councils in the occupied territories, Al-Shak'ah said that the recent Israeli arbitrary measures would further impede the achievement of peace and increase the risk of war and bloodshed in the area.

FATAH MEMBER GUILTY--Yesterday a Lod Military Court found (Zuhayr Awad Siyuri), aged 28, an inhabitant of (Ras al-'Amud) in Jerusalem and a member of the Fatah organization, guilty of membership of an enemy organization. The charge sheet prepared by military prosecutor Capt Moshe Shefi said the accused had joined the Fatah organization in February 1979 in Amman, from where he was transferred to the organization's training camp in Damascus; there he learned to assemble and defuse explosive charges. The heads of the Fatah organization used the accused to carry messages to organization members in Jerusalem and he carried out all the duties he was given. In May 1980 the accused tried to recruit four Arabs who were working with him in the Nof Hall, Jerusalem, into the organization, telling them that he has been given military training in the ranks of the organization and was going to receive weapons from the Fatah. The presiding judge, reserves Maj Gen Aharon (Elpern), decided to convict the accused and postpone giving the sentence until the end of the month. ARAB WORKERS--At the end of August there were 44,256 workers from the territories employed in Israel, in comparison with 44,504 at the end of July. These statistics have been supplied by the Department for Statistical Information of the Employment Service, which notes that unemployment in Israel has not affected the figures for workers from the territories. [TA142110 Tel Aviv ITIM in Hebrew 1730 GMT 14 Sep 80]

AUGUST UNEMPLOYMENT--Some 35,000 Israelis were looking for work in August, and about 20,000 of them did not find suitable employment. More than 8,000 of all those who were looking for work that month joined the ranks of the unemployed for the first time. From the data of the employment service it emerges that two-thirds of those looking for work are nonprofessional workers, and most of these are young people under 24. VETERINARIANS TO EGYPT--An official delegation from the Israeli Ministry of Agriculture left today on a 5-day visit to Egypt. It is composed of senior veterinary experts and has been invited by the Egyptian veterinary services to discuss cooperation in such fields as ways to combat cattle disease. [Tel Aviv ITIM in Hebrew 1745 GMT 14 Sep 80 TA]

JULY IMPORTS DOWN--The downward trend in imports, which began less than a year ago, continued in July as well. This emerges from statistical data provided by the port authority published on the Jewish New Year. In July, imports arriving in Israel's three ports amounted to 492,000 tons, constituting a 7-percent decrease compared to July of last year. Exports, however, continue to rise in comparison with 1979. In July 493,000 tons of goods were exported through the three ports. This marks a 17-percent rise compared to July of last year. Since April 1980, 1.6 million tons of goods have arrived through the ports. This is a 21-percent decline compared to last year. In exports, however, there was a 6-percent rise compared to the parallel period last year and exports reached 1.9 million tons. The Ashdod port had the greatest traffic of all three ports. AUGUST INDEX RISE--The consumer's price index rose by 8.2 percent in August, the spokesman of the Central Bureau of Statistics reported. The price hikes were felt in all articles, but were particularly noticeable in articles related to apartment maintenance, furniture, transport, mail services and food. The index rose chiefly reflects price hikes initiated by the government and price increases before the high holidays. Since the beginning of the year the index rose by 69 percent, which, when computed annually will mean a price increase of 122 percent. [Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1700 GMT 15 Sep 80 TA]

ARAB COLLEGE REJECTION--The High Education Council notified Nazareth mayor Tawfiq Zayadah that the resolution of the Nazareth Municipal Council to set up an Arab university in the city is illegal. The High Education Council demands that the Nazareth Municipality discontinue any activity that may lead to the establishment of an Arab university in the city. MAPAM DEMANDS CHANGES--MAPAM has demanded that the Labor Party introduce substantial changes in the political portion of the alignment's platform. The MAPAM negotiating team, headed by secretary general Victor Shem-tov, has demanded that Labor Party representatives, led by MK Shim'on Peres, state in the joint platform that the alignment demands border alteration "for security reasons only." MAPAM also demanded that the Labor Party state in the platform that "settlements beyond the green line will not constitute an impediment to peace." No distinction is made in this clause between settlements established by Gush Emunim and settlements erected by the alignment government. MAPAM further urges the recognition of self-determination for the Palestinians. All the demands for changes in the political section are included in the decisions of the MAPAM convention. Although they were submitted as demands to the Labor Party, they do not constitute an ultimatum or a condition for MAPAM's continuing partnership with the Labor Party. The MAPAM team conducting the talks includes the three secretaries of the party--Messrs Victor Shem-tov, El'Azar Granot and Eli'Ezer Yafe--MK Me'ir Talmi, Ya'aqov Hazan, MK Haya Grossman and Naftali Ben-Moshe. It has been learned that the team members have been voicing their bitterness over the fact that the Labor Party has been incapable of starting a dialogue with MAPAM because of internal struggles and their reluctance to make a decision before the party's convention in December. EAST JERUSALEM DEVELOPMENT--Some 670 million Israeli pounds will be invested in developing East Jerusalem this year. This was decided yesterday by the Ministerial Directors General Committee for Jerusalem Affairs headed by the director general of the Interior Ministry, Dr Hayim Kubersky. This sum is 250 million pounds larger than the sum allocated last year. These funds will be used for sewage works within the [old city] walls, the preparation of a new drainage system, the paving of roads, the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Damascus gate and the completion of the road leading to the Mount of Olives. WEIZMAN ON JERUSALEM LAW--"The Jerusalem law is superfluous and, furthermore, I think Ge'ula Kohen coerced us all," former defense minister MK 'Ezer Weizman has said. Weizman, who did not participate in the Knesset vote on the law, added: "What was bad before that? Who nagged before that? Are we heroes? You should know that a live hero is always better than a dead one." The local paper HADSHOT HADERA carries an interview with Mr Weizman in the edition published today. When asked about his political activity, Weizman replied that it was "simmering" and he does not intend to occupy himself with politics unless he could return to activity involving action. As for the government, he said that "it is a fact that this government is continuing to live without me...God help it." With regard to the peace agreement with Egypt, Weizman said that this was such a strong move and so basic that there could be no retreat from it. YAMIT SETTLERS FIGHT EVACUATION--The Yamit Strip settlers' Etzel and Ma'oz organizations have decided, in coordination with Tehiya movement, to fight against the world Zionist organization settlement department's intention to dismantle the Yamit Strip settlements in the spring. On Sunday the Tehiya movement's executive will meet in the Yamit Strip. At that time the organizations intend to plan ways to fight what they call the evacuation sentence and to stop all moves to withdraw from Sinai. During the Succot holiday the inhabitants of Yamit town will be celebrating the fifth anniversary of the town's inauguration and those opposed to this evacuation intend to use that day for their activities. POPULATION DATA--Israel's population increased by 82,000 people in 1979-1980 [Jewish year 5739] and reached 3,885,000. This number includes over 3,250,000 Jews. This data was published today by the Central Bureau of Statistics. Israel's Jewish population increased by 91,000 people. The natural growth is estimated at 45,000 and the number of immigrants is estimated at 28,000 persons. The number of people emigrating from Israel has been estimated at 12,000. The growth of the Jewish population has declined and reached 1.9 percent compared to 2.3 percent last year mainly due to the decrease in the number of immigrants. Israel's non-Jewish population has increased by 21,000 people. The natural growth of this sector has also declined and reached 3.4 percent compared to 3.6 percent last year. The increase of the non-Jewish population is wholly attributed to natural reproduction. [Text] [TA100419 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1400 GMT 9 Sep 80]

WEST BANK, PFLP AT ODDS--A grave breach has developed between the communists and the members of the Popular Front in Judaea and Samaria, the two main components of the National Guidance Committee, for the first time since the 6-Day War. Our correspondent Pinhas 'Irbari reports that since the row in the labor camp in Nazareth where Palestinian flags were flown, the Popular Front members have not stopped attacking the communists. RELIGIOUS AFFAIRS MINISTER APPOINTED--Gedalya Schreiber, who has until now served as the chairman of the Jerusalem Religious Council, will assume the post of director general of the Religious Affairs Ministry on 8 September. He has thus responded to Minister Aharon Abu-Hatzera's offer to replace ousted Yisra'el Lippel, who was dismissed about 1 month ago. [TA040642 Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 3 Sep 80 p 1]

VISA VALIDITY LIMITED--The foreign and interior ministries have decided to limit the validity of passports issued to Israel's abroad to 1 year only. This is in the framework of the policy of combatting emigration. Those Israelis who wish to renew their passports will have to report to the local Israeli consulate every 3 months and pay the fee for the extension. [Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 3 Sep 80 p 2 TA]

STATE DEBTS--Israel's debts in foreign currency denominations totaled $16.15 billion at the end of April 1980. The state's debts increased by 15 percent reaching more than $2 billion in the course of last year. The loans to be repaid during the coming year amount to some 20 percent of the total payments to be made. Some 85 percent of the government's debt is in U.S. dollars. Our correspondent notes that Israel owes about one-third of its debts to the U.S. Government, which is Israel's largest creditor. RISE IN UNEMPLOYMENT--There was an increase of about 10 percent in the number of unemployed people in August. The number of people unemployed for 6 days and above reached 14,150 compared with 13,000 in July. This data was supplied by the employment office. [Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 4 Sep 80 p 2 TA]

MAJORITY FAVORS EARLY ELECTIONS--Tel Aviv--A majority of the public favours the immediate dispersal of the Knesset and the calling of early elections, according to the Rosh Hashana Eve JERUSALEM POST poll. To the question, "do you favour the immediate dispersal of the Knesset and early elections?" 59.6 percent of those interviewed responded positively, with 35.3 percent opposed. Only 5.1 percent were undecided. The poll was conducted by the Modi'in Ezrahi Applied Research Centre among a representative sample of 1,289 adults. OIL FROM NORWAY--Israel can buy oil from Norway, said the country's Energy Ministry. All that needs to be done is to draw up an agreement between Israeli and Norwegian oil companies. The Norwegian oil minister said in a meeting in Oslo with the chairman of the Knesset committee on economics, Gad Ya'aqobi, that an agreement can be reached. Norway had said that it did not have any extra oil to sell to Israel. [Text] [TA180718 Jerusalem Domestic Service in English 0500 GMT 18 Sep 80]

FUNDS FOR ARAB VILLAGES--Nazareth--The Interior Ministry has allocated IS2 million for the preparation this year of outline plans for Arab villages in the triangle (eastern Sharon). The ministry's town planners expect the population of the villages to double over the next 20 years since the birth rate in the villages is over 3 percent a year. Thus, the size of present construction and development zones is expected to be doubled or even trebled in the plans. The Interior Ministry has already approved such plans for 20 Arab villages, and an additional 35 are under study. [Excerpt] [TA151029 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 15 Sep 80 p 3]

JUNE-AUGUST EXPORTS--Israel's commodity exports in January-August amounted to $3,414 million, 26 percent more, in current prices, than in the same period last year, when they totalled $2,709 million. But during June-August exports have declined, dropping sharply in August, so that the increase over last year is the result of higher exports in January-May, according to data released on Monday by the Central Bureau of Statistics. In August, net exports of goods were $288 million, sharply down from July, when exports were $408 million, and even more so from June, when they stood at $433 million. So far, August's exports were the lowest of any month in the preceding 12 months, and below the monthly average of 1979 and 1978, which was $357 million and $308 million, respectively. [TA101100 Jerusalem JERUSALEM POST in English 10 Sep 80 p 3]

RISE IN EXPORTS--Exports were higher in August, but the rate of increase tapered off somewhat, according to Industry, Trade and Tourist Ministry figures. The total for the month was $291.1 million, up 14.3 percent from a year earlier. Industry, Trade and Tourism Minister Gid'on Pat yesterday disclosed that exports for the first 8 months of 1980 were up by $725 million or 26.7 percent over the corresponding period last year, reaching a total of $3,432 million. Agricultural products accounted for $443 million of the amount, a 10-percent rise over 1979, and industrial goods $2.98 billion, a 29.5-percent increase. CREATION OF MINISTRY FOR OCCUPIED TERRITORIES EXPLAINED

LD150817 Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 9 Sep 80 pp 1, 15

[Special dispatch: "Official Jordanian Sources: Creation of 'Ministry of Occupied Territories' Does not Mean Encroachment on PLO Rights"]

[Text] Amman--Official Jordanian sources said yesterday that the creation of a "Ministry of Occupied Territories" in the new cabinet headed by Mudar Badran in no way means "encroachment" on PLO rights in the occupied territories.

A senior Palestinian official said recently in Damascus that the PLO is upset about the creation of this ministry.

The Jordanian sources said that the affairs of Palestinian camps and refugees were previously administered by the Ministry of Reconstruction and Development which, because of its secondary importance, always came under a minister holding another portfolio. Also, the executive office for the occupied territories, the body that provides aid to citizens of the West Bank and the Gaza sector in collaboration with the PLO, had wide powers vested in it by the Ministry of Reconstruction and Development. This office was administered by a minister holding yet another portfolio and was attached at one time to the Ministry of Information and Culture and at another time to the Ministry of State.

The Jordanian sources added: In view of this situation, officials decided to merge the powers of reconstruction and development and the executive office in one ministry, the Ministry of Occupied Territories, under Hasan Ibrahim. The Ministry of Occupied Territories will also be the Jordanian side of the Jordanian-Palestinian joint committee set up in accordance with the Baghdad summit resolution to support steadfastness among the inhabitants of occupied territories.

Therefor, the creation of a ministry for the occupied territories cannot be construed as an encroachment on PLO rights in there territories. Also, it was not called the Ministry of the Occupied Homeland, as in the case of the PLO department under this name which is headed by executive committee member Jami' Abu Sittah.

Moreover, King Husayn's letter designating the present cabinet calls for efforts to help the Palestinian demand for the achievement of Palestinian rights and cooperation with the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

This was explained to the inhabitants of Palestinian camps and Palestinian personalities in Jordan by Prime Minister Mudar Badran and Minister of Occupied Territories Hasan Ibrahim when the question was raised.

INFORMATION MINISTER REVIEWS RELATIONS WITH U.S., ARAB NATIONS

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 17 Jun 80 p 10

[Interview with Sa'id al-Tal, Jordanian minister of information, by Muhammad Ma'tuq, in Amman; date not given]

[Text] The repeated postponement of King Husayn's visit to Washington does not mean that there are any conflicts between the two interested parties, Jordanian minister of information, Sa'id al Tal, said. This visit comes within the framework of the "dialogues, exchanges of views and direct contacts with the rulers of the world," he added. America, he said, is "party" to the Middle East problem, regardless of the difference of opinions concerning the extent of the involvement.

During his interview with AL-SAFIR, the Jordanian minister spoke about Jordanian relations with Syria, Iraq and the Palestine resistance. His country, he said, is against alignments and its relations with the three parties in question are good.

[Question] What is the meaning of King Husayn's acceptance of the invitation to visit the United States at this time?

[Answer] You know that this invitation was made a long time ago, and this has already been postponed several times for normal reasons. In other words, this postponement has nothing to do with any difference of opinions between the two interested parties. The king's visit--as well as his previous visits--comes within the framework of the Jordanian philosophy which advocates personal contacts, exchanges of views and dialogues with the rulers of the world and people who are concerned about our affairs or interested therein. Generally speaking, we have a positive way of handling things. However, our positive attitude is dominated by our belief that any settlement must be achieved within the framework of Arab efforts and joint efforts. It is also dominated by our observance of two basic principles, on which all Arabs agree, i.e., the general and complete evacuation of all occupied Arab territories--starting with Jerusalem--and the recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including its right to establish its own state on the soil of its mother country, Palestine.

Passivity has emptied the field, apart from the enemy. As far as we are concerned, we believe that it is necessary to fight the enemy wherever it is, without abandoning national and patriotic goals or forfeiting our principles.

King Husayn has both an official and a popular influence, and he will convey the Arab point of view to the press, the authorities and the public opinion in the United States. That will have a definite influence.

[Question] Has King Husayn defined his position, which he will convey to Washington, in conjunction with the other Arab rulers?

[Answer] The Arab picture of the situation was defined by the resolutions of both the Baghdad and Tunis conferences, in which Jordan participated, and it is known to everybody. However, it should be stressed that Jordan does not have to be given the green light by any one.

[Question] King Husayn had previously mentioned that the United States will no longer play any influential part in the Middle East. Is this still the position of Jordan?

[Answer] The king may have said that within the context of some general idea, and that consequently cannot be understood as a permanent and general rule. I personally would say that America is a major power in the world, with interests in this area and connections with both Israel and the Arab states. This is what makes it an interested party, and this fact is acknowledged by everybody, whatever the extent of such an involvement may be according to the different point of view of this or that authority. It is necessary to have a dialogue with America and clarify its views. This does not at all mean that we do not disagree with America about many points. We agree with America on certain questions, while we disagree about other things.

It still is necessary to contact America to exercise pressure on it and make it adopt more equitable and balanced positions in this area.

European Move

[Question] What is your position with reference to the so-called "European move" regarding the solution of the Middle East crisis?

[Answer] Both in Jordan and in the Arab world at large, we expected that there might be a European move aiming at remedying the present situation and unlocking the dead end which is has reached. The Arabs, including us, had been very optimistic about such an initiative, particularly since Europe. owing to its relations with the area, is more aware and more realistic with reference to the consideration of the problem and its ramifications.

However, this initiative did not come out in the manner which we had wished. The gist of the remarks made at the conference about the Middle East question did not reflect any real initiative, but merely remained within the limits of ordinary resolutions.

Before the European move, what I look for is the determination of an Arab strategy, i.e. the bases of an Arab move implying a joint effort and full awareness of all the data and circumstances, and such a move should transcend reactions, exaggerations and susceptibilities. It is such a move which will play a part in the realization of Arab hopes, since other initiatives will not be free from the influences of other world powers. For example, the European move will not be free from the influence of the American policy and, accordingly, from the well-known Zionist influence of the American policy itself.

I finally stress that the Arab strategy, when it is determined, must define every action or activity pertaining to the Palestinian question at the military, political and other levels.

Lebanese Crisis

[Question] What do you think of the Lebanese crisis and ways to solve it?

[Answer] Owing to the special relationship existing between Lebanon and Jordan, what happens in Lebanon is both painful and saddening to us, and it makes our hearts bleed. I do not say this to be nice. The bloodshed in Lebanon is not detrimental only to the latter but also to all the Arabs, and particularly to their cause, the cause of Palestine.

Owing to our own situation, we can only say and hope that all the forces interested in the Lebanese crisis should as soon as possible achieve the harmony which will bring tranquility and safety back to Lebanon, so that it may play the essential part which used to characterize it in the international field.

We hope that all will overlook secondary and superficial differences, and even personal interest, in the interest of Lebanon and the Arab nation itself.

Bloodshed in Lebanon is bleeding the Arab nation, and this must be stopped as promptly as possible. The crisis in Lebanon has gone beyond the limits of its national interest and the cause of Palestine.

Relations with Opposition

[Question] What is your evaluation of the Jordanian-Palestinian relations?

[Answer] Jordan, based on its essential principles and its convictions, believes in maintaining balanced and mutually constructive Arab relations with all Arabs. The special relationship existing between the Jordanian and the Palestinian peoples--between Jordan and Palestine--must improve in order to serve the supreme Arab interest.

Since the decision of the Rabat summit conference, Jordan has taken upon itself to deal with the PLO as being the sole and rightful representative of the Palestinian people.

There is coordination between both parties, through committees, and transactions are conducted through the joint committee.

[Question] The matter of an alternate homeland in Jordan was suggested in the past, and they now suggest a settlement in Lebanon. What do you think of these outrageous suggestions?

[Answer] The Israeli enemy is trying its best to liquidate the Palestinian question once and for all. Among the various methods which it has used in the past, and which it tries to use again and again, the enemy currently talks about having an alternate homeland for the Palestinians in Jordan, trying to justify its claim on the basis of inaccurate statistics, according to which the majority of the population in Jordan consists of Palestinians. Merely for the record, the Palestinians residing on the East bank represent only about one-third of the local population. Also for the record, the majority of the Palestinian people still live on Palestinian land, where the highest Palestinian concentration is found.

Based on the same logic, the enemy tries to find a homeland for the Palestinians in southern Lebanon for the same purpose and same goals, i.e. to liquidate the Palestinian question once and for all, and occupy Palestine entirely.

As far as we are concerned, in Jordan, the Palestinian question has nothing to do with finding any homeland or refuge for the Palestinians, since the whole Arab land is the homeland of all Arabs. The problem has nothing to do with the presence of Palestinians in Jordan or elsewhere. As far as we are concerned, the question of Palestine is the question of an Arab land which has been occupied by force and must be taken back, whatever may be the sacrifices and time which that may require. It is the question of an Arab people, which was driven away from the land of its fathers and ancestors, and which must return to it.

Relations with Syria

[Question] The news recently mentioned something about a lapse in the relations existing between Jordan and Syria owing to the military given by 'Amman, according to the news, to the Muslim Brotherhood people accused of conducting sabotage operations in various parts of Syria.

[Answer] Relations with Syria are perfectly good. In addition to maintaining special and strong personal relations, Jordan and Syria together represent the Arab front standing before the enemy. We must accordingly deepen and strengthen these relations, and we must coordinate our moves in every field.

I have recently visited Syria, and my visit was successful. During my visit, I have pointed out to the Damascus authorities--although they already knew it--the importance and the necessity of deepening and strengthening the relations existing between the two countries. Their response has been excellent, and their feelings and aspirations do not differ from our own. Many forces are trying to arouse mutual suspicion and differences of opinions among the Arabs. It is regrettable that, owing to lack of awareness, campaigns aimed at arousing doubts have managed to find listening ears, but we can assure you that our relations with Damascus are indeed excellent.

Of course, imaginary differences may arise at times, and this is normal. However, such imaginary differences are soon dissipated through dialogue, discussion and exchange of views and information. Our relations currently are better than ever, and they will get better and better in the future. There is nothing likely to change this.

Some authorities have thought that Jordan maintained relations with certain agencies which undertake certain operations in Syria. We have explained that Jordan has not involved itself in the least, in any way and under any condition, both at the national and patriotic level, in any operation undertaken by any group whatsoever in order to create any conflict in Syria.

Any superficial incompatibility arising in any Arab country or between Arab countries is an insignificant and secondary matter, which should be settled wisely, intelligently and rationally.

Relations with Iraq

[Question] What about relations with Iraq?

[Answer] For Syria and for us, Iraq represents a strategic depth before the Zionist aggression, and it is accordingly an essential part of the confrontation with the enemy.

With reference to the improvement of our relations with Syria, we do not merely think of trying to have a dialogue with the latter. The same thing applies to our relations with Iraq. While we try to develop sound and strong relations with both Syria and Iraq, we hope that sound and strong relations will also develop between Syria and Iraq.

From a patriotic point of view, and at this particular stage, we personally do not believe that mere attempts to have a dialogue may benefit the Arabs, and we do not believe that any conflict between Arab countries is in the interest of the Arabs.

It is necessary to make a difference between mere attempts to have a dialogue and personal relations.

From a purely personal point of view, I believe that there is no reason for us to disagree. If any things conducive to disagreement were to arise, I believe--based on patriotic, national and moral principles--that we must solve such a disagreement as promptly as possible and disregard it in order to build the autonomous Arab power.

Finally, we wish to point out that Iraq has assisted and still assists Jordan, and supports the development projects undertaken in Jordan, just as it has helped and still helps Syria, and supports the development projects there.

BRIEFS

PRIME MINISTER'S MID-EAST STATEMENT--Kuwait, 9 Sep (MENA)--Egyptian Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali has emphasized that Egypt will not initiate a dialog with the Arabs because the Arab states were the ones who severed the relations with Egypt, not the other way round. In an interview with the Kuwaiti newspaper AL-QABAS published today, Kamal Hasan 'Ali expresses his belief that a comprehensive and just settlement of the Middle East Problem will not take longer than 3 years. He also voices the opinion that the U.S. Administration will not adopt any definite decisions before the U.S. elections in November. Campaign outbiddings, he maintains, certainly do not express the views of the U.S. Administration. Referring to the situation on the Egyptian-Libyan borders, 'Ali stresses that Egypt will not be the one to start any military action. It is up to Libya, he says. On the Lebanese crisis, he says he believes that it will not be resolved before a Middle East settlement is achieved. [Excerpts] [NC091546 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1433 GMT 9 Sep 80]

PLO APPLICATION FOR DEFENSE COUNCIL MEETING 'FUTILE'

NC061519 Beirut Domestic Service in Arabic 1130 GMT 6 Sep 80

[The 6 September "clarification" by Lebanese foreign ministry official source on PLO's application to convene Arab joint defense council--announcer-read]

[Text] The PLO has applied for the convening of the Arab Defense Council, concurrently with the Arab League ordinary session, to consider the issue of the south and the dangers to which it is being subjected. The government, acting through the Foreign Ministry, has notified the Arab League secretary general that the Lebanese Government is the only quarter competent to raise such an issue because it enjoys sovereignty over its territory and over the residents on it. Furthermore, the government is responsible for this territory.

The Foreign Ministry has also noted that it raised all aspects of the issue of the south and the dangers to which it is being exposed at the 1979 Arab summit conference in Tunis. The conference did not respond to Lebanon's demands, nor did it give the subject the importance that it deserves, despite the grave dangers this issue holds for the Lebanese national interests and the Palestinian cause.

In conclusion, the ministry believes that a defense council session would be futile unless it was prepared for in such a way that would insure an ample discussion of the issue of the south and the adoption of an Arab stance based on pooling all potentials in the various domains within the context of a unified Arab strategy that would be aimed at confronting the dangers to which the south and its Lebanese and Palestinian residents are being subjected. If these things are done, then every Arab state--within the limits of its capabilities--will share the burden that Lebanon is shouldering alone, and Lebanon will be able to recover full authority over its territory.

NLP OFFICIAL INTERVIEWED ON NLP-PHALANGIST RELATIONS

NC101845 Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 8 Sep 80 pp 16-25

[Interview with Dory Sham'un, Lebanese National Liberal Party secretary general, by MONDAY MORNING correspondent Lydia Georgi--place and date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] The Lebanese Army has taken over several NLP [National Liberal Party] centers at the request of NLP President Camille Sham'un, who has at the same time declared that the NLP is essentially a political party. In practical terms, does this mean that the NLP militia will be dissolved? And should that happen, wouldn't the areas which are now under Lebanese front control come under the total control of the Phalangist militia?

[Answer] What [former] President Sham'un said concerning the political role of the NLP is simply this: that the NLP is a political party and that the military role was imposed on us by what we considered to be attacks against the population and integrity of Lebanon. We were obliged to take up arms and fight the aggressors.

Now, this [statement by President Sham'un) does not mean, as President Sham'un also pointed out, that we are going to throw away these arms, stop training or completely dissolve our military effort, if you can call it that. We will not do so as long as we estimate that there are still people aggressing against the soil and independence of Lebanon.

But where we feel that the Lebanese Army has control of the situation, we do not see any reason to keep our boys awake all night to see that no one comes into the various quarters that they have been defending up till now. And this happens to be the case in al-Hadath, Kfarshima and a number of other places. As long as there is no outbreak of fighting in these places, we feel that our military role is not really needed.

This is the exact situation, and it is our sincerest wish to see the Lebanese Army fully in control of the situation all over the place. As soon as that happens, we will immediately forget about anything called "military role."

[Question] If you have no intention of dissolving your militia, why are you more or less surrendering your control in certain areas?

[Answer] Because we have found that in certain areas...there is no fighting against the Palestinians in, say, Juniyah. The militias that used to be in Juniyah were there because they were needed to support or relieve fighters in other areas. But since the fighting has stopped for the time being--and we hope it will remain this way--we see no reason why we should leave these arms in the hands of the boys, especially in view of the risk of someone coming along at any time and, for the slightest thing which has nothing to do with politics or defending the territory, start a private discussion which will finally turn into some kind of bloodshed and draw one party against the other.

To eliminate this possibility, we have decided to put everything aside.

[Question] Which NLP centers, exactly, has the Lebanese Army taken over now?

[Answer] They have not really taken over the NLP centers. They have taken over what we used to have as military outposts. We said to them, "As long as you are there, we do not need these things." If they are needed later, that is a different story, but for the time being, nothing is needed, so why should we keep our boys under arms? As long as the army is ready to do it, we are ready. We are ready to hand them many other places, but we want the army to be in a position to take them over. Over there, they seemed willing to do so, so we said, "Okay, take them." If they are willing to do so in other places, we're ready to hand over other military outposts.

[Question] Are you ready to hand over all your military outposts to the army?

[Answer] We are ready to hand over all our military outposts to the legal authority if this legal authority is ready to take over and maintain law and order where our militias are doing so.

[Question] This is a new position. You have been saying so far that you won't accept the Lebanese Army unless it is deployed in all Lebanese areas.

[Answer] We have never said this.

[Question] I believe you have.

[Answer] No, we have never said this. We have always said that we would like to see the Lebanese Army deployed all over the place. That is our sincerest wish, and I think they should do it. They should not be satisfied to be in 'Ayn al-Rummanah to the exclusion of Shiyah, for example, or al-Ghubayri, or around the airport--and I'm talking about effective presence in their little barracks. This is something we sincerely hope they will do, and we have been encouraging them to do it. In handing over our control to them in certain places, we hope to encourage them and perhaps set a good example for the others--on this side and on the other side.

[Question] Although both President Sham'un and yourself have been playing down the NLP-Phalangist conflict, it has become obvious that the relationship between the two parties is under severe strain. Do you think it can be returned to normal?

[Answer] We've always declared that no matter what happens between the al-Khata'ib (Phalangists) and ourselves, our reaction will always be positive.

Admittedly, when you feel that you have been working positively and see a negative reaction on the part of the al-Khata'ib or someone in the al-Khata'ib, it is difficult to remain positive, forget what has been done to you and turn over another new leaf. This is something we have succeeded in doing many a time, and we hope to be able to continue doing it, because we estimate that politically we carry the burden of responsibility. However heavy the burden may become, we're not going to just throw it off our shoulders. This is a role that we have decided to assume and we will continue to assume it as long as there is any possibility of doing so.

We estimate that the external dangers are still there, and they're much too great to allow us to create more internal divisions. Our attitude toward them will be the same as our attitude toward the al-Khata'ib.

[Question] Do you share the view of those who say that the Phalangist Party is trying to extend its unilateral authority over the eastern areas?

[Answer] It is the aim of any political party to have as much control of any situation as possible--be it in parliament, in social activities, or whatever. This is very true of the al-Khata'ib. The al-Khata'ib found themselves having a certain structure with a certain capacity behind it, and they're trying to grab as much as they possibly can.

[Question] At your expense?

[Answer] Maybe at our expense, maybe also at the expense of the rest of the population, but that is what they're doing. Now, I don't approve of the methods. I would probably try to do the same thing if I could, but I would use different methods. I don't exactly approve of the methods of the al-Khata'ib, and have always said so. They will end up paying the price if they continue this way.

The Lebanese population has never admitted the control of any one party; they don't even admit the control of the government, and this is why many governments have not succeeded. The Lebanese population is not going to accept the control of any single party. As the Arabic saying goes, anything in excess is a shortcoming. When you overdo certain things, you get negative reactions, and I think there are already negative reactions to what the al-Khata'ib are doing.

[Question] Dany Sham'un has said that certain NLP members have been intimidated into joining the Lebanese forces. Do you see this as part of an attempt to control all the eastern areas?

[Answer] Maybe. It could well be interpreted as part of that attempt, but I don't see it succeeding in the absence of a party decision to join the Lebanese forces. As long as there is no party decision that all NLP militiamen should enter the Lebanese forces, anybody entering the Lebanese forces will be doing so on his own responsibility. We're not going to stop them. If they want to do it, let them do it, but they will not be doing it on party orders and they'll be responsible to the party for whatever action they take on that side.

We have said it very plainly: those who want to leave the party and join something else are very free to do so.

[Question] Has anybody left since then?

[Answer] Very few. Very, very few.

[Question] How many?

[Answer] In the region of al-Hadath, Kfarshima and all the rest, they don't amount to 5 percent. We are glad that those who left did so, and if there are others who want to leave, we will be even gladder. Because these are people who don't believe in the party and don't want to obey orders, and this is exactly the kind of people that we don't want. They would render us a great service by leaving.

[Question] We have always understood that the Lebanese forces is the umbrella military organization for all rightist political parties. Now we're hearing about the Lebanese forces versus the NLP militias. What does "Lebanese forces" mean today? Could you explain the exact status of these forces?

[Answer] I wish I knew myself. I think this is a question you should put to Shaykh Bashir al-Jumayyil (commander of the Lebanese forces) himself. I personally haven't found the right answer yet.

[Question] What has happened to the formulas that are supposed to be under consideration for the regulation of NLP-Phalangist relations? There was talk about either creating a "National Council for the Lebanese Resistance" or establishinga "Federal" relationship between the two parties.

[Answer] I don't like to talk about predetermined forms of councils or federations or whatever. There is something called the Lebanese front. It was created way back and was an umbrella organization that was supposed to group all the forces within the liberated regions at the time. That was back in 1977, when this organization that covered all the liberated areas from Zharta to al-Hadath or Karfshima.

Of course, the incidents of Ihdin Ehden (1978) chopped off a big part of that area, diminishing it by about one third. Since then, the Lebanese front has grouped mainly the al-Khata'ib and the al-Ahrar (NLP), plus a few other small organizations.

Even then, the idea was to turn this structure into what I might call a "shadow government," because in the absence of a real government, unfortunately, one had to try and solve one's problems. We decided--or at least some of us did--that it would perhaps be a good thing to have an unofficial local government that would see what the area needed and try to obtain what was needed from the official government. This would have allowed us not only to have the political parties working together as a team, but also to invite many people from the various life forces in the area to join in and help within this organizational framework. It would have been a very democratic way of trying to solve the problems of the area, trying to develop the area into an example for other areas to follow. Because I go by the principle that if you want people to do what you are advising them to do, you have to show them what you yourself have done.

We would have liked to turn this area into a model which everybody else would want to copy. I think Lebanon needed an area which could rebuild itself and serve as a model for the rest of the country to copy, so that we could get out of the archaic governmental system which we knew to be inefficient in many ways before the war, so that we could build something more modern on more scientific bases.

This failed, and all I can say is that we were not responsible for its failure.

[Question] So if I understand you correctly, no new formula for NLP-Phalangist cooperation is now being studied....

[Answer] There are many propositions being studied today for the restructuring of the Lebanese front, to make a sort of administrative council for the area composed of the various members of the Lebanese front and their allies in the area. This would at least allow us to see how things are going and avoid conflicting responsibilities. Certain people would have certain roles: people in charge of information, others of educational problems, others of social problems, etc. It would be like a shadow government.

[Question] In your recent press conference, you announced that you were in the process of undertaking a major overhaul of the NLP. Could you elaborate on that?

[Answer] I don't think it will interest anybody. It's all an inside cuisine. The main objectives are, of course, to develop as much as possible the cultural and educational policy of the party and try to have within the student and teaching bodies as many people as possible who understand what we believe to be the right kind of education for Lebanon's future generations and implement it.

[Question] How many armed elements do you have now?

[Answer] You can't say "armed elements." We have about 5,000 fully trained, and about half of them have had battle experience for all it's worth.

[Question] Since the July 7 incidents, your brother Dany has launched several verbal attacks against Bashir al-Jumayyil, but President Sham'un and yourself have toned down your comments on Mr al-Jumayyil's responsibility for these and later incidents. Could you explain the discrepancy?

[Answer] It is not a discrepancy. Dany's reaction was a very normal human reaction. My father's reaction and mine were more of a political reaction.

[Question] Why?

[Answer] Because we're doing politics.

[Question] But you share your brother's feelings?

[Answer] We're doing politics, and when you're doing politics, many things come into consideration, and many times--too many times, unfortunately--you have to forget about your own personal feelings and go by slightly different logic.

[Question] To sum up the question of NLP-Phalangist relations, how would you evaluate those relations now?

[Answer] I would describe them as not what they should be, unfortunately. Inadequate, insufficient and inappropriate.

[Question] Is the NLP ready to enter into a dialog with the national movement, and on what conditions?

[Answer] On one condition only: their sincere vow to work or fight, or whatever it takes, for a free and fully independent Lebanon.

[Question] Here, we come to the problem of conceptions. They have their conception of a "free and fully independent" Lebanon, and you have yours, and we've being going around in circles....

[Answer] There aren't many conceptions where this sort of thing is concerned. When I say "a fully independent Lebanon," I mean a Lebanon where there is only one authority--the Lebanese authority--and nothing else. Everybody who is on the territory has to abide by this authority. That is the meaning of full independence.

If they have other conceptions of what full independence means, that's a different story, but this is my understanding of independence and I think it's a universal understanding. I haven't invented anything new. If they want to invent something new, I'm sorry, but I like to abide by the dictionary.

[Question] Do you think it is conceivable that new alliances will emerge in Lebanon--like an alliance between your party, former President Sulayman Franjiyah and eventually the national movement?

[Answer] Our party has no problems with Sulayam Franjiyah, and we hope there will be none.

[Question] But do you see this relationship evolving into an alliance?

[Answer] When it comes to Lebanon and Lebanese interests, we are allied. Not everybody in an alliance has to see things in exactly the same way, but I believe Sulayman Franjiyah thinks the same way we do when it comes to the interpretation of the independence of Lebanon. On this we are allies. Get me more people who think that Lebanon should be independent, and they will automatically be our allies. We may differ on how things should be done internally, but before we start working on internal problems, let us solve our problems with the exterior first. Let's become independent, so that everyone who has something to say will be able to say it in a free and independent Lebanon in which the only authority is the Lebanese authority. Then we can talk about how we're going to teach people and make social laws or whatever. First give Lebanon back to the Lebanese. Once the Lebanese have it all in hand, they can decide freely what to do with it. But until then, let's not bark up the wrong tree.

[Question] Are you ready to enter into a dialog with the leaders of the Palestinian resistance with a view to regulating your relations pending the solution of the Palestinian problem?

[Answer] We have done it so many times, and to no avail. We're ready to do it again. But it is difficult to arrive at any solution or understanding with someone who happens to be in your country and does not respect your ideas about your own country.

If they accept in advance our ideas about our country--in other words, if they would like to stay in Lebanon within Lebanese laws and regulations, respecting Lebanese authority and not creating an authority of their own, as we have always said--then ahlan wa sahlan [welcome] to the discussion table. They have always been welcome in Lebanon on those conditions. If they accept them, we are ready, and I think everyone in Lebanon would be ready, to sit down with them and say, "You're welcome here. You can stay until the Palestinian problem is solved." We have never said the contrary.

[Question] The problem is that you always say, "If they're ready to do this or that, we will talk." Why not talk to arrive at this or that?

[Answer] Because we've done it so many times before, and nothing has happened.

Haven't we gone through this experience before, saying exactly what you're saying--"All right, let's sit down and talk and see how we can solve these problems"? We've done it. We've talked, and I think they fully understand what we mean. There is no reason why they should come to the table again pretending that they don't know what we want. They know exactly what we want, and if they want to come to the table, it means that they already accept what we want.

[Question] Have there been any meetings between the NLP and the Palestinians after the one that your brother Dany held with Yasir 'Arafat a few weeks ago?

[Answer] I don't know about Dany's meeting with Yasir 'Arafat. I never even bothered to ask him about it. That's one.

Secondly, there have been no other meetings.

Thirdly, I wish there would be meetings--but meetings, as I said, to solve the problem and not make it more difficult. Solving the problem means: Palestinians in Lebanon, ahlan wa sahlan, on one condition--Palestinians under Lebanese rule, not above it.

[Question] In your press conference, you expressed the belief that Lebanon should be liberated from foreigners, including the Syrians. Are you ready to discuss this with the Syrians?

[Answer] Was I given the chance to discuss it with the Syrians when they first come in? The Syrians came in because the Americans told us very, very plainly that if we wanted the fighting to stop in Lebanon, we must accept what they called the "Syrian initiative."

This is what high-level officials told me at the State Department in 1976, and this is why we accepted the Syrians or did not make too much of a fuss. We were convinced that the Syrians had different ideas in mind. It was the condition to put an end to the war, and we accepted it because after 40,000-50,000 people had died, we thought we must put an end to the fighting at any price. This was the basic consideration. We accepted the presence of the Syrians because it was imposed on us.

Why did the Americans do this? I think it is very plain to everybody today. They wanted to put a clamp on all sides and create a situation of status quo which would keep the Palestinians in Lebanon whether they or the Lebanese like it or not. Keeping the Palestinians in Lebanon is one way of solving one of the problems facing the American peace plan for this area. In other words, the Americans know that the Israelis would not accept any attempt to impose the return of the Palestinians to Palestine or to Israel, and that this would make the peace talks impossible.

If the Palestinians haven't seen this yet, they should see it, and if the rest of the Lebanese population hasn't realized it, they should realize it.

I think it's about time we ask the Syrians to please leave Lebanon--not because we want to throw the Palestinians out done their job. [as received] They have stopped the fighting, and I don't think there will be any more fighting. I don't think the Palestinians will fight the same kind of war that they tried in 1975, and I think it's about time that the Lebanese were given the opportunity to say what they want to say and do what they want to do in their own country.

If we all decide that we want independence, I think the time is ripe to tell the Syrians, "thank you very much. As Lebanese, we all thank you for what you have done, and the time has come for us to become good neighbors again. Please go back to Syria and let's become good neighbors again."

The Syrian forces are here today as nothing but occupation forces, and I also regard the Palestinians as occupying forces, but where the Palestinians are concerned, they can stay in Lebanon if they wish, but only if they abide by Lebanese rules.

So to the Syrians we say, "Gentlemen, thank you very much for what you've done, but your presence is becoming too heavy a burden, and for the sake of future relations between the two countries, please go back to Syria and see what's happening over there."

[Question] Who would you say was behind the abortive attempt on Ambassador's Dean's life last week?

[Answer] Your guess is as good as mine.

[Question] What about the reports in the leftist press that Phalagists were involved?

[Answer] I think that's a bit far-fetched. If the Phalagists wanted to do something like this, I think they're organized enough to be able to do it in an area where someone else would automatically be blamed for it. I think the perpetrators did it in this area precisely so someone can blame the Phalagists. That is my opinion. I don't think it's the Phalagists. Now, I could be completely mistaken, because, as I said, you guess is as good as mine.

[Question] How would you evaluate American policy toward the Lebanese front today?

[Answer] American policy is simply American policy--done by America for America, and not for Lebanon. If it happens that the interests of the Lebanese front or any other Lebanese faction coincide with American policy, so be it, but it would be a great mistake to think that American policy on Lebanon is made for Lebanon's sake. Like all big countries, America's policy is defined by its own interests.

[Question] Do those interests coincide with yours right now?

[Answer] Frankly, I don't see how. Because I think that those who allowed the Syrians in could take them out if they wanted to.

[Question] In the light of the recent talks between President Sham'un and Soviet Ambassador Alekandr Soldatov, can we say that there is a rapprochement between your party and the Soviet Union?

[Answer] Rapprochement between our party and the Soviet Union? I think it would be too pretentious for us to talk of a rapprochement between us and the Soviet Union.

I think it was simply to clarify certain ideas which the Soviet ambassador here may have had about our party or about certain declarations made by our party. It was simply to normalize a relationship between a political party and a foreign representation in the country.

TOURIST AFFAIRS REVIEWED BY MINISTER OF TOURISM

Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 1 Jul 80 p 7

[Interivew with Minister of Tourism 'Ali al-Khalil by Lur Ma'luf in Beirut; date not given.]

> [Text] The minister of tourism, Mr 'Ali al-Khalil, expressed optimism about the future of tourism in Lebanon. He said that preparations will begin next fall for the 1981 Ba'labakk summer festivals. Al-Khalil mentioned that the ministry of tourism's organization is considered unproductive under the current circumstances but it is working as much as possible toward [the promotion of] future tourism.

Minister al-Khalil opened the interview with the following statement:

"The tourism policy, like other administrative policies, is operating in two ways: The first method of operation is based on carrying out responsibilities assigned to the ministry of tourism and tourist organizations. This is achieved through conducting limited tourist activities whenever possible under the existing circumstances. We, of course, believe that these activities will not only help tourism, but will also participate in supporting Lebanese withstanding conflict and in bringing the situation back to normal.

"On the other hand, we are continually trying to strengthen tourist facilities so that Lebanon will be prepared for its tourist seasons in the coming years, which we hope will be quiet, stable and secure years.

In the politics of tourism, we are not only interested in carrying out our usual activities for the current year. We also have to plan for the future. For example, let us look at tourism during the summer season; we are planning for its success in the summer of 1980 but are also interested in achieving an overall plan for the years 1981, 1982 and 1983. Activities take place on two parallel courses: We, at the ministry of tourism, have activities to be carried out by the secretariat general and the National Council [for tourism]. Naturally, the National Council takes care of tourist activities abroad and tourism advertisements via announcements and publications which are aimed at attracting tourists. These publications are distributed to organizations, businessmen and other economically-influential people. This year we limited advertisement abroad to these publications to prove to businessmen that the situation in Lebanon is improving. Through these publications, we shed some light on the Lebanese situation.

"A tourist is not just the person who comes solely for recreational purposes; businessmen, bankers and employees of organizations passing through the Middle East are also effectively tourists. Tourist offices provide publications that give these tourists information about the country.

"The department of tourism takes care of regional tourist facilities and festivals, building beaches and hotels, and supervising tourist and travel agencies. The ministry of tourism manages tourist resthouses, in cooperation with the ministry of national education and fine arts.

"There is also a third [tourist] organization, represented by the secretariat general. Its main responsibility is to look for archeological sites. It is involved in excavations, acquisition of areas, searching for antiquities, maintenance of the museum and the bringing out of historic and archeological features. There are tourist places like the Ja'ita Cave, Bayt al-Din Palace, Ba'labakk, Tyre, Jubayl and others that are managed by this organization.

"This is the structure of the ministry of tourism. I cannot say this structure is productive under the present conditions; however, it maintains the status quo and strengthens the bases for future tourist activities."

[Question] Tourist festivals, such as the Ba'labakk festivals, are used to attract a large number of tourists. What, in your opinion, is the best way to attract tourists? Or do you think the current situation does not permit improvement?]

[Answer] The situation is not tense, and there is a chance to revive these festivals. The Ba'labakk festivals will be resumed in the near future, as preparations for these festivals will begin in the fall. That is, in the fall of 1980, we will start preparing for the summer of 1981.

Preparation for festivals requires travel abroad to contract with international professional groups and prepare the advertisement necessary to promote the festival. This means that we cannot prepare for a summer festival in the spring, especially for one at the level of those held in Ba'labakk.

[Question] How do you evaluate the tourist situation before and after the events?

[Answer] There is no doubt that tourism was experiencing growth in Lebanon in 1974. I had assumed the responsibilities of the ministry of tourism in 1973, for a short period of time. I recall that tourism was at its peak. During that time, the administration was as stable as possible. The continuous construction of hotels and the carrying out of tourist activities, particularly the Balabakk festivals, were proof that summer resorts and hotels were flourishing.

Tourism is naturally affected by the security situation, as the Lebanese economy is based on services. There is no other country in the world with such characteristics. The tourist comes to Lebanon to relax; he will not come if it is unsafe. Thus, this sector was affected by the situation that existed throughout the country.

However, we hope that the situation will improve in 1980 and the coming years. I repeat that security is the most important factor allowing tourism to continue its growth under our sponsorship.

[Question] What about the hotels that were destroyed during the war? How can the government help them? Can the central bank give them loans to continue their tourist activities?

[Answer] First, there are some hotel establishments that have outstanding bank loans, but this subject will be treated (like others) through parliamentary decisions. A parliamentary session was held to study this matter and the matter of loan installments. Many organizations, including hotels, who had bank loans stopped their operations during the year. Of course, they were unable to pay off their outstanding loans. Since there are conditions to be met for loan disbursement, banks could refuse giving new loans until they have received their outstanding loan payments. I do not know to what extent we can establish a reasonable balance between promoting consumers benefits, and giving the banks a chance to survive.

[Question] What tourist projects are currently being carried out?

[Answer] There is the resthouse project, such as the Sidon and 'Anjar resthouses, the Ja'ita Cave improvement project, and other tourist projects under study for implementation, among which is the Dayr al-Qamar project which will be put into effect soon.

[Question] Do you encourage the construction of new [private] beaches or does the government lean toward encouraging free [public beaches]?

[Answer] The syndicate of beach owners in Lebanon, in cooperation with the ministry of tourism, is participating in building these [free] beaches. These, of course, require the attention of concerned municipalities as well as the ministry of public works and transport in relation to the coasts. At the same time, they need financial support. Swimming should not be costly on a coast like that of Lebanon. There are currently 2 public beaches under study in the Tabarja and al-Manarah areas.

COOPERATIVE CENTER APPROVED BY COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

Beirut AL-SAFIR in Arabic 3 Jul 80 p 6

[Statute of Cooperative Center As Approved By Council of Ministers]

[Text] During its session yesterday, the council of ministers approved the basic statute governing the "cooperative center" which will be in charge of imports, purchases, contracts, and wholesale and retail operations related to food products, as well as the most significant consumer goods and animal and agricultural products and byproducts.

The center is authorized to establish public markets in various areas, and deal with them directly without the use of middlemen. This project was embodied in one of the major resolutions of the conference of the General Labor Federation. The following is the basic statute governing the center:

Article 1: Definitions:

Terms that appear in the statute have the following meanings:

Law - the establishing the cooperative center.

Minister - the minister of housing and cooperatives.

Board - the board of directors of the cooperative center.

Chairman - the chairman of the board.

Section 1 - The Administration of the Center

Chapter 1: Board of Directors

Article 2: The board of directors consists of a chairman and 8 members appointed in accordance with the bylaws of Article 3. Under the same decree, 2 of these members will be named vice chairmen, one for purhcasing and import affairs, the other for packing and sales affairs.

Article 3: The board will serve for a period of 5 years from the date of issuance of the appointment decree. If the service period expires and is not renewed, or a new board is not appointed, the same board will retain its duties and appropriate authorities until a decree for renewal or appointment is issued.

Article 4: The following titles should not be held by the same person: chairman and vice chairman, or minister and member of parliament or any other position in the government or in public organizations or independent agencies.

Article 5: The chairman will conduct board meetings at least once a week.

The government representative may call the board for an emergency session at any time.

The board may invite to its meetings, and for consulting purposes, any specialists they choose, provided these specialists do not participate in voting.

Article 6: The board meeting is presided over by the chairman who also leads the discussions. In his absence, the older of the 2 vice chairmen acts on his behalf.

Members must personally attend the meetings; they cannot delegate anyone to represent them.

Article 7: Minutes will be recorded during each meeting and will be given to the trustee minister within no more than 1 week after [the meeting].

Decisions are considered effective if the trustee minister does not uphold the government commissioner's veto of these decisions within one week from the date of the veto.

Article 8: The board manages the center's functions, ensures its progress and protects its interests. It has, for these purposes, comprehensive authorities in accordance with regulations in force and this statute. It has, but is not limited to the following functions:

1 - It outlines the center's general policy.

2 - It approves the center's budget and sees that it is properly executed.

3 - It approves all deals, contracts and agreements that are in excess of 100,000 Lebanese pounds.

4 - It accepts donations and grants from any source.

5 - It opens bank accounts following approval by the trustee minister.

6 - It delegates necessary authority to its chairman or one of his vice chairmen.

Chapter 2 - Administration of the Center

Article 9: The chairman is the (alternative) chairman of all [functions] at the center and has the following functions in particular:

1 - He represents the center before the state and court and other bodies and carries out all the work and proceedings required by this representation.

2 - He signs all deals, contracts and agreements and approves expenses that do not exceed 100,000 Lebanese pounds.

3 - He signs checks, vouchers, notes and bank accounts with one of his vice chairmen as co-signer, in accordance with their jurisdictions.

4 - He prepares a proposed budget and presents it to the board for approval. It does not become effective until the trustee minister has approved it.

5 - He prepares a semi-annual report on the activities of the center and presents it to the trustee minister after the board approves it.

6 - He sees that the center's work is properly carried out and takes the necessary measures to ensure that.

Article 10: The vice chairman of purchasing and imports is responsible for handling all related duties.

Article 11: The vice chairman of packing and sales is responsible for handling all related duties and the settlement of all transactions pertaining to these activities.

Article 12: The minister can issue a decision appointing an assistant chairman or assistant vice chairman.

Section 2 - Trusteeship Powers

Chapter 1 - Powers of the "Trustee" Minister

Article 13: In addition to the decisions which, under the laws and regulations, are subject to the approval of the trusteeship authority, the following decisions of the board are subject to the minister's approval:

1 - The establishment of branches, public markets and distribution centers.

2 - The general annual budget.

3 - The opening of bank accounts.

4 - The definition of the center's ownership and the workers' and employees' conditions of employment and compensation.

5 - The hiring and dismissal of permanent employees and workers.

Chapter 2 - The Government Commissioner

Article 14: The government commissioner enjoys the authority given to him in accordance with the laws and regulations in force, particularly the following:

1 - He attends the council's sessions and enjoys the right of discussion without voting.

2 - He calls emergency sessions for the council.

3 - He has the right to veto all board decisions, provided the trustee approves this opposition within 1 week.

Section 3 - The Center's Controllership Authority

Chapter 1 - The Financial Controller

Article 15: The financial controller exercises the following authorities:

- He oversees implementation of the center's budget, manages and controls its finances.

- He checks the accuracy of the center's special and regular accounts, loans, debts and their validity.

Article 15: The financial controller prepares an annual report on the center's business and activities from a financial standpoint, and gives copies to the minister of finance, the trustee minister, the council and the government commissioner.

Article 17: The financial controller may not receive any salary or compensation from the center.

Chapter 2 - The Audit Commissioner

Article 18: An audit commissioner is appointed under contract signed by the minister of housing and cooperatives. He reviews all the records, reports, documents, financial statements, inventory lists, the general budget and other center-related accounts.

Article 19: The audit commissioner prepares a report on all inadequacies or violations he notices in the center's activities. This report is immediately handed to the chairman, with copies to the trustee minister and the government commissioner.

Article 20: In addition to his general annual report, the audit commissioner prepares a detailed monthly report about the center's financial situation, its business and his audit results, and gives it to the trustee minister, with copies to the council and the government commissioner.

Chapter 3 - The General Administrative Supervisor

Article 21: The general administrative supervisor must have at least 10 years of administrative experience in addition to a college degree. He is appointed by a decree issued by the minister of housing and cooperatives. He oversees the progress of work at the center, and examines and exercises supervision over the following:

1 - The carrying out of duties and responsibilities by employees.

2 - Employee behavior, particularly in relation to their being on time.

3 - Employees' abidance by laws and regulations in performing their jobs.

4 - Investigation of petitions and complaints and their related results.

Article 22: Supervision is conducted periodically and on the basis of special assignments by the minister, or the chairman or one of the vice chairmen of the board of directors.

- Every six months, the general administrative supervisor prepares a report to the minister on his work, his inspection tours and the results of his inspection reports.

Section 4 - The Center's Financial Affairs

Article 23: The center's financial resources consist of the following:

1 - Commissions which the centers adds to the price of goods in accordance with Article 1 of the law.

2 - Donations and grants.

3 - Special allotments in the general budget.

4 - Interest earned on money deposited in banks.

Article 24: The chairman prepares the proposed annual budget and presents it to the board of directors before the end of September each year.

The board must, before the end of October, approve and present the budget to the minister.

Article 25: The chairman specifies a cut-off date for the financial year, provided it is no later than the last day of March of each year.

The board approves the cut-off date and gives a copy of the approval to the minister before the end of April.

Article 26: Loans and treasury advances are to be spent for the purposes they are allotted for. Special funds necessary to pay off outstanding loans are accounted for annually in the center's budget.

Section 5 - Conditions of Employment, Salaries and Compensation

Article 27: The conditions of employment, salaries and compensation are to be defined in accordance with the attached schedule [AL-SAFIR does not carry the schedule in question].

Article 28: The center's staff will be determined by its needs, by decisions issued by the board. These decisions are not effective until the trustee minister approves them.

Article 29: The hiring and dismissal of employees and workers is implemented by a decision of the board of directors upon the chairman's recommendation. This procedure becomes effective only after the trustee minister approves it.

As for temporary workers who are used for emergency and temporary work, they are hired when there is a need for them. Their salaries and compensation are decided by the chairman.

Article 30: This statute takes effect upon its promulgation by decree.

FOREIGN MINISTER DISCUSSES RELATIONS WITH MAURITANIA, ARAB WORLD

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 11-17 Aug 80 p 22

[Interview with Moroccan Foreign Minister M'hamed Boucetta, Conducted by Rashid Khashanah, in Tunis; date not given]

[Text] The Western Sahara conflict has undergone some developments recently, following the extraordinary conference of the Algerian Liberation Front and the OAU's Freetown summit, not to mention military developments in the territory of the conflict itself. Morocco's Foreign Minister M'hamed Boucetta reviews his government's position regarding these developments, evaluates relations between the Arab Maghrib countries, and explains his stand on the question of alliances within the Arab world, in an interview with AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI during his recent visit to Tunisia.

[Question] Ever since the last conference of the Algerian Liberation Front, there have been hints that the tension between Algeria and Morocco will be eliminated. Do you believe that there has actually been any development in attitudes which would permit rapprochement between the two sides?

[Answer] Current issues in Algeria are primarily and above all domestic issues concerning the Algerian regime and the adjustments which Algerian officials feel are necessary. As for relations with Morocco and the regional tension, we feel that a clearer understanding of the situation has begun to emerge, no doubt, because the matter primarily pertains to the attacks from the Algerian borders of which we in Morocco have been the victims. In this respect, there has been no change in our viewpoint; in fact, as Moroccans we must take every step to defend our country. In fact, we wish an end could be put to this tension, because it is not in the interest of either the Algerian or Moroccan people or the region as a whole.

There is talk in the air indicating the possibility of creating a climate for this mutual understanding. In any case, Morocco will not hesitate to do everything in its power to prevent this tension and to make the dialog more open, so as to create ways of regional economic development and fruitful cooperation. But we have not yet observed anything definitely new.

[Question] Moroccan-Mauritanian relations have gone through many twistings and turnings, and sometimes real shocks, especially after the Algiers agreement between the Polisario and Mauritania. How do you evaluate present Moroccan-Mauritanian relations?

[Answer] As you know, Mauritania took it on itself to adopt a so-called "neutral" stand on this issue. We don't want to impose any stand on Mauritania, just as we would not allow one to be imposed on us, because this issue primarily and above all pertains to sovereignty. What we will remark on about our Mauritanian brothers is that there were agreements between us, in the fields of regional security and defense of Mauritania's safety, the region's safety and our own safety. There were also agreements for joint economic activity and rapprochement in many fields, in some of which slackness was observed after the Algiers agreement. But nevertheless we tried and we are always trying to make Moroccan-Mauritanian relations friendly and cooperative in all spheres, because in any case we share a common destiny with Mauritania. We hope that Mauritanian officials understand that their relations with their neighbors, especially Morocco, do not concern Mauritania alone but the entire region. We will strive to make these relations cooperative ones.

We Did Not Reject Mediation

[Question] Recently, attempts to mediate between Algeria and Morocco have intensified, and there has been talk of Saudi mediation and then Tunisian mediation, because of Prince Fahd's visit to Rabat and then Mohamed Mzali's recent visit. Why has Morocco rejected this mediation? What are the conditions and guarantees under which Morocco would agree to mediation to solve the conflict?

[Answer] There have in fact been a number of attempts by fraternal and friendly countries, who want to put an end to the tension existing in the region and between Morocco and Algeria; this is a fact we cannot deny. As for the statement that Morocco has rejected mediation, this is untrue, because Morocco has always wanted to end the existing tension. The first attempt was by President Bourguiba, and after that came attempts by Saudi Arabia to create an atmosphere of rapprochement. Then there was Mr Mzali's visit, during which we acquainted him with the true situation. I don't think that there has been any mediation in the true sense, but just a search for ways to open the dialog. I can affirm that Morocco has not rejected and will not reject this, because we are prepared to do everything which might bring about rapprochement.

[Question] There has been much talk about Polisario's moving its military operations to southern Morocco. Some people have even said that the Boucraa mines, for example, have been or will be closed. Do you believe that transferring the battle to southern Morocco would postpone the hour of solution by causing economic harm to southern Morocco?

[Answer] This has many interpretations, and much has been said about it. There is actually a mercenary gang attacking Morocco--no one can deny this. As for economic activities, whether pertaining to the Boucraa mines or to other existing activities in the region, they are following their natural course. In fact, there are some very important harbor, housing, factory and road projects which are currently proceeding as usual. Morocco had to look at this issue from the point of view of the aggressor. It has actually taken this viewpoint, and has adopted the appropriate measures, whether pertaining to the military sphere, i.e. security measures so as to concentrate its forces, or to the necessary equipment and the mobilization of the people to resist these attacks. Economic projects are proceeding as usual.

[Question] What is Morocco's attitude toward the OAU and the Steadfastness Front countries, after the stands which both groups adopted vis-a-vis the struggle in the Western Sahara?

[Answer] Our attitude towards the OAU is clear. We feel that this issue is one of Moroccan territorial integrity. Some states feel that colonialism has not been eliminated in this region. Therefore, we did not accept the Monrovia recommendations, because they were not serious and did not respect the organization's laws, and we had obvious reservations about them at the time. Now, a number of African states have begun to comprehend the real situation, and there is no better proof of this than the stands which were decisively adopted at the last conference at Freetown.

[Question] But there was a split at the last conference.

[Answer] It almost occurred. Half the organization's members adopted a clear stand, and this is what I was referring to when I said that some African states had comprehended the real situation. I know that accepting a group like this one, government or state, into the organization would give this organization little hope of remaining. There were some decisive stands taken by some of the organization's states.

No Essential Difference

[Question] In the context of differing Arab reactions to the policy of the Egyptian regime, the viewpoints and policies of Arab governments towards the current phase have varied. Therefore, we have observed that after the formation of the Steadfastness Front there has been a kind of rapprochement or alliance among a number of Arab states which refused to join that front, especially Riyadh, Rabat, Tunis, and other countries. Even the Tunisian prime minister, while visiting Morocco, spoke of "a chain stretching from Rabat to Riyadh." Do you think it likely that this trend, which is relatively isolated in its way of looking at the circumstances, will crystallize and change into a front or alliance?

[Answer] This question contains several questions. I don't want to talk about the stands adopted by the Steadfastness Front states, for this concerns those states which have joined it. What concerns us, as Morocco first of all, is that our stand on the Arab cause and the Palestinian cause is one to which we have clearly adhered, first at the 1974 Rabat summit, the basic factors of which were carried over to the Baghdad summit, and then at Tunis. We explained that these agreements which were signed would not solve the problem, because they did not deal with the essential issue, the Palestinian cause and the establishment of the Palestinian state. Naturally, there are individual relations among some Arab states, which are perhaps firmer between one party and another than those existing among the Arab community. But Morocco's position will always remain well within Arab solidarity. We have firm relations with Tunisia, Saudi Arabia, and Iraq, for example.

[Question] In spite of the diversity of regimes?

[Answer] There is no difference with respect to the essential issue. There are also bilateral relations with Kuwait, the UAE, and other states. It is incorrect, in my opinion, to speak of an axis. There are doubtless firm relations, but as for the creation of an axis to counter a second line in the Arab community, this is not so with respect to Morocco. We want to unify our lines in the Arab national interest. We don't want to drive a wedge in the heart of the Arab nation, or to create an axis to counter a second axis. This is not in the interest of the Arab nation, its people, or its basic cause.

GERMANY OFFERS COUNTRY TECHNICAL, SCIENTIFIC TRAINING

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 15 Jun 80 p 14

/Article: "Saudi-German Cooperation in Development, Science and Technology"/

/Text/ Saudi-German cooperation in the cultural fields is concentrated on the vocational training process and technical instruction, in order to benefit from lengthy German expertise in this field. Therefore, at the beginning of the sixties, as it was on its long road toward development, industrialization, and the development of its basic economic facilities, the kingdom oriented itself toward a Western European country which was known for its scientific and technical progress, the Federal Republic of Germany, so that we could build bridges of cooperation and participation with Germany in an important field, that of development policy and scien tific and technical cooperation.

In the early part of the sixties, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia decided to spread vocational and technical training throughout various parts of the country. After long study and investigation with organizations belonging to the United Nations and some industrially developed countries, the Saudi government, in 1964, adopted an important decision, stipulating that the vocational training system applied in West Germany would be applied, and it embarked on negotiations bearing on this subject with the federal government in Bonn. The first Saudi-German technical and vocational training agreement was signed in 1966, stipulating that German advice and expertise and German professors, trainers and experts would be provided for the Kingdom of Suadi Arabia and that it would contribute to supplying Saudi technical and qualifying institutes, schools and centers with machinery, equipment and supplies for education, training, studies and books, at the expense of the Saudi government itself. The first group of German experts, professors and trainers arrived in the kingdom toward the end of 1966, consisting of five professors to engage in work in the industrial vocational school in the town of al-Hufuf, as well as a German expert for the Saudi Ministry of Education who would coordinate activity between the German and Saudi parties and would set out a practical applied study on the possibility of establishing a group of new training centers in various parts of the kingdom and establishing the necessary contacts with agencies responsible for this matter in Germany, the kingdom and the organizations belonging to the United Nations and the international development programs.

This agreement witnessed a number of modifications which were introduced before it was decided to conclude a new technical cooperation agreement between Bonn and Riyadh in 1975 whose costs were estimated at about 1 billion Saudi riyals. The latter is considered to be the first agreement of its kind which the Federal Republic of Germany has reached with a country of the third world founded on bases related to the policy of developmental cooperation in exchange for the payment of expenses. This is a policy bearing on rich developing countries, in particular the oil producing countries, which the federal government adopted in early 1974 following the explosion of the crisis in oil and raw materials in the world, and it is aimed at offering developmental assistance to rich developing countries which are headed along the road to development and industrialization, in exchange for payment of the costs of these expenses, and cooperation with them in various developmental fields which they select for themselves for their own interests.

Supervising the implementation of this new developmental policy, which many industrial countries in the world have adopted, is the federal Ministry of Economic Cooperation in Bonn, while the German Technical Cooperation Organization assumes charge of the executive aspect of this policy, which is to provide technical development aid. This German organization is a quasi official one which makes contracts with economic, industrial and technical organizations and German and foreign experts, professors and trainers to carry out specific programs in the context of technological development, as well as providing technical equipment and training and teaching aids and erecting educational, applied and model buildings, schools, facilities and centers. This organization, which is known by the name GTZ, has been able in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia to take part in constructing institutes, schools, and training and vocational shops in Riyadh, Jiddah, al-Hufuf, al-Ta'if, 'Unayzah, Buraydah and al-Dammam in the framework of propagating vocational training in various areas of the kingdom. The number of experts with this organization who are working in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia today exceeds 75 and it is expected that this will increase to no less than 150 by 1985.

At the beginning of this year, 1980, the duration of this technical cooperation agreement was extended during a visit to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia by the federal minister of economic cooperation, Dr Otto Graf Lambsdorff, with the objective of strengthening economic relations and offering more technical and technological aid to the kingdom in the scope of the 1980-1985 5-year development plan.

Dr Hartmut Neuel, director general of the German Technical Cooperation Organization, says:

"German-Saudi cooperation in the technological and vocational field goes back to the sixties, when the first agreement was signed between the two countries in the field of vocational training and technical education. It clearly shows the extent of the possibility of succeeding in transferring technology from industrial countries to third world countries taking urgent steps in the industrialization and development field, and the extent of the success of German-Saudi cooperation in implementation of development and improvement projects in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, and this has led to the extension of the validity of this agreement for another 5 years, when these projects will be handed over to earnest Saudi personnel."

STATUS OF NATION'S POWER GENERATING CAPACITY REVIEWED

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 19 Jun 80 p 5

/Article by Sa'ud al-Salih al-Musaybih: "The State of Electricity This Summer"/

/Text/ No two persons will disagree over the importance electricity has attained and the degree to which it is essential for every house and to which it must continue and not be cut off. The capital, Riyadh, has always suffered from repeated cutoffs of electricity every summer season; when summer approaches the citizen prepares himself to receive it and nostalgia has accustomed him, forcing your brother not to forsake the equipment of the past. The "feather duster" becomes the air conditioner and the "waterskin" and the "pot" become equipment one cannot do without at all in cooling water; the "burlap bag," by spraying it with water and putting vegetables and watermelon in it, becomes an irreplaceable refrigerator. Let us not forget, either, a return to the preservation of meat by the old method. In general, all these things have been returning to the inhabitants of the town of Riyadh when the summer season approaches.

The citizens have become accustomed to this, although what we observe is that the cutoffs have started to decrease, if not actually cease, thanks to the efforts which the management of the Electric Company of Riyadh and Outskirts has made and is making because of the great interest on the part of people directly responsible for the matter of Riyadh's electricity. We are not stating this out of hypocrisy or propaganda on behalf of the company; rather, it is a fact, and the citizen felt and is feeling this change, both last year and this year. We can stress this through the superb achievement which has taken place for the first time during the examination period, which passed safely without any cutoffs. This phenomenon might give us hope that the company will be prepared and able strongly to persevere this summer through sound planning and early preparation. Dear reader, it pleases us, during this report, to meet with Eng 'Abd-al-'Aziz 'Abd-al-Wahid, manager of the Electric Company of Riyadh and Outskirts, who has described for the citizen everything concerning the company's preparations for the summer in addition to many important things which concern the citizen. This discussion took place and we hope it will take care of everything which is of concern and interest to the citizen concerning electricity and the electric company, since it discusses the preparations the Riyadh Electric Company has made and is making to eliminate the problem of the cutoff of electricity, provisionally this summer and definitively in coming years.

Most of the cutoffs arise from the load on branch distribution stations and main supply cables or the old overhead network which operates at a level of 4,160 volts.

For 3 years the company has embraced a radical solution to deal with this problem in particular and to improve the conditions of the electric service the Riyadh Electric Company provides in general.

It has striven to redesign and replan its main systems and main supply cables, providing suitable voltage for transmission and distribution lines and stations to guarantee that current will be transmitted and bear demand, and then to get rid of the old overhead system which is no longer considered at all suitable for the conditions of electricity demand in the city of Riyadh.

With thanks to God, it has succeeded in carrying out the major portion of this task, so far completing the construction of a circular line around the city of Riyadh to transmit current at a level of 132,000 volts. In the past 2 years, 310 kilometers of ground and overhead cable have been put into operation, functioning at this voltage, and 17 main transfer stations working at this voltage also have been put into operation.

In addition, 330,000 volt and 13,800 volt lines have been consolidated, and the total put into operation at both of these two voltages came to 612 kilometers in 1979. In the first half of this year, alone, 370 kilometers were laid and put in operation.

The distribution stations operating at 33,000 volts rose in number from 17 at the end of 1977 to 62 at present, that is, an increase of 264 percent; what was installed in 1979 exceeds what had been installed and put in operation since the company was established. The total number of stations operating as of the start of 1979 came to 1,243 while those installed in 1979 alone came to 1,780. The total number of stations in service now comes to 3,975.

As regards the overhead system operating at 4,160 volts, it has been possible with God's help to get rid of 95 percent of that and replace it with a 13,800-volt network. This was achieved in record time of less than 2 years. These achievements were accompanied by the development of major and periodic maintenance services on the lines and distribution stations.

This has all been reflected in the improvement of the conditions of the systems, which has led to the elimination of part of the major technical explanations for the cutoffs the city of Riyadh was complaining about.

As regards the cutoffs to come, they result either from the lines being struck by contractors at excavations for other utilities or what lie within the normal limit of breakdowns in any network system in any country.

The Seventh Station Will Be Adequate for Riyadh's Consumption

Regarding the Riyadh Electric Company's projects to cover all areas and new sections with electricity, Eng 'Abd-al-'Aziz al-'Abd-al-Wahid said, "The company is trying, indeed is committed to not deviating from its new policy of finishing the extensions to every area before the design and planning of its main system, thus guaranteeing that the maximum will be provided for in the development of the region. This is all so that we may avoid recurrent problems from 'weak systems.' However, this has not prevented and will not prevent the sound, secure linkup of electricity to all sections of the city of Riyadh--in fact, the element of speed has commicted us to a policy of bidding out these areas as independent projects to contractors besides our ordinary ones.

"In the past 2 years, we have sought to complete the bookup of electricity to the sections of al-Nasim, al-Rabwah, Baghlaf, the King Faysal model section, Shubra, al-Rahmaniyah, north al-'Ulya, al-Suwaydi, al-Fawwaz, al-Rawdah 1, al-Rawda 2, al-Dar al-Bayda', the district of north Station Four, north al-Sulaymaniyah, and al-Dar'iyah al-Jadidah."

On what has been done as far as the great station on the al-Kharj Road, on which work is now underway, when it will be completed, and probable part it will play, the director general of the Riyadh Electric Company said,

"This station is called the company's installed generating plant in fact is almost the biggest gas turbine station burning raw fuel in the world. It consists of 16 gas turbine units with a capacity of 50,000 kilowatts each, or a total capacity of 800,000 kilowatts.

"The contract was signed for that on 5 July 1979 with the American General Electric Company and work on this project is continuing urgently. The first unit will be ready for operation in mid-July 1980, and this will be followed by the other units at a rate of one per month.

"This station will back up the generation requirements of the city and outskirts of Riyadh."

255 Meter Change Requests per Month

On the process of changing and replacing meters, and the fact that that requires much time, especially when we realize that the area is inside the city and that the electricity is under high voltage, and what the reason for that is, he said, "The process of changing or replacing meters occurs spontaneously as a result of the breakdown of the meter or the fact that it is burned, or as a result of a request from the customer as a result of increased load on the meter.

"With respect to the first case, the replacement process does not take any time worth mentioning.

"With respect to the second case, it is necessary to restudy the situation so that supply will occur in a sound manner which will suffice to meet requirements and the customer will not commit the same error again.

"Following the improvement in the conditions of the systems, we have started to implement about 255 requests a month, while we receive about 330.

"In our opinion, the rates are drawing close together, to the point where the time will soon come where replacement or added loads will occur as soon as the request is received."

A Complete Training Policy

On the role the company is playing to prepare young Saudis qualified for future technical activities in the company, Eng 'Abd-al-Wahid said,

"The company is devoting special attention to this aspect, but there was no training program some time ago except for those contained in import contracts with the manufacturing firms.

"Recently a training policy has been carried out which is concentrated on three aspects:

"1. Raising the competence of Saudi employees by sending them on educational and training missions abroad (the United States, Britain, Ireland, Japan), reaching periods of 4 years in some cases, after which the trainee graduates as an engineer or a managerial person. The number of people sent on missions, receiving training and studies in various fields of electrical engineering, business administration and language courses, reached 57. A comprehensive evaluation of all Saudi employees in the company is now taking place to determine the missions which should be sent this year.

"2. Establishing a training and teaching center which will take charge of developing the employees' capabilities through training courses as they perform their jobs. The number of these courses in 1979 came to 150, and 1,300 employees benefited from them.

"This year 59 courses were held and 38 employees benefited from them.

"These courses include operation of modern machinery and equipment to connect and weld cables, lay underground and overhead lines, maintenance activities, transformer installation, safety and English language programs.

"3. The company has also proceeded to enroll a number of students with intermediate and primary educations in the teaching and training center, exposing them to intensified training and teaching for a period of 18 months, after which they are qualified to work in systems activities.

"The first group, consisting of 48 pupils, joined this course starting 1 January 1980.

"The second group will join on 22 August 1980."

22 Invoice Collection Centers

On the reasons for the small number of company collection centers, whether there would be a solution to this problem in the future, whether there was a solution to the problem that readers come to houses in the morning when the owners are not present, and the development plans the company would carry out in order to develop distribution so that that would be consonant with the development steps the company was witnessing, he said:

"The situation might be correct as far as previous years go; up to late 1979 we had just 12 collection centers whereas there are now 22 collection centers working in the morning and afternoon periods. That is an adequate number at present.

"As regards solutions, we have studied the customer's response to this method and his readiness to accept it.

"As to the fact that readers visit and arrive at houses in the morning, the company has recently adopted a system of installing meters outside homes and has proceeded to implement this system in the new sections. As for the old sections, the company will bring the meters outside the homes soon, God willing, as in the new sections. In any case the meter readers have clear plain instructions to return to read the meters whose owners do not want to be visited in the morning; they will return in the afternoons."

Regarding the benefits the company offers its workers, and whether it intends to give them other benefits:

"The company is very anxious to provide good psychological climate for its employees and is exerting efforts to prepare the employee and provide him with good circumstances which will make him able to produce, create and innovate in an exceptional manner, and carry out his work with full enthusiasm so his production will be more abundant, his thinking clearer and his fitness better. Thus numerous excellent opportunities have been furnished for education, domestically and abroad; he and his family are provided with free health care and in addition housing has been built for technicians at the company stations and there is a transportation allowance. In addition, attention is given to cultural and recreational aspects. A large library has been built which contains many religious and literary books, sources, textbooks and technical books. The effort has been made to create soccer, ping-pong and volleyball courts and we are studying the possibility of adding other benefits which are in harmony with the development of the workforce in the kingdom."

Regarding the situation he hopes to see the company enjoy in the future, Eng 'Abd-al-'Aziz al 'Abd-al-Wahid said,

"The subject of contentment is always a relative one. In my opinion no one is wholly satisfied with the job whose responsibilities he pursues and whose concerns he exercises, especially if this job is directly and firmly connected to the public and he has a strong bond with their interests and comfort. Therefore, to speak the truth, I do not believe that I will ever reach the point of satisfaction with everything there is; I wish for development in our service."

On the role which is expected of the citizen toward the company, so that the company may provide the best services, he said, "Giving proper information at times of requests, in terms of the location and the equipment to be installed, the appliances to be used with electricity, and so forth, and guiding consumption, I mean, using electricity when we need it and when we are at home, since there is no use in leaving air conditioners on while the whole family is outside the house, and providing adequate houses in the plans for new sections."

On the role the company has played and is playing to insure the principle of safety for citizens, Eng 'Abd-al Wahid said,

"The company has printed a brochure which is being distributed among all customers containing information bearing on ways of coping with accidents arising from electric current and means to avoid their occurrence at the outset. If its contents are observed, that will be adequate."

SOVIETS SAID PREPARING FOR AL-ASAD'S DEMISE

Cairo AL-JUMHURIYAH in Arabic 16 Jul 80 p 1

[Article: "Moscow Preparing for Coup Against al-Asad; 4,000 Soviet Troops Arrive in Syria"]

[Text] London--Thousands of pieces of Soviet equipment and weapons are flowing into Damascus. Four thousand Soviet advisers and experts have arrived in Syria and this figure will be doubled shortly in the wake of a secret treaty already concluded between the Soviet Union and Syria.

Western intelligence sources have reported that General (Shevloc), the deputy chairman of the Soviet army's Political Department, was seen in Damascus recently.

These sources link Shevloc's visit with the visit by his chief, General (Yebitchiev), to Kabul last fall. The sources have also said that the Soviets do not send their prominent generals to any area unless they are on the threshold of an enormous change in their policy and they are about to adopt a serious decision concerning involvement of the Soviet combat troops.

Yebitchiev's arrival in Afghanistan was in preparation for the Soviet invasion of Kabul. It is not unlikely that Shevloc's visit is in preparation for the inflow of Soviet forces to Damascus to support al-Asad and to prepare for staging a deep coup.

It is said in the western intelligence sources that Russia is searching for another Babrak Karmal in Syria to stage a coup against al-Asad like the one staged in Kabul. [sic]

To realize this, the Soviets are currently cooperating with the Syrian intelligence and they have sent units of commando forces known by the name of the (Spisnaz) to take part with the Syrian army in wiping out the rebels in northern Syria who reject the local government system.

Families of the Soviet advisers have been withdrawn from northern Syria after repeated attacks against them.

RIF'AT AL-ASAD'S VISIT TO RIYADH, RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ANALYZED

London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 25 Jul 80 pp 20-21

[Article by Sulayman al-Farzali: "In Wake of Rif'at al-Asad's Visit to Riyadh: Furious Race in Area Between Relaxation and Explotion; Damascus Apprehensive of Political Dimensions of U.S. Congressional Resolution to Stop Aid to Syria"]

[Text] The surprise visit recently paid by Rif'at al-Asad, the brother of Syrian President Hafiz al-Asad, to Saudi Arabia has been the main subject discussed by the press and diplomatic circles in the major capitals, especially since the visit has come in the wake of noticeable frigidity in the relations between Damascus and Riyadh--a frigidity that has been secret to nobody. The importance and delicate nature of the mission have been indicated by the fact that the Syrian President has chosen his brother and not anybody else for this mission. The importance of political missions is usually measured by the importance of the persons chosen for them.

Therefore, the importance of the visit is not the subject of discussion. What has drawn the observers' attention is its timing. It is from this timing that they have made their conclusions regarding the issues discussed, especially since only implicit information has been leaked besides the joint communique which, in turn, indicates the importance of the new Syrian-Saudi meeting under the special domestic circumstances of Syria, the general political and international circumstances through which the Middle East crisis is passing and under the circumstances of the current Arab relations--relations that have weakened in comparison to what they were between the Baghdad and Tunis summits.

Rif'at al-Asad's visit to Riyadh has coincided with the second military coup staged by the Lebanese Phalanges in the eastern area and with Iraq's celebration of the July revolution anniversary. The visit has also come in the wake of Damascus' decision that visas must be acquired before entry into Syria--a decision which forced nearly 50,000 Saudi summer vacationers who had been on their way to Bludan and Latakia to return home--and in the wake of the U.S. Congress' resolution to abolish the U.S. aid for Syria.

Some [observers] say that the Syrian President has sent his brother to Riyadh to tell the Saudis that the president's serious step in the direction of the Soviet Union is no "joke" this time, unless Syria's conditions and interests are taken into consideration by the others. These observers add that the Syrian President has thus thrown the ball in their [the Saudis'] court, absolving himself of the choice. Others say that Syria has not been in need of the Amman conference to show that it has been under a state of "Arab siege" which has contributed to complicating its internal situation and weakening its position toward the Camp David accords, that it has been forced to break this siege either in the Saudi direction or the Iraqi direction and that it has chosen the former direction for numerous considerations, especially since all the previous coordination attempts made between Baghdad and Damascus since 1970--the latest being the agreement whose page was turned over almost a year ago--have failed. The Iraqis have their view on why the Syrian regime has knocked at the Saudi door and not their door this time. They point out that the Syrian regime had always come to them to overcome an international dilemma or a critical domestic dilemma and that they have always opened the door for this regime and turned a new page with it only to find that the relations would deteriorate anew and that this deterioration would be followed by vituperations and attacks. According to the Iraqis, this has futilely repeated for three times and they are not ready for a fourth experiment. The Iraqis, according to what they say, are not hostile to the Syrian regime, in the sense that they fulfill their commitments toward this regime on time and that they do not offer its domestic opponents any aid, regardless of their opinions of this regime's policy and positions. But at the same time, they do not want to give this regime the opportunity to use them to strengthen itself against its enemies at home and against the other Arab axes. Insofar as Damascus is concerned, the Iraqi game has ended within the same framework in which it had been projected previously, namely the unionist framework, and this game is still possible within a general Arab framework to which Baghdad is not the inlet. The Iraqi-Syrian relations are normal but are not likely to become better or worse in the short run. This is why the Syrian complaint is focused on Jordan these days. The Syrians accuse the Jordanians openly of supplying the Muslim Brotherhood with aid and of providing it with the opportunities of training and of transporting weapons [into Syria]. Even though the Syrians do not make a similar complaint against Iraq and even though the lukewarm relations between Baghdad and Damascus have not reached the point of open hostility which had prevailed 2 years ago, the Syrians hint at the presence of a Jordanian-Iraqi alliance which is tacitly approved by Saudi Arabia. This, according to the observers, has its causes and will have its consequences when the outcome of Rif'at al-Asad's visit to Riyadh appears.

It may be true that President al-Asad has chosen his brother for the Saudi mission because of the personal friendship that ties this brother with Prince 'Abdallah ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz, the second deputy prime minister and the national guard commander, and because of 'Abd-al-Halim Khaddam's preoccupation with the Amman conference. However, it is also true that despite the cool relations between Damascus and Riyadh recently, the Syrian President has not dropped Saudi Arabia from his main calculations regarding the Arab balances since his visit to Riyadh and his agreement with the late King Faysal ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz to coordinate the roles in the Ramadan war. In explaining this, it is said that al-Asad noticed during the 1967 war that a main reason of the defeat in that war was the absence of coordination between the frontline states and the second line, or supporting, states--meaning the oil states. So, al-Asad made his visit to Riyadh to bring the weight of the second line states into the international balance.

The Saudi-Syrian relations remained somewhat good from 1973 until they turned cool 2 years ago. In this regard, the Saudis have their logic and their reasons, even though they agree with Syria on opposing the Camp David accords and even though they consider Syria the first defense line of the Arab nation, as stated in the recent joint communique with Rif'at al-Asad. The Saudis say in reply to Damascus' claims that they don't know if there is an alliance in the true sense of the word between Amman and Baghdad. But in case such an alliance exists, they understand its motives in view of the emergence of the signs of a Syrian-Iranian alliance since the time Khomeyni attained power in Tehran. The Saudis say that this [alliance] has caused the outbreak of incidents in some Arab areas that have threatened to foil the balances existing in the area. This consideration is foremost among the causes of the cool relations between Damascus and Riyadh. Added to this, in the Saudi view, is the Syrian position toward the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, considering that Damascus boycotted the Islamabad conference.

Then comes the endless Lebanese series. In this regard, the Saudis censure Damascus strongly because it has considered them a mere financial partner whose task is to finance the Deterrence Forces even though they, the Saudis say, are the ones who saved the relations between Syria and the Palestinian resistance in the Riyadh conference and saved the Syrian-Lebanese relations in Bayat-al-Din conference. This is why the Saudis find no reason or justification for their intentional exclusion from the Lebanese arena, whether in terms of advice or in terms of control. They cite as evidence of this exclusion the foiling of the Quadrilateral Committee and other similar efforts. Saudi Arabia believes that it has a fundamental role in Lebanon by virtue of its being the only Arab country that is open to all the forces and trusted by all the parties. Saudi Arabia also believes that one of the reasons for what has happened in Lebanon is [Syria s] monopolistic formulation of a policy that doesn't take into consideration the advice of all the forces that are interested in restoring health to the State of Lebanon.

The international and Arab analyses of the recent Syrian opening up to Saudi Arabia are various and diverse but they agree on one point, namely the involved situation in Syria as a result of the security conditions emanating from the activity of the Muslim Brotherhood. It has been noticed recently that the Syrian situation has monopolized a large part of the efforts of the western information media, even though the western media had been silent for a long time on this situation.

The U.S. papers in particular have certain criteria for making conclusions regarding the reasons for the Syrian situation that has led to opening up to Saudi Arabia. These papers point out the failure of the three cards that Syria has tried to use recently, namely: The Iranian card, the Lebanese card and the Soviet card. The continuous turbulence in Iran has given Iraq an opportunity to take a winning position toward Iran at both the Arab and international levels, especially in connection with the issue of Bahrain and the issue of the Arab Gulf islands occupied by the Iranian forces. Added to this is the position of offense that Iraqi President Saddam Husayn has personally taken against Khomeyni and Khomeynism--a position that has made a prominent NEW YORK TIMES commentator say that Saddan Husayn has won the war against Khomeyni.

It is natural that the Syrians would understand the effect of this position on them. They were not able to cause a decisive turn in the situation or to deal with it by withdrawing from their relationship with Iran. So, they advised the Iranians to improve their relations with the neighboring Arab countries so as to brighten their Arab image. As a result, Sadegh Ghotbzadeh, the Iranian minister of foreign affairs, toured Syria, Kuwait and the UAE in an attempt to reassure the Gulf countries and eliminate their fears of Iran and, consequently, to neutralize them and prevent them from strengthening their alliance with Baghdad, especially since Kuwait has taken a position of open support for Iraq. However, Ghotbzadeh's tour turned into an ill-fated tour in the wake of his rash declaration in Damascus about "Saddam Husayn's death and his going to hell." It became evident shortly afterwards that the news was imaginary. Moreover, Ghotbzadeh himself was subjected to a real assassination attempt in Kuwait.

As for Lebanon, the Lebanese conflicts which used to be a winning card in the hand of the Syrians in the past, have now turned into a burden for the Syrians and the winds of these conflicts have begun to blow into Syria itself. It is said that large quantities of the weapons seized by the Syrian security forces during the recent combing operations in the northern Syrian cities had found their way into Syria from Lebanon. This is why it has been noticed recently that the Syrian position toward the conditions in Lebanon has been based on the principle of "block the door through which the wind blows and have peace." Even the Phalangist coup against the National Liberals has not been, in the view of the Syrians, something special that requires intervention.

Even though the Syrian relations with the Phalanges have been tense in the past 2 years, the Syrians have acted since the beginning of their intervention in Lebanon on the basis that the Phalanges are the main force on the Lebanese arena. Moreover, the Syrians have not cut off the thread of dialogue with the Phalanges. Therefore, the forces disturbed by the Phalangist coup against the Liberals, including former President Sulayman Franjiyah, do not conceal their censure to their Syrian allies in this regard.

However, the Soviet card continues to be the most dangerous card in view of its impact on the international situation. The Syrians are better aware of this fact than others and this is why they have used this card skilfully to freeze any Arab or international movement against them. The anti-Soviet Arab and international forces are also aware of the danger of this card and know that any firm Syrian decision in this direccion means war. But [the outcome of] war is not guaranteed for the Syrians and war is not desired by the Soviets themselves. Rif'at al-Asad's visit to Saudi Arabia has raised a question that has been pending since the Egyptian-Israeli negotiations started to falter in recent months, namely the question of whether the situation in the Arab world, especially on the Syrian-Lebanese-Israeli borders, has reached the point of explosion. The U.N. observers are very afraid of the period extending from August to November 1980--the period in which there is real vacuum insofar as decision making in the White House is concerned--because the Israeli government, led by Menachem Begin, may exploit the failure of the negotiations with Egypt to deal a blow to the Syrian front.

All this, those who are well-informed say, was put on the negotiations table for a quick stock taking in the two-hour session of frank discussions between Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz, the crown prince and the first deputy prime minister, and Rif'at al-Asad. As a result, the final communique has been clear and strong in underlining the Arab position against Camp David and in stressing the Saudi support for Syria. Al-Asad reviewed to Prince Fahd all the pressures shouldered by Syria and familiarized him with the picture of the internal situation and with the consequences that may emanate from continuation of the support given to the Muslim Brotherhood by some neighboring Arab countries--support that may impose on the Syrian regime options that it does not want but into which it may be forced if the Saudis and the other neutral Arabs do not intervene to stop this involvement in Syria's internal affairs, that is if there is a serious effort to confront Camp David and considering that this confrontation is a collective Arab duty. Rif'at al-Asad has said that foiling the Camp David plot and defeating all its parties is a collective Arab responsibility and that Syria is determined to achieve strategic balance with the Zionist enemy, benefiting from the aid of all the brothers in the Arab homeland and of the friends outside the Arab homeland "because in this course alone lies the force capable of destroying the Camp David plot."

Those close to the Syrian regime are satisfied with the outcome of Rif'at al-Asad's visit and say that his use of the phrase "all the brothers in the Arab homeland" indicates a real desire for Arab reconciliation. As for the opponents of the Syrian regime, they do not conceal their displeasure at the visit. These opponents have tempered down their wager on the foreign forces in their battle against the regime. They say that these forces do not want to weaken the regime to the point of toppling it and, at the same time, they do not want to strengthen it to the degree where it will take independent positions. The opponents conclude from this that the foreign forces use them and that they reap no benefit from these forces. This is why it is said that some Syrian opposition forces are now seeking reconciliation with the Syrian regime by asserting their breakaway from the Muslim Brotherhood so that the forthcoming Arab reconciliation may not catch them unawares and so that they may not emerge empty handed from here and there. Neutral observers say that this reconciliation has become probable and imminent in view of the fact that in return for the Saudi mediation, Syria has given varying assurances concerning its Iranian, Lebanese and Soviet policies--assurances whereby the Syrian regime has preserved its line of retreat in case the said mediation falters.

This explains the second phrase in Rif'at al-Asad's statement which adds "the friends outside this homeland" to the phrase "all the brothers in the Arab homeland."

Information received from Riyadh in the wake of Rif'at al-Asad's visit says that Prince Fahd ibn 'Abd-al-'Aziz will carry the Arab concerns that have gathered before him, including the recent frank discussions with his Syrian guest, and tour a number of Arab capitals in an endeavor to block the gap and to unite the Arab ranks in a phase considered to be the most important and serious phase. This information estimates that Fahd's Arab tour for this purpose will take place after the month of Ramadan.

There are two things currently in the scales and it is most likely that their features will become clear after the forthcoming National Congress of the ruling paper in Damascus: The Saudi mediation on the one hand and the Syrian-Soviet summit on the other. The Syrian sources have leaked reports in Beirut to the effect that President Hafiz al-Asad may visit Moscow shortly or that a summit may be held between al-Asad and Brezhnev in Damascus if the Soviet leader's health permits. These sources have described this possibility as a "qualitative step" in the Syrian-Soviet relations.

Even though the Arab sources say that this leakage is intended for putting the expected Saudi mediation in a race with time, they agree with the Syrian sources which say that the message which Rif'at al-Asad has carried to Riyadh has been to the effect that "he who has forewarned is absolved" in case the Saudi mediation fails. Such failure will make it look as if the Soviet options have been imposed on Syria whereas Syria doesn't want to really take them.

Few people know what Saudi Arabia has promised Rif'at al-Asad. The few include Yasir 'Arafat, the PLO Executive Committee chairman, who has been familiarized with both the Saudi and Soviet sides of the situation. The Palestinian resistance sources say that during his visit to Moscow, 'Arafat coordinated his position with the Syrian position and carried with him a complete file of the situation in the area, including the weapon demands. It is said that the new arms deal for Syria and the resistance may not come from Moscow this time but through one of the eastern bloc countries. It is considered very likely that last week's visit to Poland by Gen Mustafa Talas, the Syrian minister of defense, was within this sphere.

As for the Americans, they insist on insinuating that the Syrian movement in this or that direction is a movement for blackmail and that the Congressional resolution abolishing the U.S. aid program for Syria is meant to make sure of this matter [sic]. Syria started receiving this aid, amounting to 90 million dollars annually, in 1974. This sum was suspended in 1979 and abolished finally in the middle of the current month of June, as the U.S. ambassador has been notified.

Even though this U.S. aid is insignificant and even though Saudi Arabia, Libya, Kuwait, the UAE or any [sic] other Arab state can make up for it, its political indications are what is important. The U.S. Embassy in Damascus has pointed out that the resolution was taken for several reasons connected with Syria's position on the Lebanese arena, its relations with the Soviet Union and finally, and this is the most important, with its hostile position toward the Camp David accords.

Those who know how the U.S. system operates affirm that this resolution is meant to explore the Syrian intentions because the Congress' approval of the resolution doesn't mean that it has become politically binding to the decision maker at the White House who has not severed his relations with Damascus and who described President al-Asad when the two met in Geneva 3 years ago as "the great president of Syria. As for the Syrians, they say that the congressional resolution is part of the political, economic and security pressures intended to harass the Syrian regime and to force it to succumb.

However, it is indubitable that the real picture of the Syrian situation within the framework of the intricate Arab and international relations and as conveyed to the Saudis by Rif'at al-Asad during his recent visit puts the area in a furious race between relaxation and explosion. For whichever wins, the Lebanese arena will be the gate.

MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD--This morning, security forces raided a Muslim brotherhood den in the Bab al-Nasr area of Aleppo. The security forces exchanged fire with the members of the gang inside the den. They succeeded in storming the den and in killing its occupants, amounting to nine persons, including two women. They confiscated documents and identity cards that were ready for distribution. They also seized a large quantity of various weapons, one photocopying machine, one duplicating machine, one camera and one monitoring device, as well as other telecommunications instruments. The security forces also raided another den belonging to the criminal gang in the (Aqyul) quarter of Aleppo, where they seized 12 rifles, 7 pistols and 15 bombs. In addition, the security forces raided a third den in the Karm al-Tahhan quarter of Aleppo, where they seized 8 rifles, 2 machineguns of U.S. make, 5 pistols, 15 bombs and a large quantity of ammunition, explosives, important documents and forged identity cards. BRIEFS

OIL FIELDS DEVELOPMENT--An agreement was signed recently to develop 3 oil fields in Abu Dhabi and to build collection and export complexes and installations on Dalma Island. The company which contracted for the project will begin construction very soon, so that economic benefit can be obtained from the project by 1984. The project will cost about $700 million, covering the construction of important petroleum complexes on Dalma Island, including a port for exporting crude oil, a petroleum collection center, excavations for and construction of platforms, and extending pipelines between the stations and the oil fields and between the stations and the island. Gas separation stations, petroleum storage tanks, electric power plants and residential complexes will also be built on the island. ADNOC will have a 60 percent share in the fields, and JUDCO will have 40 percent. Meanwhile, UDCO will develop the Satah, Jarnin and Dalma fields. In another petroleum context, during May 45,750,376 barrels were produced by active Abu Dhabi fields, of which ADCO produced 24,772,266 barrels, ADMA 15,435,005 barrels, Total-Abu-Bakush 4,220,166 barrels, the Japan Company 653,256 barrels, and Amiradahish 651,683 barrels. During the same period 42,110,473 barrels of crude oil were exported, 24,716,775 barrels by ADCO, 15,371,502 barrels by ADMA, 1,551,705 barrels by Abu al-Bakush, 3,650,622 barrels by the Japan Company, and 819,869 barrels by Amiradahish. The daily export rate was 1,390,660 barrels. [Text] [Beirut AL-ANWAR in Arabic 30 Jul 80 p 8] 8559

OIL INSTALLATION SECURITY MEASURES--The newspaper AL-KHALIJ, published in Sharjah, has reported that the Gulf oil states have intensified their measures for guarding oil installations in their territories. The newspaper said that these measures include the production fields, refineries, pipelines between production fields and export ports, and storage tanks. Citing Gulf diplomatic sources, it added that these measures are being taken as a necessary step in the wake of sabotage operations witnessed by some states in the area. In this context, these sources indicated that several European organizations are offering various proposals to some Gulf states, through their embassies in European capitals, for providing the petroleum states with advanced electronic warning devices to protect their oil installations. The newspaper indicated that the Gulf oil states are now consulting among themselves about adopting similar precautionary measures and using a standard warning system. HABIB CHATTY ON STRATEGY FOR ISLAMIC COUNTRIES

[Article: "Mr Chatty at the Meeting of Moslem Thinkers: Perfecting a Strategy to Enable the Islamic Countries to Accept Challenges"]

> [Text] The committee of Moslem thinkers in charge of preparing the draft proclamation of the Third Islamic Summit, which will be held in Mecca at the beginning of the new century of the Hegira, began its work yesterday morning at the Hilton Hotel in Tunis, under the chairmanship of Mr Habib Chatty, secretary general of the Organization of the Islamic Conference.
> Taking part in this meeting, which will last for three days, will be ulemas from the different Arab countries, such as Dr Habib Belkhoja, mufti of the Tunisian Republic, Dr Hassan Tourabi, Sudanese minister of justice, Dr Abdallah Nacif, rector of "King Abdelaziz" University at Jedda, Dr Ezzeddine Brahim, cultural counselor for Emir Zayed Ibn Soltone Nahiyane, chief of state of the United Arab Emirates.

In a short speech made on that occasion, Mr Habib Chatty pointed out that the coming of the new century of the Hegira constituted a favorable occasion for the issuance of a proclamation which would light the way for the Islamic nation, stressing the need to perfect a strategy enabling the Islamic countries to accept the challenges thrust upon them by certain hegemonic currents.

After analyzing the political and economic factors having brought about the situation which prevails in the Moslem world at present, Mr Habib Chatty pointed out that the great powers, which are currently the masters of the world and which, moreover, are living through a crisis in moral and religious values, are trying by all possible means to sap the efforts of the Islamic community to erect a society steadfastly attached to its independence and to its own values.

Mr Chatty affirmed that the Islamic nation owes it to itself, on the eve of the coming of the new century of the Hegira, to carry on a dual struggle in order to triumph over underdevelopment and to cope with maneuvers aimed at strengthening the Zionist entity, usurping the richness of the Islamic nation and accentuating its political, economic and cultural dependence.

"That is the reason why," he noted, "it is important for the Moslems to define a strategy which would enable the Islamic world to occupy the place it merits in the concert of nations, to exploit for its benefit its richness and to improve the level of living of the individual, which, it has found, should constitute the foremost objective of all developmental action."

In this context, Mr Habib Chatty indicated that in order to reach this goal, it is imperative for the Islamic community, in the present state of affairs, to give further proof of solidarity and to direct its efforts, all its efforts, towards future generations, by inculcating them with an education whose foundations lie in Islamic values and by facilitating their access to the exact sciences, which constitute the most effective weapon against the various Zionist maneuvers." [as published]

At the end of Mr Habib Chatty's speech, the participants turned their attention to the working document prepared by the secretariat of the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

PLO OFFICIAL SUGGESTS OVERSEAS INFORMATION STRATEGY

Jiddah 'UKAZ in Arabic 30 Jul 80 p 3

[Interview with Director of the PLO's Paris Office Ibrahim al-Sus, by 'Abdallah 'Abd-al-Mit'al; date and place not given]

[Text] There is no doubt that overseas Arab information about pivotal issues constitutes a cornerstone in any strategy intended to support Arab stands in various political, military and economic fields.

Therefore, this issue is receiving special attention from Arab information officials, out of their awareness of the importance of the written word and the role which information media have come to play in influencing various sectors of public opinion.

Modern development, along with the complexity of international circumstances and the growing role of public opinion in influencing the official decision-making process, has necessitated a unified Arab information strategy based on a common conception of the dimensions and goals of Arab overseas information.

A unified Arab will is the only way to gain the world's respect for us and to determine the destiny of our fateful issues. Such a unified will in the information field will not be achieved except through a unified strategy which knows how to speak to modern society in the language it understands, in order to erase the mistaken picture which has become firmly planted in the minds of some people because of hostile colonialist and Zionist propaganda.

In view of the nature of the current stage and its issues, at the head of which is the Middle East issue, the rights of the Palestinian people, and Zionist propaganda's successful deception operations in some Western European and American societies, Arab overseas information has a big job ahead of it consistent with the nature of the stage.

We held this interview about Arab overseas information and its challenges with Director of the PLO Paris Office Ibrahim al-Suss, who is now the candidate for the post of Arab League information advisor and the post of information director for the league's General Secretariat.

Speaking of ways to develop Arab overseas information, Ibrahim al-Sus started out by stressing that there has veen an improvement in world public opinion about major Arab causes, especially the Palestinian cause. This was not the result of direct propaganda, but was caused by practical political and economic circumstances which demonstrated just how much the West urgently needed the Arab economy and Arab markets in general, in addition to the significant influence of the Palestinian revolution and its direct and indirect information.

He said, "What is required of Arab information in the West in this stage is not propaganda aimed at changing international public opinion or giving a practical picture of Arab life, but propaganda aimed at changing that conception which makes our land nothing but an oil well and a center for international competition and, at the same time, a force afraid of its own financial and economic influence."

Presenting a True Picture of the Arab World

Speaking of changing this unrealistic picture of the Arab world in the West's eyes, he went on to say, "Changing this picture primarily means bringing out the real aspects of our Arab world as it is, i.e. accentuating the real problems afflicting it as an integrated society enjoying economic, political and cultural resources, hopes, aspirations and a future--i.e., to be precise, accentuating the fundamental social aspects which the propaganda agencies, concentrating only on petroleum so as to develop hostility towards the Arabs or else reducing Arab problems to a single political problem to be seen only in the context of the struggle between the two world camps, refuse to see."

In his talk, Ibrahim al-Suss stressed the necessity for Arab propaganda to make an effort to present a true, comprehensive picture of the Arab world which would allow the West to understand our problems as they really are, and which would provide the opportunity for a dialog based on sound, fruitful bases.

Distinct Arab Messages to the World

He said, "Arab information has not yet been able to achieve very many positive results in the West, not because of technical reasons, but mainly because of substantive reasons pertaining to content." He stressed the Arab world's need for special, distinct messages propagandizing for it, whether in the political, economic or cultural spheres. He added, "If any society does not have a distinct message to present to the world, all its propaganda becomes nothing more than a demand that the world support this or that cause without being convinced of the justness of these causes."

Our Heritage and Western Lessons

In explaining the Arab information problem, he said, "If we may exclude the Palestinian issue, the Arabs have not gotten, on the economic world, what they are demanding from the West, while the West is accusing the Arabs of having huge capital throughout the world and vast resources. The world is demanding help from the Arabs at a time when the Arab economy is suffering from major problems affecting all the economies of the developing countries.

On the cultural level, we are not offering any new experience in cultural development which would take into account our Arab heritage and culture and our future aspirations." Ibrahim al-Sus expressed his conviction that "we have not yet succeeded in reconciling this heritage with our present cultural needs."

Since the question about ways of developing Arab information still remained, the director of the PLO Paris office went on to say, "We feel that the development of Arab information in the West must be based on presenting a new experience and the real problems of our development, so that other states and other cultures might find in this experience some of the solutions to modern problems they are looking for.

"Then there can be a dialog and an exchange of opinion, and not merely informational propaganda or propagandistic information."

As a practical step along this road, he proposed the establishment of an Arab studies center in Paris which would recruit Arab researchists in the West to serve Arab goals. At the same time, it would be a research center and a cultural center presenting a picture of Arab cultural development and offering study grants for Arabs to take certain studies. Also, researchists from various countries would give classes in Arab and Islamic culture and civilization and also modern Arab society. The PLO office in France and UNESCO have both expressed their willingness to help make the preparations for carrying out such a proposal if the Arab League approves it.

The Role of the Zionist Lobby

Speaking of the role of Arab information in the United States as compared to Zionist information , Ibrahim al-Suss said, "They cannot be compared, since for 30 years the Zionist information media have found fertile territory on the American scene. They have been able to do whatever they want because of the special relations existing between the United States and Israel, and because of the Zionist lobby and its influence on the decisions of Congress and the successive American administrations."

He added, "Arab, and especially Palestinian, information is still making progress, because of the great efforts being made by the PLO and the Arab information elite on the American scene, and especially what the Arab League offices in New York are doing.

"There is no doubt that Arab information could enter upon a path which started out hard and difficult years ago, by concentrating information efforts on certain groups in American society, such as the blacks for example. Here I would like to refer to the results achieved by the PLO's United Nation representative with the former American UN Permanent Delegate Andrew Young."

Ibrahim al-Sus explained that the PLO's information operates on the basis of winning over larger sectors of public opinion to side of the cause. He stressed that as the Arab information message has become more unified on the American scene, its influence on American public opinion has increased.

The Arab League and the Palestinian Cause

In response to a question about coordination between the PLO's work and the activity of the Arab League, he siad, "There is no doubt that the Arab League, ever since Shadhili al-Qalibi became its president, had been making tireless efforts, on the political and cultural levels, to expound the Palestinian cause in the West and to refute the Camp David agreements." He expressed his extreme optimism that all the Arab League's steps will enable the consolidation of a dynamic Arab information line based on the presentation of Arab causes on the same level as contemporary causes.

He added, "We feel that the league will succeed in this task, the proof being that the information seminars being held under its auspices have taken it upon themselves to discuss all the problems facing Arab overseas information in detail."

At the end of his talk, Ibrahim al-Sus stressed that there is cooperation between the PLO offices and the Arab League offices. But he expressed the hope that the league's general secretariat will be able to issue directions to its offices so that the league's support for the PLO offices can be more effective, especially with respect to overseas information projects being undertaken by the PLO.

ARAB ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PLAN

[Article: "Several Arab Ministers of Economy and Finance Received at the Casbah: Mr Mzali Calls for the Setting Up of an Arab Plan for Economic Development"]

[Text] Mr Mohamed Mzali, the prime minister, yesterday afternoon received at the Government Palace in the Casbah several Arab ministers of the economy and of finance currently staying in Tunis to take part in the work of the Arab Economic Committee.

Present at the interview were Messrs Mansour Moalla, minister of planning and finance, Mezri Chekir, director of the prime minister's cabinet, Kacem Bousnina, the Tunisian ambassador to Jeddah, and Abdelhassan Zelzela, deputy secretary general of the League of Arab States in charge of economic affairs.

On that occasion, Mr Mohamed Mzali recalled the considerable potentialities and the economic weight of the Arab world, which the Arab countries could take advantage of among themselves to institute a fruitful cooperation based on a community of interests.

The prime minister urged his guests to coordinate their efforts to promote the economy of the Arab countries and to reduce the acuteness of their dependence on the industrialized countries. He urged them, moreover, to continue the political struggle to achieve the unity of the Arab world.

The prime minister called for the completion of a long-term action strategy and for the setting up of an economic development plan for the Arab world, stressing the need for the Arab countries to intensify their cooperation in the industrialization of agriculture so as to insure the achievement of self-sufficiency in food.

Mr Mohamed Mzali expressed the hope of seeing the work of the Arab Economic Committee lead to proposals which could be submitted to the next Arab economic summit.

KLIBI, CHATTI COMMENT ON NETHERLANDS WITHDRAWAL FROM JERUSALEM

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 28 Aug 80 pp 1, 5

[Article: "Tunis: An Act of Great Political Wisdom"]

[Text] When asked about the decision of the government of the Netherlands to transfer its embassy from El-Qods [Jerusalem] to Tel Aviv, the spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated:

"It is an act of great political wisdom and a significant contribution to the cause of justice and peace."

It is recalled that the ambassador of the Netherlands in Tunis was invited last Saturday, the 23rd, to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, where he had a talk on this question with those in charge at the department.

Mr Klibi: A Wise Decision

"The decision of the Dutch government to transfer the location of the Dutch embassy from El-Qods to Tel Aviv is a wise decision, in conformance with Right and Justice, and preserving the friendship between the Arab world and the Netherlands," Mr Klibi, secretary-general of the League of Arab States, said yesterday.

Mr Klibi sent a telegram to Mr Christoph Van Der Klaauw, the Dutch foreign affairs minister, in which he congratulated the Dutch government's decision.

Mr Chatti: A Triumph For Right

The transfer of the embassies of the Netherlands and six other Latin American countries, following the Security Council's resolution condemning the Israeli decision to annex El-Qods, is a triumph of right over aggression, a victory of the international order for peace over an expansionism which generates instability and wars.

It is the first time that a decision of the Security Council, condemning Israel for its repeated attacks on the fundamental rights of the Palestinian people, has been acted upon.

For the first time in the annals of the United Nations, countries have said no to the arrogance of the Zionists, thereby witnessing that they are faithful to the principles which they have promised to respect by their adherence to the UN charter.

However, this is only one crack in Israel's colonizing and oppressive structure.

It denotes, in spite of everything, a serious realization on the part of the international community of the dangers which Israel's intolerable acts of defiance present to peace.

While congratulating the initiative of the states that have acted on the Security Council's decision on El-Qods, the Islamic states are no less strongly determined to work in whatever way possible for the respect and application of the other resolutions of the United Nations and the Security Council on the Holy Land, the occupied Arab and Palestinian lands, and the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people.

KHOMEYNI'S BRAND OF ISLAM CRITICIZED

Tunis DIALOGUE in French 11 Aug 80 p 25

[Article by Raja El-Almi]

[Text] Amazement. Consternation. "No prophet, including Mohamed himself, has completely succeeded in his mission of bringing justice to men. The only messenger who will succeed in establishing justice throughout the world will be the Imam Mahdi who is to come (al Mountadhar)," Khomeyni has said. This is by no means the allegation of a man who is demented, but rather it is a statement which has not yet been denied, made by the Iranian ayatollah during the holy month of Ramadan to the Moslem world. Even beyond its obvious sacrilegious and blasphemous nature, this statement by the man who represents the highest spiritual and temporal power in a nation of Islam, because of its excessive nature, does arouse a certain number of questions, and causes both faith and ordinary common sense to revolt.

It may perhaps be useful to comment here that the Iranian ayatollah and his mullahs have unfortunately done much--in fact they couldn't have done more--by their behavior and their words to implant the idea in the world of an Islam that is synonymous with intolerance and prohibitions, even outright obstructionism, of an Islam dominated by a hierarchy--a hierarchy, it is true, belonging to Shi'ism. In addition to the harm caused to Islam outside, there is also the damage which is now being done to all Moslems, who are being injured in the very depths of their faith and their convictions. This explains the number of protests that have been heard everywhere, criticizing the behavior, which is to say the least, unacceptable and inconceivable, of a man who is making use of his position and his temporal power acquired after the Iranian revolution to reshape Islam to meet his desires. In so doing, he is acting falsely against the very essence of Islam and against its most fundamental precepts. In so doing, he is responsible for a sin even more serious than murder itself in Islam, Al Fitna. For we can only interpret his words in a way that we do not even like to formulate: that Khomeyni would recognize this Mahdi who is to come...that he has seen him already somewhere.

No. Islam, even Shi'ite Islam, is something other than this excessive affirmation of self as the representative of the only truth. Islam, the Islam of all Moslems, is a faith of vision and not of blindness. Islam also means the fundamental prohibition against disturbing the faith of the Moslem people. Islam is a religion that does not favor additions. It could not be more clear. This Islam is written in the Koran. And the reign of justice in the world has a time which the Koran contains and stipulates. In another way.

Citing the verses of the Koran, Dr Habib Belkhoja, mufti of the republic, pointed out during his speech on the occasion of the Night of Destiny, that Khomeyni's statements are doing a disservice to Islam and that "one who ignores the Sunna and contradicts the Koran can not claim to belong to Islam, and still less can he pretend to be its standard-bearer."

This is especially true as Islam is a unifying religion whose fundamental vocation is to group together, to unite, and not to divide. The Moslem must align his behavior according to this principle. And this is even more essential for the man of religion, who should set an example of the best and not the worst, and who should encourage believers to faith and not to heresy. This explains why the Islamic world has unanimously termed Khomeyni's words and his attitude shocking, for they clash with all of the Islamic world at the very time when this world is aspiring to recover the place it deserves, when the nations forming this Islamic world are changing, and when the Moslem people have the greatest need of solidarity, understanding, justice, dialogue, and cooperation. In this climate which calls for peace and fraternity, in this holy period of feasts and prayers, Khomeyni's statements are more than a discordant note; they are an unacceptable blasphemy, and like all blasphemies, can only be greeted by indignation against the lack of responsibility of their author. As proof, in Tunisia consider the reactions of the man in the street, as soon as an ayatollah, overstepping the limits of his authority, dares to attack the very essence of Islam.

But in fact, those who have likened him to a Monsignor Lefebvre--with temporal power and with power over life and death added--were not mistaken.

SAUDI FINANCE MINISTER'S VISIT TO TUNIS REPORTED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 23 Aug 80 p 5

[Article: "Saudi Arabia Called Upon To Show the Greatest Concern for the Total Development of the Arab World"]

[Text] Sheikh Mohamed Abalkheil, Saudi finance and economic minister, left Tunis yesterday, where he had taken part in the work of the Arab Economic Ministerial Committee, which had stemmed from the meeting of Arab foreign affairs and economy ministers last July in Amman.

In a statement to the press, Mr Abalkheil indicated that the Committee meeting was preparing what would be taken up by the Arab Economic Council in Tunis next 8 September, as well as the Arab summit meeting to be held in Amman in November 1980. That summit will examine, in particular, the economic relations among the Arab nations as well as with non-Arab countries.

He noted that the Arab summit meeting will have great importance because, first of all, it will study the means of providing a new impetus to the development of the least endowed Arab countries and of supporting the steps those countries are taking to achieve economic prosperity.

Saudi Arabia, Mr Abalkheil pointed out, has been called upon from now to show the greatest concern for the total development and the increase of living standards in the Arab world. This objective requires the utilization of all the available economic resources in the Arab countries, he emphasized.

The Ministerial Committee meeting in Tunis also insisted on the need to strengthen the Arab Economic Development Fund and the Arab Monetary Fund by increasing the resources entrusted to it and by simplifying the conditions for giving credit, he added.

Mr Abalkheil was met at "Tunis-Carthage" by Messrs Hassan Belkhoja, foreign affairs minister; Mansour Moalla, minister of planning and finance; Kacem Bousnina, Tunisian ambassador in Jeddah; as well as by the Saudi embassy's charge in Tunis.

ARAB INFORMATION COMMISSION STUDIES MEANS OF COUNTERING ISRAELI PROPAGANDA

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 23 Aug 80 p 6

[Article: "Toward a Believable and Objective Arab News Media"]

[Text] The Permanent Commission on Information in the Arab World continued its work yesterday at the headquarters of the League of Arab States, under the presidency of Mr Abdallah Hourami, director general of the Information Department of the PLO, and in the presence of Messrs Assaad El Assaad, adjunct secretary general of the league, and Khaled Al Baabaa, information director.

The meeting's agenda included, in particular, the examination of a certain number of work documents presented by the participating delegations, relative to getting the Arab news media to neutralize Israel's attempts to distort the Arab entity politically, socially and culturally. The participants insisted upon the need to give a dimension of "civilization" to Arab news, thus guaranteeing its credibility and objectivity.

The work of the Permanent Commission on Information in the Arab World will continue in Tunis until 24 August.

ARAB MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE FINISHES ITS WORK

Tunis LE TEMPS in French 22 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Examination of the Possibilities of a Common Arab Economic Strategy: Conclusion of the Work of the Arab Ministerial Committee"]

[Text] The Arab ministerial committee responsible for examining the possibilities of a common Arab economic strategy began its work Wednesday evening in Tunis, under the chairmanship of the Jordanian minister of industry and trade, Mr Ali Youssef El-Sennour.

This committee was set up by the conference of Arab ministers of foreign affairs and of the economy which was held last July in Amman. It includes the ministers of the economy or of finance of Algeria, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Libya, Syria and the two Yemens.

The committee is to study different proposals concerning coordination and cooperation among the Arab countries in the economic field. It should prepare, to that end, a working document which it will submit to the next meeting of the Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Arab League at the time of the Council's ordinary session held on 8 September next in Tunis. Once adopted by the Arab League Council, the document will be submitted to the Arab states' economic summit, whose meeting is expected to take place next November in Amman.

During the opening meeting, the Arab economic committee elected its chairman in the person of the Jordanian minister of industry and trade.

Before holding their meeting, the committee members were received by the Tunisian prime minister, Mr Mohamed Mzali, who urged them to combine their efforts for the finalization of a plan for the economic development of the Arab world.

The committee concluded its work under the chairmanship of Mr Ali Al Sennour [as published], in the presence of Dr Abdelhassan Zelzala, deputy secretary general of the Arab League in charge of economic relations.

The committee adopted, on that occasion, a series of recommendations.

GOVERNMENT PURGE ENCOUNTERS COMPLICATIONS

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 23 Jul 80 p 3

/Article: "Petition from Purge Committees of 29 Government Departments to the Emam: Some Officials Are Putting up Obstacles to Purges in Departments"/

/Text/ A declaration has been published, as follows, by the committees to purge and reform departments in connection with the latest message by Emam Khomeyni:

In the name of God almighty:

If our government continues as it has and retains the condition and appearance it has had, we must hold a wake for this resurgence. We must now announce to the consultative council the fact that an absolute 100 percent religious Islamic government must not accept a minister if he is like some of the ministers who are present now.

/Addressed/ Emam Khomeyni.

This message is also in connection with the Emam's message of 27 June on the creation of satan and the revolutionary liquidation of the pollution of reasonous, mercenary elements connected with imperialism.

The purge committees have traveled this long road on which they had also taken steps as far as possible and as quickly as possible. Now more than 150 Purge committees have been created in a coordinated manner in various departments in the country and many projects in the field of implementing reforms have also been presented. However, unfortunately, some people in charge of matters have not only never taken part in this movement--they have also always thrown up obstacles in the way. Emam, realize that the National Employment and Administrative Affairs Organization has presented projects to the Revolutionary Council which are "demeaning to the guardians and beloved of the enemies." The committees present a bill to this organization which is beneficial to the satanic, to Savak members and to thieves and highwaymen, and sets a pension of up to 5,000 tomans for them. Is this the meaning of a revolutionary government? Up to 5,000 tomans' retirement for persons who sucked the blood of the nation up to yesterday and today are engaged in conspiring as well and laughing at the revolution? Five thousand tomans for the corrupt on the excuse that they have many dependents, but no thought is given to the condition of the downtrodden, who also have many dependents and are many times more deserving--is this the meaning of Islamic justice which these non-revolutionary gentlemen understand?

/Signed/ The purge committees of the Ministry of Power and the Water Organization, Regional Electricity, the Ministry of Agriculture, Rural Cooperation, the Directorate of Forests, industries, the Purge Committee of the Organization to Expand Iranian Industries, tobacco, General Motors, the Ministry of Roads, the railway, meteorology, National Airlines, Expansion of Iranian Roads, Ports and Shipping, the Ministry of Finance, Central Insurance, Iranian National Iarlines, the Atomic Energy Organization, the Ministry of Labor, the dissolved houses of parliament, the Voice and Face of the Islamic Republic of Iran, religious endowments, the Red Crescent, PARS NEWS AGENCY, Planning Promulgator of the Naval Forces, Ministry of Housing and Town Construction, and the Ministry of Post and Telegraph.

MAJLES TO GET ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM PLAN

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 22 Jul 80 p 3

/Article: "Administrative Plan Will Be Presented to Parliament by the Islamic Society Federation in the Departments"/

/Text/ The Islamic societies met in the Interior Ministry auditorium yesterday afternoon in the presence of representatives of all the societies of government departments, Eng Mir Salim, the undersecretary and chief supervisor of the General National Police, and some representatives of the Islamic Consultative Council.

These groups began by reading some verses from the glorious Koran. Then the latest message by the nation's emam was broadcast and, following Emam Khomeyni's message, one member of the Islamic Council of the Ministry of the Interior, enumerating the services of the Ministry of Interior's Islamic Society during the period after it started its activity, said, "After the constant opposition and obstinate million-man demonstrations by the tormented, suffering people of Iran and the solidarity and coordination of all groups and classes in the face of the tyranny of the degenerate imperial regime, the rotten vermin, and the likes of Azhari and the non-Bakhtiar, a number of employees of the Ministry of the Interior, like the other people locked up in the great prison of Iran, destitute from 'life' like 'death' and 'survival' like 'oblivion,' attended the raging sea of demonstrations and with their constant strikes and work slowdowns stood in the face of the pressure and threats of corrupt people like the Qarabaghis. However, they did not let up; they set forth and obstinately followed the leadership of the emam in their small and insignificant homes and societies." Then another of the brothers of the Islamic Society raised the plan in conjunction with the administrative system; part of that is as follows: 1. Personnel problems. 2. Organizational and structural problems. 3. The chaos in the laws and stipulations of the regulations. 4. Problems of administration. A discussion took place in detail regarding each part of this plan.

After that, Hojjatoleslam Muhammad Mojtahed Shabastari, Tehran representative to the Islamic Consultative Council, inaugurating this convocation, said, "Changing the administrative system will be one of the jobs of the Islamic Consultative Council, and we accept the plans which are being presented." In another area he said, "It is a source of great good fortune that our nation has succeeded in feeling problems and it is you, departmental societies, who have seen the problems in the departments and have felt them; again, it is you who must try to eliminate the problems, and the legislative power is waiting to eliminate the problems and difficulties in its path by means of all the classes of the nation. If the legislative power is not together with you it will not have the power to solve all problems. Rather, it needs the cooperation of all classes and all thinking."

The next speaker was Zavare'i, undersecretary of interior. Regarding the codification of the administrative system of the Islamic Republic of Iran, he said, "On the one hand it is a source of sorrow that today, after 17 months, we have begun thinking about an administrative revolution. The administrative system we possess was set out by black satanic planners, and what has not been carried out in these 17 months is change, and a great part of this change is in the administrative system: unfortunately during these 17 months satan's system was retained." In conclusion, Mr Mir Salim, undersecretary of the interior and chief supervisor of the General National Police, stated, in the course of a speech, "What is at our disposal today is of value to the satan. There were three sections which were considered important to the previous regime; one was education, by means of which they wanted to eliminate the thinking of our generation, second were the media, especially the radio and television, in which not everyone could be employed, and the third were the general departments of the society." In conclusion he told the people attending this convocation, "Your responsibility is great, but greater responsibility lies on the Islamic Consultative Council, and it was on this subject that the emam issued instructions which must certainly be carried out." This convocation will also continue tomorrow to the Ministry of the Interior.

PLANS FOR ISLAMIC FRONT STUDIED

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 22 Jul 80 p 3

/Article: "By Invitation of the Dawn of Hope Islamic Society: Method of Forming Islamic Front Subjected to Discussion"/

/Text/ In the course of a meeting at the invitation of the Dawn of Hope Islamic Society, the method of forming an Islamic front was discussed in the presence of Dr Abol Hasan Bani Sadr, Dr Yadollah Sahabi, Ayatollah Musavi Ardabili, Dr Hasan Habibi, Dr Kazem Sami and Dr Mohammad Moballeghi-Eslami.

At the start of the session, the representative of the Dawn of Hope Islamic Society addressed the goal of this session as one of cooperating and sometimes reaching agreement regarding general issues on the formation of an Islamic front. In expressing disappointment regarding the failure of individuals who could not participate to participate in the session, he stressed the attendance of all the Islamic groups and the presentation of their views. In supporting the formation of this session with every group that was available, Dr Bani Sadr also said "Formation of the Islamic front is part of our charter in the Revolutionary Council." He added "We need a strong front which will be able to aid us in problems."

Dr Yadollah Sahabi then considered discussion of such issues to be essential and referred to the dangerous situation arising from differences and dissension and the need to have basic unity within society. Dr Sahabi also considered the discussions which took place in the parliment regarding nationality and nationalism to be an example of nationalism and the trae of the nationalists' evil.

Continuing the session, Dr Kazem Sami considered the need for a specific, clear definition of Islam for the formation of an advanced Islamic front and said, "If there is no clear, specific definition of Islam, how for example will you solve the problem of reception?"

On this subject, Dr Bani Sadr then stated "The basis of establishing a philosophy is also a kind of reception, as the philosophy of Plato is the basis of establishment." He added, "Marxism is a continuation of the path of Plato, and one of the founders of Marxism is Plato. Aristotle is also the founder of a kind of religion."

Dr Bani Sadr considered this path of Aristotle's to be the cause of instability in decisions and daily changes in opinions and considered that one reason for the failure of Islamic movements was instability in decision-making.

Ayatollah Musavi Ardabili mentioned that suffering from dissension and fragmentation was one of the reasons for this gathering and added, "Our ultimate demand is unity." In another part of his statement, he pointed out "The issues which are the subject of dispute are those of nationhood and nationalism, prelatism, and the subject of reception. In my view the possibility of attaining conciliation on many matters is present, since we do not have disputes on all matters."

After a period of conversation and discussion by the participants, Dr Moballeghi-Eslami requested that the policy and issues which must constitute the subject of discussion in the sessions be determined. He recommended the slogan "independence and freedom of the Islamic republic" as an issue to subject to discussion and in another part of his statements requested that several people be appointed to discuss and exchange views in the context of criteria and rules in subsequent sessions and then set them down and present them for review by public opinion.

In conclusion, Dr Bani Sadr recommended that one or two discussion meetings be held weekly in the home of Ayatollah Musavi Ardabili, gathering together a number a number of people with opinions of different tendencies, presenting the conclusions which are identified to others and then declaring them.

This recommendation was agreed to by the participants.

The Dawn of Hope Islamic Society also invited the public and people with opinions to send their opinions to the address at Post Box 3068, Tehran.

FOREIGN STUDENTS' LEADER: AFGHAN INVASION WORRIES NATION

Oslo KLASSEKAMPEN in Norwegian 25 Jul 80 p 7

[Article by Geir Imset]

[Text] The news picture from Iran is spotty. There are constant reports of executions. What is the situation in Iran now? Where does Khomeyni stand? Are there contradictions within the Iranian Government? What is the Soviet Union doing in Iran?

KLASSEKAMPEN directed these question to Ghassem Momeni, international secretary of the Confederation of Iranian Students--CIS. CIS is an international organization of Iranian students in foreign countries. Under the shah's regime, CIS was an important oppositional force abroad. Ghassem is studying at the university in Lund, Sweden but he has regular contact with his homeland.

"Anarchy in Iran has increased dangerously. Before, there were battles between the government and various leftist groups and democratic groups. Now the situation is such that groups in the government plan coups against each other," Momeni says.

Sabotage From The Soviet Union

"What is the reason for this development?"

"I want to emphasize two points. First of all, sabotage from the Soviet Union, but also from the United States and its cohorts. Both sides are trying to undermine stability."

"Secondly, there is the idea of a monopoly--the regimentation of the Muslim priests. Everything must be Islamic. They do not respect the people's democratic rights. Other views are not tolerated. For this reason, disputes arise constantly."

"Is this true of the entire Islamic priesthood?"

"No. There are several factions. There are rightist fanatics who are bitter anticommunists and against the Islam that is struggling for independence and social progress, of which I am speaking. They have a majority in the government."

"They also have 43 percent of the seats in parliament. They say that they carried out the revolution for Islam, not so that the people could be fed. For them the economy means nothing."

"On the other side is president Bani Sadr and his supporters. He is attempting to create stability in Iran. He is for cooperation with the third world and Europe."

Khomeyni Regrets Chaos

"Where does Khomeyni himself stand in the picture?"

"Khomeyni spoke to the people recently. He said of the situation in Iran that this is not what he wanted. He asked the people for forgiveness for the chaotic conditions. He admits that he has lost control. I do not believe there are any great differences between Khomeyni and Bani Sadr but in certain questions the fanatics can probably pressure him."

"There are two Islamic groups within the government--one group that has the power and one that wants it. But despite their differences these groups manage to unite against the president and his supporters."

Worker Burned Self

"What sort of support does the government have among the Iranian people now?"

"It is on the decline. In the referendum on the Islamic republic 21.5 million of 22 million eligible voters voted yes. A year later there were elections for the Islamic parliament. In the first election only 12 million voted. This means that 9 million stayed at home. For the reelection it was 8 million."

"Dissatisfaction among the workers is extremely widespread. The government does not listen to their demands. An important source of protest is the notorious law 33. It was also attacked under the shah but is still in effect. Armed with it, employers can fire workers just like that. An Iranian worker burned himself in protest against that law and against repression on the job."

"The chaos. Does it apply to the economy, too?"

"Yes, very much so. In Iran there are shortages of almost all goods. Previously Iran was dependent on the United States. It is impossible for Iran to become economically self-supporting all at once. Iran must cooperate with other countries. We in the CIS believe Iran must broaden cooperation with the third world. With regard to technology, it is also necessary to cooperate with Europe. On the other hand, we condemn agreements with the United States and the Soviet Union. This is also Bani Sadr's line. Both the right-wing fanatics and the pro-Soviet groups attack him for that. They attack Europe for being lackeys of United States imperialism. When Bani Sadr wishes to cooperate with Europe they call him a "CIA agent." The pro-Soviet groups are trying to isolate Iran from all other countries. In this way they want to force Iran into the hands of the Soviet Union. Hostage actions suit them to a T."

"You spoke of sabotage?"

"This is occurring in both agriculture and industry. Crops are set on fire. According to Iran's Radio the so-called Fadai groups are behind it. These are the pro-Soviet groups that are working together with the Moscow oriented Tudeh Party."

"There is much sabotage in the oil industry, too. Under the shah Iran produced 5.5 million barrels of oil per year. After the revolution the authorities planned to reduce this to 4 million barrels. In practice, production has not risen above 1 million barrels. There are shortages of technicians and replacement parts. The situation is serious because oil is Iran's only export article of significance. Now there is little left over for exporting."

"As you portray it, it seems as though the right-wing fanatics and the supporters of Moscow are moving in the same direction. Is this true?"

"My impression is that the Soviet Union is supporting the Islamic fanatics. It does not matter to them what kind of laws Iran gets as long as the Soviet Union gains power and influence. There is also evidence that the pro-Soviet groups and the right-wing fanatics are trying to form a common front. At one time the Fadai groups called for armed struggle against the government. They branded it "United States dependent" and "reactionary." Then, after one week, according to the Fadai groups, the government suddenly became "revolutionary." At the same time, the Fadai groups wrote in their newspaper that 'the Soviet Union is Iran's brother country,' and that they 'support Iran's government because of the 'socialist block.'"

"The leaders of the Fadai groups have also had meetings with the leaders of the Islamic republic--the right-wing fanatics. Khomeyni, for his part, has expressed that there is a plot behind the change in policy of the Fadai groups."

Revolutionary Council Member Behind Coup

"There was an attempted coup in Iran last week, was there not?"

"A coup was planned against Bani Sadr. The fanatics see Bani Sadr as their greatest enemy. The leader of the coup is Hassan Ajat. He is a member of the Revolutionary Council and a representative in the Islamic parliament. The coup attempt was discovered. Everyone knows Afat was behind it but, since he is a representative of the Islamic republic, no one will say anything. If he had not been such a representative he would have been executed on the spot."

"Is there any proof that the Soviet Union had a hand in this?"

"We have no evidence that the fanatics are working directly for the Soviet Union. But their policies are playing Iran into the hands of the Kremlin."

Fanatics Sent Soldiers

"What does the CIS think of the Kurd question in Iran?"

"Because of the regimentation of the right-wing fanatics it has been easy for the Soviet Union to play on the oppressed Kurdish people. The Kurds are Sunites (a movement within Islam), while the dominant priests are Shiites. These movements are not given equal status. We believe the only solution is to respect the rights of the Kurds. Among other things we believe they have a right to their own parliament. We are against all forms of violence toward the Kurds. President Bani Sadr is for a peaceful solution to the Kurdish question. It is the right-wing fanatics who have sent military forces against them."

Invasion Awoke Iran

"Are the people of Iran following the invasion of Afghanistan?"

"The Soviet invasion has awakened the Iranian people. It has helped them understand the true nature of the Soviet Union. The Tudeh Party and the Fadai groups are attempting to portray the Soviet Union as Iran's friend. But the people no longer believe it. Iran and Afghanistan have a long history that unites us. The people in Iran have sympathy for Afghanistan and support the struggle for liberation. I can mention an example. Every Friday there are public prayers in Iran. After the invasion many people asked why the priests did not speak of Afghanistan. Then the priest in Tehran answered that even though the priests did not speak of Afghanistan every day this does not mean we do not support its people. The whole world, including Brezhnev, shall know that in all international forums we support the freedom fighters and not Karmal's lackey regime," Momeni says.

"The invasion of Afghanistan awakened the Iranian people," Ghassem Momeni says.

CLERICAL, SECULAR FACTIONS SQUARE OFF

Brussels SPECIAL in French 18 Aug 80 pp 15-16

[Text] The naming of Mr Mohammed Radjai, alined with the ayatollahs, as prime minister, seems to deepen the divorce which exists, henceforth, between the two blocs in the governmental team. And this could have enormous fall-out effects in the medium term.

In the presidential elections, the Shi'ite clergy mobilized their support massively for Mr Bani-Sadr. Once elected head of state, he has ceaselessly battled the encroachments of this same clergy, which reproaches him with not showing himself sufficiently and exclusively Muslim, and with wanting to keep democratic structures in Iran (even if they are only a facade). For the very idea of a democratic system, with parties, a parliament, responsibilities, and popular representativity is, for the Ayatollah Khomeyni and his followers, a heresy: for Shi'ite fanatics, rigorous and traditional application of the Koran is everything, and everything else is pointless.

Get Around the President by the Prime Minister

Three weeks ago, after interminable negotiations, President Bani-Sadr called on a zealous partisan of the ayatollahs, Mr Moahmmed Ali Radjai, to serve as prime minister. He also gave him the responsibility of forming a ministerial team, which is supposed to bring some order into the institutional chaos the country is experiencing. It would be necessary, for example, to have a responsible and balanced minister of justice, rather than [just] the Ayatollah Khomeyni, "itinerant judge," who leaves heaps of corpses in his wake... One week ago, the new prime minister gave to the president the list of ministers he planned for his governmental cabinet. And the president wasted no time rejecting this list. This refusal by the chief of state publicly exposed, both the disagreement (if not hostility) which exists between the two men, and the gap which has widened between the two main blocs which survived the coming to power of the Iranian revolution. The group with power behind it, that of the clergy, is on no account ready to ease off, whereas the other, that of the partisans of a "para-democratic" type regime, is tired of the disorder and capriciousness which reigns in the country. In this regard, the interview just given by the minister for foreign affairs, Sadeq Ghotbzadeh, to the American weekly TIME is revealing. In this interview, the man responsible--officially--for Iranian diplomacy (?) states quite clearly that he would consider it inadmissible to stage a trial of the American hostages held in Iran. This is the same Mr Ghotbzadeh, moreover, who had to argue fiercely with the "Islamic students" who also wanted to hold the members of the UN commission hostage, the very commission created to deal with the fate of the hostages. And he was clearly throwing rocks right into the garden of the ayatollahs when he declared: "It is not by shouting down with the United States or down with the USSR that we will stir up revolutions in the world."

Prepare for the Future

The health of the Ayatollah Khomeyni (the Imam) is precarious. And if he were to disappear, no other religious leader has the stature needed to replace him. Then the question of authority would be posed: an authority to which both the clergy and the figures elected by the people, such as President Bani-Sadr, would accord allegiance. In the near future, it seems obvious that only a governmental team with men like Bani-Sadr and Ghotbzadeh would have sufficient cohesion to resist the post-Khomeyni maelstrom. Able to surround itself with "Islamic hostages" such as Prime Minister Radjai. But on condition that these "hostages" cannot manipulate the real levers of command. And one comes back to the dispute which presently pits the president and the prime minister against each other. For the chief of state is primarily opposed to the nomination for the ministry of the interior. A minister who, if he was of the "clerical clan," would sow disorder, repression, and violence in short order, not to speak of the fate eventually awaiting the American hostages. Now the "secular clan" realizes perfectly well that a trial of the hostages, with its possible consequences, would permanently alienate the few friends Iran has kept abroad and to which it above all remains attached. The difference in concept is perfectly exemplified by what is happening in Iran at the present moment. On the one hand, in the name of the Islamic revolution, President Bani-Sadr is trying to establish a democratic regime, in opposition to the old regime, and in the name of this same revolution Khomeyni refuses to give up his supervision of operations, since as Imam he is invested by God with the mission of watching over the destiny of Iran. A country which, almost certainly, is headed toward a civil war as soon as Khomeyni has left the scene. And the factions are numerous: the clergy, the educated technocrats of the revolution such as Bani-Sadr and Ghotbzadeh, the monarchists (especially within the army) and the adovcates of a Western-style democracy who will be united behind the emissaries of ex-prime minister Shahpur Bakhtiar. And all this is not even to take into account the separatist movements... The Iran of tomorrow may well collapse like a house of cards. It remains to be seen who will pocket the trumps.

ALL INTERNATIONAL SCHOOLS ABOLISHED

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 23 Jul 80 p 16

/Article: "All International Schools throughout the Country are Dissolved"/

/Text/ All international schools throughout the country have been declared dissolved. From now on, there will be no schools administered by non-Iranians. Hoseyn Khoshnevisan, director general of education of Tehran, declared this subject at a press conference.

Khoshnevisan, who was speaking following the conclusion of the session which made the decision on this type of school (which had been convened in the presence of some education officials), added "In this manner, the dissolution of international schools in hereby declared and this conference itself proclaims the dissolution. If no circular letter is issued let no one imagine that international schools still exist." He then said,

"At this decision-making session, commissions have taken the necessary decisions to eliminate the problems which exist for the students in schools of this type. Commission members consist of competent persons who naturally are the guardians of their original students.

"At the present time, the guardians of students who have the necessary education to benefit from and apply their studies to ordinary schools are being advised to register their children at the school nearest their home. Students who do not have adequate education in terms of Persian literature should register in the same schools, in accordance with a program which has been set out; at the conclusion of a specific 'time' which will be necessary to prepare the student and apply the Persian language program, their study program will continue as in the past, in accordance with the basic changes which are being made by an appointed group." Khoshnevisan then said,

"From the financial standpoint, that group of curricula which correspond to the Ministry of Education cirriculum will be at our expense and the costs for that portion of studies which needs time for application (for example, physics or chemistry in French or German) will be at the expense of the guardians themselves. Of course it is necessary to mention that the 'time' determined for application of the curricula for the elementary stage will not be more than 1 year; that is, in the academic year 1981-82 Education will have no responsibilities toward that type of student."

Minority Schools

The director general of Tehran education then referred to the schools of religious minorities and said,

"Regarding schools for Jews, Christians and Zorastrians, every right which an Iranian requires from the educational standpoint will be made available with respect to them, and the subject of Article 15 of the constitution, that is, instruction in ethnic languages, will be observed in every sense. There is no problem regarding religious observances which concern the level of the school; nonetheless, one must note that the school and church must be separate, although both are places of education."

He added, "In the coming school year we will have no school by the name of a majority or minority school, and all schools will be uniform."

KING CLOSES EDUCATION CONFERENCE

Final Speeches

Rabat L'OPINION in French 1 Sep 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] Ifr-ne--From our Special Correspondent Mohamed Tamri. The work on the national education conference was ended yesterday with a speech given by His Majesty King Hassan II pronounced just before noon before all the participants meeting in the capital of Ifrane province, in the presence of SAR [expansion unknown] the Crown Prince Sidi Mohammed, members of the government led by Me Maati Bouabid, prime minister and minister of justice, Mr Dey Ould Sidi Baba, president of the chamber of representatives, and several other personalities.

In his speech, H.M. King Hassan II decided to create a national commission which will work at his side and will be responsible for arriving at conclusions that will be submitted to Parliament in the April session. His Majesty the King said that this commission will be composed of heads of political parties participating in these meetings, presidents of commissions, political personalities inadequately represented in the chamber of representatives, the minister of finance and the planning authority.

If need be the commission will be able to call on the help of Moroccan or foreign experts.

His Majesty Hassan II said that the work of all the commissions unfolded in a climate marked by a certain awareness and that the participants understood the nature, the importance, and the scope of the problem.

"We have decided," the sovereign added, "that the elite should meet to examine the questions related to education and look at the ideas in order to come to a national solution."

The sovereign emphasized also that he preferred to opt for the path of dialog in order to come to a unification of the ranks in face of the crucial problems.

His Majesty Hassan II, finally, thanked the participants for their contribution to the success of these sessions.

Dr Azzedine Laraki made a statement which aroused great satisfaction and reaffirmed optimism as to the flexibility that faculty enrollments have shown. Dr Laraki was to say that 5,808 places are still available on the faculties of letters, law, and the sciences. This will allow the enrollment of more candidates for the baccalaureate.

To this end, the minister has decided to proceed with a third period of enrollment starting 15 September. Dr Laraki was also to say that he has assumed his political responsibility in the government as to the implementation of guidelines for the university re-opening and that he had taken, in coordination with the deans, all the technical measures to organize it in the way in which it has unfolded.

For his part Mr Abderrazak Afilal on behalf of the UGTM [General Union of Moroccan Workers] gave a speech in which he underlined that it is necessary to adopt an overall solution for the problems in education. It was observed that in general problems do not excite great interest except when one is confronted with an immediate crisis, such as university re-opening, as is the case this year.

To establish a systematic education policy, brother Afilal made an appeal for guidelines to be established, starting at the end of primary education, that are centered on vocational training capable of providing the mid-level cadres, as well as [centered] on general and technical education adequate for training the upper cadres of which the country has need.

Mr Abderrazak Afilal was also to emphasize that UGTM has elaborated a radical plan for structural reform in education which will be submitted to the various committees of the colloquium.

Mr Afilal was also to say:

"I have the honor to speak to this colloquium on behalf of the UGTM, and first of all I must express our sincere thanks to H.M. the King who has given us this opportunity to express our concerns on educational questions.

"In our view, the crisis in education is structural. The causes of this crisis lie in the fact that we are falling into generalities without broaching the very foundation of the educational problem. This is what happened in the colloquium of 1964, and in similar meetings. I certainly hope we will avoid this practice in this colloquium."

We have met at a time when we are faced with the problem of university re-opening, or what has been called in other terms university orientation. For our part we consider that any orientation which is only beginning at this phase can only perpetuate a serious mistake which has characterized education for years.

The orientation, in our opinion, should begin at the end of primary school, by creating a common base, of a duration of two years, which at the end of two years leads to two main branches: that of ordinary education which leads to the second secondary cycle, and that of vocational training which leads to the formation of mid-level cadres destined to satisfy the needs of our economic development. It must be emphasized that finishing studies in this branch will allow the better elements to go on to technical education which begins at the level of the second cycle, which in turn leads to higher technical education--the school of engineering, for example.

I return to the question of the common base, to re-emphasize that all those who follow it will end up either with the acquisition of a trade which will be useful to them and by consequence answer societal needs, or they will go on to normal schooling with its cycle of 3 years and which ends up in two branches:

One branch which we can call functional education, which trains teachers and certain cadres of the private and public sector. The second branch leads to university education, which trains the upper cadres and furnishes the raw material for scientific research. I would like to present here the opinion of UGTM as to the question of teacher training. In fact the training should have for its ultimate foundation mastery of the teaching profession. This cannot be acquired except through a sufficient period of training, and cannot be less than 3 years.

We are proposing this, that the choice of students to be trained as teachers be made among the students of the sixth secondary year, which is obviously a temporary solution while waiting for the implementation of functional education.

The problem of education which distinguishes this period is in the first place that of university re-opening. It is evident that our position is to give all bachelors the opportunity to enroll in the institution of their choice. We can overcome the problem created this year, that is certain. But what would our position be during the coming years when the number of bachelors increases.

This situation requires us to find definitive solutions and to come to agreement on the fundamental choices. The problems we are confronting, moreover, are only the result of the improvised policies adopted by the various ministries of education in previous years. I believe it is time to find a basic and all-encompassing solution to the problem."

In other developments, brother Mohamed Louafa, secretary general of Istiqlalian Youth, gave a speech in which he said in the first place that the discussion on educational questions was undertaken without any objective discussion of the economic and social crisis, of which the education crisis is only a reflection.

In other developments, brother Mohamed Louafa, secretary general of Istiqlalian Youth, gave a speech in which he said in the first place that the discussion on educational questions was undertaken without any objective discussion of the economic and social crisis, of which the education crisis is only a reflection.

Mr Louafa also pointed out that every time educational questions are discussed, resolutions and motions are adopted. These latter, unfortunately, remain dead letters. Moreover, this very fact is constantly aggravating problems and creating an atmosphere of distrust between citizens and officials. And Mr Louafa stressed that the prescriptions suggested on behalf of the Istiqlalian Party by combatant Hachmi Filali are after all those of the Istiqlalian Youth which for its part stresses that the cause of the problem lies in the insufficiency of university places. This situation is due to the waste, with regard to construction and equipment, in certain institutions, whereas we could have built a sufficient number of university institutions with adequate equipment for the same cost.

With regard to orientation, it must be recognized that it is a mistake to initiate it at the university level. Therefore, we must consider it at the beginning of secondary school and in such a way that this orientation can answer to the economic needs of the country, without, notwithstanding, failing to take into account the capacities and the preferences of the student.

Brother Louafa was also to emphasize that the interest of this colloquium should be centered on the university re-opening, but without ignoring student choice.

Mr Louafa then launched into the problem of scholarships, and recalled the unshakeable principle of Istiqlalian Youth as to generalization of scholarships. This without, nevertheless, putting on an equal footing the provided-for student and the poor student who is obliged--through his scholarship--to support his family.

'AL-BAYANE' Comment

Casablanca AL-BAYANE in French 2 Sep 80 p 1

[Editorial--passages between slantlines originally published in capitals]

[Text] Ifrane is over...But, paradoxically, everything is only beginning!

As we noted in our previous editorial--and before the end of the colloquium--it could be considered that in itself this assembling of "all the concerned parties" to the education crisis marked a new stage in the process of the democratization of public life:

Today, on examining the actions and recommendations made by the "conference on national education," one truly finds that this stage has brought the results one could legitimately hope for.

And this is where the value of democratic concertation is manifested: it allows the submission of proposals and ideas which would ordinarily be swept aside by technocracy and partisan spirit; it gives the representatives of the popular interests and their "spokesmen" the opportunity to expose their urgent demands and to defend their rights. And in fact what happened at Ifrane was good.

Without any pretension it can be stated that the representatives of progressive forces, including the PPS [Party of Progress and Socialism], marked the work of the colloquium and its recommendations by their presence and their ideas.

They advanced proposals and reiterated principles which were /adopted unanimously by the participants/--which in turn is a reflection of national unanimity--and which advanced the broad lines of an emergency rescue plan, especially in the higher [education].

In testimony whereof, all the Malthusian and arbitrary measures which barred access to the universities were swept away.

In other developments, many concrete suggestions were made which eloquently prove that no problem is insoluble if one agrees to resolve it on the basis of just solutions founded on the people's concerns and not on bureaucratic views cut off from the masses.

And therefore one is able to think that the 1980-1981 university re-opening will be able to unfold under much better circumstances than what otherwise could have been: No bachelor will be refused, there will be no preliminary selection, injustice or arbitrary action.

These measures are from Ifrane, but--as we keep saying--let it not be forgotten that they come directly from the views and positions of the leftist forces--the PPS, USFP [Socialist Union of Popular Forces], UNEM [National Union of Moroccan Students], etc.

Now everything is beginning:

After having obtained the approval of all parties present to their proposals, the forces of progress owe it to themselves to watch over their implementation and execution.

It is a new democratic battle which is under way, one which requires translating the Ifrane resolutions into reality and into facts.

No doubt, in the enterprise ahead, we will have the full support of the people and the masses!

BUREAUCRATIC REFORM MEASURES REPORTED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 18-19 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Administrative Reform: Mr Belhaj Amor Presides Over a Working Session"]

[Text] Mr Moncef Belhaj Amor, ministerial delegate to the prime minister, in charge of the public service and of administrative reform, chaired a working session on Saturday, at the prime minister's office, which brought together a number of high officials responsible for the follow-up of the administrative reform project.

This working session was devoted to the finalization of the first stages passed through by the different administrative services in the implementation of the decisions and recommendations arising out of the joint government/ Political Committee meeting which was held on 25 July 1980. These decisions and recommendations calling for the implementation, at an early date, of administrative reform, in accordance with the citizens' wishes for expansion of decentralization and simplification of administrative procedures, so that the administration would really be at the service of the citizens. [as published]

In this context, a survey was made of the state of progress of the work of the administrative services toward publication by each ministry of a citizen's guide so as to clarify all procedures to be followed and to avoid any slowness due to ignorance of procedures.

Also decided on during the meeting were practical measures to facilitate the setting up of administrative support services in the different governorates so as to accelerate the establishment or strengthening in the regions of structures under the various ministries' jurisdiction. It was decided to grant these structures all the powers and prerogatives required to endow them with the power of decision and the capacity for resolving citizens' problems on the spot, without having recourse to the capital.

With regard to the question of improving the administrative management system, the participants agreed that this improvement would be achieved through the introduction of data processing.

In order to encourage state employees to work in the interior of the country, consideration was given during the meeting to a draft laying down the privileges and inducements to be granted them for that purpose.

SIXTH PLAN TO ENCOMPASS ALL CURRENTS, TENDENCIES

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 18-19 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Mr Mezri Chekir in Monastir: The Committees Responsible for Preparing the Sixth Plan Will Bring Together All Currents"]

[Text] Three Tunisian banks for foreign cooperation will be set up.

The development of the tourist sector was the object of an open discussion organized by the Regional Hotel and Tourism Federation of the Monastir governorate under the chairmanship of Mr Mezri Chekir, director of the prime minister's cabinet, in the presence of Mr Mansour Skhiri, governor of the region, and of a good number of hotel-keepers and officials of financial institutions.

Replying to the participants, Mr Mezri Chekir pointed out that the expansion of the tourist sector, which provides some 100,000 jobs, does not depend only on the quality of the services, but also on the socio-political stability of the country, a stability which, he said, encourages investments in Tunisia by holders of capital, such as Middle East businessmen, who are already beginning to finance the carrying out of some projects in our country.

And Mr Mezri Chekir added:

"The secret of the success of Tunisian policy and the credit enjoyed by Tunisia in the concert of nations lie in President Bourguiba's prestige and in the country's political stability."

The director of the prime minister's cabinet then brought out the need for safeguarding the nation's assets, in particular, by the preservation of the healthy socio-political climate which prevails in the country. "That is,"

he stated, "a responsibility that falls not only on the government and the party, but also on the whole national community, which should give proof of straightforwardness, of discipline and of solidarity....[as published]

Dealing with the need to protect the environment against pollution, Mr Mezri Chekir stressed the efforts made by the government in this direction, indicating that the establishment of an ecological structure was under study.

Mr Mezri Chekir brought out, moreover, the prime minister's concern for developing among all citizens a spirit of cooperation and cohesion, this in accordance with the directives of the Supreme Combatant. "This option," he noted, "tends to strengthen the invulnerability of the state, whose action is governed by Bourguibian principles, with the result that the party remains open to all and justice remains independent."

In this context, the director of the prime minister's cabinet announced that the committees responsible for preparing the Sixth Plan will bring together all currents and all tendencies so that the whole of the national community will take part in strengthening the foundations of full-scale development.

He stressed, moreover, that the measures taken with a view to setting up three Tunisian banks for cooperation with other countries would solve all the financing and loan-granting problems and would not fail to reassure businessmen wishing to start tourist projects.

Mr Mezri Chekir, in conclusion, brought out the Supreme Combatant's interest in development projects and his concern for associating all levels of staff in their implementation.

He transmitted to the participants the prime minister's greetings and the attention given by him to the tourist sector because of the essential role which the latter plays in the strengthening of the national economy. He expressed the prime minister's determination to take measures of a nature to promote this sector, while at the same time preserving the country's moral, social and spiritual values.

PREPARATIONS FOR RETURN OF TUNISIANS WORKING OUT OF COUNTRY

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 18-19 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Seminar on Tunisian Workers Abroad: For a Gradual and Organized Return"]

[Text] As foreseen, the principal theme of the 14th congress on Tunisian workers abroad, which took place on 16 August at the El Omrane Lycee, was the eventual return to the country of our expatriate workers. All those attending the congress were indeed unanimous in recognizing that this return, in view of present circumstances in the host countries, has become a very serious possibility.

What were the principal conclusions of the congress on this subject?

First, it is the worker and the worker alone who has the right to decide the time of his return. As pointed out by the minister of social affairs at the end of the work of the congress, it was the worker who decided to leave for abroad, and the government helped him do this. His return should be made in the same fashion. It is thus the responsibility of our expatriates not to yield to the pressures which some authorities are beginning to exert on them to induce them to return in a precipitous manner, just as it is their responsibility not to succumb to the offers which are painted in glowing colors so that they will leave their place of work. Yes to a return, but no to a forced return should be a motto of our workers.

Second: In agreeing to emigrate, every worker had as his goal the improvement of his financial and social situation. It would therefore be absurd to require him to return to the country empty-handed in order to occupy the same position that impelled him to leave. Yes to a return, but no to just any return is another motto for our expatriates who would wish to return home surrounded by all the guarantees of success, whether through adequate training, enabling them to occupy a post useful to the country and likely to guarantee them a decent wage, or through a minimum amount of capital which they could lay to advantage in the country. It is therefore the duty of the host countries to provide our workers with the vocational training to which they have a right. It is, on the other hand, our workers' responsibility to try to improve themselves vocationally as well as intellectually, especially since their presence in countries allowing, by several means available, (evening courses, etc.) [as published] such an improvement could only encourage them to do so. It is, lastly, their responsibility to prepare suitably for their return by keeping themselves reguarly informed about employment or investment possibilities which occur in the country and not to wait for their return before deciding on their later activities.

Third: The task which falls on the Tunisian authorities in preparing for the return of these expatriates is no less important. It consists first of all in protecting their interests during their stay abroad, with all that this requires in the way of cooperation agreements, direct and regular contacts to protect their rights and their authenticity. It consists further in providing them with the place they are entitled to in Tunisian society, in guaranteeing them maximum employment, decent housing and investment incentives.

Our expatriate workers constitute a very important productive work force which unfavorable circumstances have obliged us to give up for the benefit of foreign countries. These countries at present consider that they no longer need them. So much the better for us, even with the little time they leave for us to reintegrate them adequately.

SUGAR PRODUCTION TOO LOW FOR DOMESTIC NEEDS

Tunis DIALOGUE in French 11 Aug 80 p 56

[Article by A.M.]

[Text] The national sugar beet production is still very low; to meet its needs, Tunisia must look abroad. The Bou Salem sugar mill is needed; it is designed to expand production and to slow down the rural exodus.

As part of the preparatory work being done for the sixth economic and social development plan, DIALOGUE, in its economic reportage, is considering some problems of vital interest to Tunisian society.

All the actions taken are designed to bring about an economic recovery, to ensure self-sufficiency in food production, to guarantee job security, and to reduce regional and sectorial imbalance.

The projects being carried out are quite numerous and varied. In the industrial sector there are: ICM [Maghreb Chemical Industries] 1 and ICM 2; the STIR [Tunisian-Italian Refining Company]; SOFOMECA [expansion unknown]; Goulette 1 and Goulette 2; the Sousse power plant. In the transportation sector there are: the CTN [expansion unknown], SNT [National Transportation Company], SRT, STM [expansions unknown], and Tunis-Air. In agriculture: dams, offices, complexes, greenhouse cultivation, the STIL [expansion unknown], and animal husbandry projects.

In sugar, in terms of meeting household needs and the demand of some industries (confectionery, soft drinks), the national production is still low, and Tunisia must resort to imports.

The sugar beet harvest, the basic raw material used at the Beja sugar mill, varies between 118,000 tons--a record in 1977, and 60,000 tons, the quantity produced in 1979. So the production varies by 100 percent. The decline in the last few years is attributed to the limited capacity of the enterprise, the rather low rainfall, the reduction of cultivated lands, and the decline of the rate of return. There is also the tendency of farmers in the region to grow vegetable crops which are considered more profitable than sugar beets. All these factors added together have had quite a negative impact on sugar beet cultivation and thus on sugar production.

That is why Tunisia is turning abroad to buy raw sugar in a solid state, which is then refined at the Beja sugar mill. In the past 5 years, the average imports of sugar, coming primarily from Cuba, the Netherlands, France, and Belgium, have been 50,000 tons, for a price of 5 million dinars. This amounts to a price of 100 millimes per kilo.

The production of the sugar company (from sugar beets and from the refining of imported sugar) does not manage to cover local consumption. The demand for granulated or powdered sugar came to 111,000 tons on the average, during the period considered. This cost 140 million dinars, or 140 millimes per kilo.

We note the diverging trend between the amounts imported, which are increasing slightly, and the corresponding costs, which are declining; that is due to the decline in the world sugar price.

We should comment, though, that Tunisia does export refined sugar in the form of sugar cubes, primarily to Algeria; in 1979, Tunisia exported 32,600 tons for 5.4 million dinars.

The government is naturally aware of the inadequacy of our sugar production. A joint cabinet committee has studied this problem, and the decision to establish a second sugar mill at Bou Salem is a good one.

The development of this industry proves the interest of the state in the western regions; it will help, insofar as possible, to limit the rural exodus toward urban areas, to reduce the number of the unemployed, and to keep in the area the labor needed for the enterprise to operate satisfactorily.

FORMER COORDINATION COMMITTEE HEAD, MOHAMED TROUDI ARRESTED

Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 22 Aug 80 p 4

[Article: "Former Secretary General of Bizerte Coordination Committee Arrested"]

[Text] As a result of the decision taken by the Political Committee to disband four coordination committees including the one in Bizerte, the former secretary general of the Bizerte Coordination Committee, Mohamed Troudi, undertook, through an agent he himself recruited, the destruction of official documents belonging to the Coordination Committee, a matter of surprise to the authorities, all the more since the destruction of these documents took place immediately after Mohamed Troudi had been informed of the disbanding of the committee of which he was secretary general.

During the interrogation, the agent implicated stated that the documents destroyed and burned represented minutes of congresses of cells, documents related to the work of social solidarity, and the stubs of books of vouchers for donations intended for the construction of a mosque.

Considering the gravity of the act, which constitutes an infraction of the law, in view of the deliberate intention of its instigator and the admissions of the agent, who stated, following the discovery of the operation, that he had acted on the direct order of Mohamed Troudi and not on his own initiative, an arrest order was issued against the former secretary general of the Coordination Committee. He was handed over to the public prosecutor's department, where the investigation is continuing. This infraction was not the only one committed by Troudi. Indeed, some of his previous schemes confirm his tendency to use his responsibilities with the party for purely personal aims and interests.

Mention can be made, in this connection, of Troudi's acquisition of a property (Henchir) at Utique, known under the name of "Ouakef Sidi El Arbi," for the benefit of his relatives. Using his status as party official, he forced the owners of this property to give it up to him at the derisory price of 27,000 dinars, whereas the real value of this property, which covers 120 hectares, is 70,000 dinars, if not more, according to an agricultural expert's estimate, especially since a part of the property is irrigated in view of its location in the Medjerda valley.

Troudi, by fraudulent maneuvers, since he had not succeeded at first in convincing the liquidator in charge of the property--let us recall that an inheritance was involved--was going to claim to the heirs that he had an authorization from the government to buy the said property at a price markedly lower than the one he was offering them. The latter agreed, unwillingly, to conclude the transaction, which obliged the regional authorities to intervene recently to put an end to these schemings and extortions by restoring the property to its legitimate owners.

Another affair proves Troudi's utilization of his responsibilities for personal ends, sowing, by these acts, dissension and discord.

In fact, a citizen recently made a complaint to the Justice Department in which he affirmed having been the object of a planned attack by some ex-convicts, who are the hired men of certain parties and work on the order of the Coordination Committee's ex-secretary general. One of them recanted for fear of returning once again to prison, according to his own admission during the preliminary investigation.

In the framework of these schemings, let us again mention a no less serious act. Troudi even used the Coordination Committee's assets in accordance with his wishes. About a year ago, he gave a car belonging to the committee to someone in his entourage in charge of an agricultural cooperative against a bad check without, for all that, demanding the amount until the examining judge found the check and ordered the restitution of the Coordination Committee car. Such are the acts, among others not yet disclosed, which show that the ex-secretary general of the Bizerte Coordination Committee is primarily concerned with satisfying his personal interests, interests which are entirely in contradiction with the general interest, using his official status.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY CHANGES--Yesterday morning, during a plenary session presided over by Mr Sadak Mokaddem, the National Assembly adopted a draft report submitted by the committee on parliamentary immunity stripping Deputy Hassen Kacem of his parliamentary immunity. Before closing the meeting, Mr Sadak Mokaddem announced that Ameur Ben Aicha had lost his status as deputy to the National Assembly as the result of his exclusion from the PSD [Destourian Socialist Party] and in application of the provisions of article 109 of the electoral code. The president of the National Assembly stated that the necessary measures were taken to provide in due time for this recess. [Text] [Tunis LA PRESSE DE TUNISIE in French 22 Aug 80 p 1] 9434

FOREIGN POLICY DEBATES--The National Assembly's expanded committees yesterday morning held a meeting which they devoted to the discussion of the country's foreign policy. Mr Hassan Belkhoja, minister of foreign affairs, was to give, on that occasion a talk on the different activities of Tunisian diplomacy, bringing out in particular the importance that it gives to cooperative and neighborly relations. The minister also brought up some questions regarding Tunisia's relations with neighboring countries, the Arab world, the Islamic community and Africa. He then gave details of the positions taken by Tunisia with regard to the Palestinian cause and to El Qods, which Israel had decided to annex and to consider as its eternal capital, thus trampling on international resolutions and scorning the Islamic community's feelings. The minister also surveyed Tunisia's relations with Western Europe, the North-South dialog and international economic problems. During the debate, the deputies raised questions regarding Tunisia's relations with its sister countries. The deputies also discussed Tunisia's relations with the European Community and particularly the future of this cooperation after the anticipated expansion of the EEC. THERMAL POWER PLANT--An order for electro-mechanical equipment will be submitted for the first phase of construction of a thermal power station at Rades, near Tunis (300 MW net unit power), two identical power sections of between 140 and 160 MW each, on firm order. Two supplemental sections of equal power will be sought on option, bringing the station's total power to 600 MW at the conclusion of the second phase. Total cost envisioned for completion of the first phase: 80-85 million dinars. [Excerpts] [Paris L'USINE NOUVELLE in French 4 Sep 80 p 35]

LEADER OF ISLAMIC CONFERENCE DESCRIBES ORGANIZATION'S ROLE

Riyadh AL-RIYAD in Arabic 18 Jun 80 p 9

/Article by 'Uthman 'Abduh Hashim: "Secretary General of Organization of Islamic Conference Talks to AL-RIYAD: There Have Been No Contacts with Moscow in the Political Sense"/

/Text/ The permanent tripartite commission on the issue of Afghanistan, which was formed at the latest conference of foreign ministers of the Islamic states in Islamabad, is still continuing its consultations and contacts preparatory to conducting direct contacts with the parties to the issue, especially the Soviet Union and the ruling regime in Afghanistan. The situation could result in the holding of a conference which would assemble these parties at a European capital. As these contacts are going on, the Palestine Liberation Organization has requested the holding of an emergency meeting of foreign ministers of Islamic states to discuss the aggressions the Zionist enemy is carrying out against the Palestinian people on the occupied territories, the latest of which was the attempt to assassinate the three mayors. It is in this atmosphere that the importance of this talk with Mr Habib el-Chatti, secretary general of the organization of the Islamic Conference, arises.

This conversation occurred following his visit to Syria, Jordan, Tehran and France.

We began the conversation with the results which were achieved following his recent visit to Syria, Jordan, Tehran and France, the accomplishments the Organization of the Islamic Conference made during these successive meetings, and the goals these visits were aimed at. He replied:

"There is no doubt that these visits are aimed at various goals. My visit to Tehran concerned the meeting of the tripartite ministerial committee dealing with Afghanistan; this committee held its first meeting in Tehran. We discussed the issue of Afghanistan from all aspects and decided to make contacts with all parties to the Afghanistan problem."

/Question/ What results have you obtained from these contracts?

/Answer/ In fact, our objective, as I have said, was to get in touch with the parties concerned with the issue, which are:

The Islamic resistance;

The current regime in Kabul;

The Soviet Union.

We have agreed to meet with these three parties to discuss solving the issue of Afghanistan with them and have agreed that this should take place at a meeting to be held half a month after the first meeting, that is, on 22 July, in a European capital. In the first stage we sent invitations to the two Afghan parties. I met with the Mojahedin in Tehran and they emphasized that they would send a united delegation to meet with the commission.

/Question/ What about the current regime in Kabul?

/Answer/ I have sent an invitation to the current regime in Kabul, on grounds that it is a political movement representing a separate political opinion. We have not yet received any answer from them; perhaps the difficulty of communications and contacts is obstructing our contacts there.

As regards the Soviet Union, I am assigned to carry out what is called a feeler only, and the contacts do not have the political significance of dealing deeply with the essence of the issue. Therefore there is no truth to the news which is stated or issued from Moscow by parties claiming to be diplomatic to the effect that the Soviet Union has refused to receive us. This is not at issue and there is no truth to this news item, because I have not asked that of them, since we have not yet gotten to the stage where we will get in touch with the Soviet Union. I do not know how there could be a rejection as long as there has not been a request. That is strange.

/Question/ You have met with His Highness Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal, the foreign minister; what are the issues which were discussed?

/Answer/ We discussed all issues concerning relations between the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the kingdom, foremost among them the Palestine cause and the request the Palestine Liberation Organization made for the convening of an urgent conference of Arab foreign ministers as soon as possible.

We also discussed the Afghanistan issue and the efforts we have exerted to solve this problem.

We also discussed the position of the European countries and the decisions these countries will take in Venice.

We discussed the issue of the Islamic summit conference which will be held in the kingdom in January.

Recently a discussion took place on the exceptional coming session of the United Nations General Assembly which will be devoted to Palestine and will be held starting next 22 July.

/Question/ Do you believe that there will be rapid solution to the Afghanistan issue and to ridding its Moslem pelple of the viper of Russian intervention?

/Answer/ I would like to say that it is natural that my answers should be clear and frank. Therefore I do not believe that it will be solved easily, because an issue of this type is not simple or easy to solve. This is a major country which has intervened militarily in the affairs of a small country, and when it ventured on this act it had objectives and aspirations it wanted to achieve.

As far as we are concerned, as Islamic countries, we cannot be content with the fact that Soviet forces remain in Afghanistan. We must act to withdraw them from that Moslem country. All I ask is that God give us success in this.

/Question/ Is there a period of time in which you believe it can be guaranteed that this process is carried out?

/Answer/ There is no doubt that we will earnestly strive to realize Afghanistan's freedom from this foreign intervention, but the process will not be easy. In fact, we will find many obstacles and various difficulties on our way. However, these obstacles and difficulties will not divert us from our course. We are determined to continue moving toward the attainment of our goals, which are aimed at having Afghanistan go back to being what it was, an independent nonaligned Moslem country.

We hope that this action of ours will not take long, but we will carry it out, whatever the difficulties are, and will continue the action whatever period this action might require.

/Question/ To what extent do you consider there is a congruence of views between the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the Arab League?

/Answer/ I do not believe that there is any dispute between the organization and the Arab League, for a basic reason, which is that all countries belonging to the Arab League are at the same time members of the Islamic Organization. Therefore, when these members attend the Islamic Conference, they come to it with a certain kind of agreement and harmony among themselves, because, if there is any dispute, this dispute will always remain outside, and what we always strive for is harmony on major worldwide issues. Our basic cause is Jerusalem, and when I say Jerusalem I say Palestine, because almighty glorious God said "The holy mosque whose surroundings we have blessed," and its surroundings are Palestine. As far as we are concerned, the term Jerusalem refers to the land which God has blessed, and that is Arab Moslem Palestine. On this point, there cannot be a dispute between the organization and the Arab League, since as I have said our goal is the same.

There is also another goal which is not less important than the preceding one, and that is to strengthen Islamic solidarity. When we say strengthening Islamic solidarity, we must turn toward all fields of life, politics, economics, society, culture and so forth. When we act with Islamic solidarity, our act concerns the Arab nation, which has half the members in the Organization of the Islamic Conference. Therefore our action in behalf of our seminal issues responds to the cooperation the Arabs aspire to in economic, social and cultural spheres, and various spheres. On this occasion, I personally believe that Arab nationalism and Islamic nationalism are integral and that there is nothing which will have the effect of putting them in opposition over anything. The Arab nation is part of the Islamic nation. If the Arab nation is in harmony and is united over goals, that will be tantamount to a beginning of construction for the sake of harmony and solidarity with the Islamic world.

Put more clearly, every step which Arab nationalism takes realizes the numerous interests of Moslems in general and makes it easy for us to build the edifice of Islamic solidarity. This causes me to be optimistic regarding the need for cooperation between the organization and the Arab League. On this occasion, we must realize that the organization is studying all Islamic issues, including Arab issues. Naturally we do not study particular issues between Arab states, but we do study issues common to the Arab nation.

/Question/ Does the Organization of the Islamic Conference have a role in bringing Arab viewpoints closer together with respect to existing disputes?

/Answer/ There is no doubt that the Islamic Organization is able to play an important role in this sphere, because it deals with all problems and tries to boil them down in another framework which will unify people's statements, and action as well, in order to cope with our crucial issues.

The Palestine cause, for example. I do not believe that Arabs differ over the Palestine cause. When they come to the Islamic Organization, they come to it with a single spirit and strong fixed determination. Therefore personal disputes must not influence our goals--rather, we must leave them to the side and think about a future which will serve the Arab and Islamic nations together. There is one thing which must be taken for granted and that is that our major enemy is Israel and the sole danger threatening us is Israel. The rapid action which we must take is to stand up to Israel, in the sense that secondary disputes must not stand in the way of what we aspire to to attain our unity and freedom together.

/Question/ What has been done regarding the recent aggressions the Zionist enemy has committed to liquidate major Palestinians?

/Answer/ What the Islamic Organization has done regarding these aggressions is:

First, we have sought to have a Security Council meeting held and have been concerned to have the council issue a resolution condemning Israel.

Second, we have sent a request to the International Red Cross to conduct an investigation into what is going on in the West Bank.

Third, we have sent a similar request to the International Human Rights Commission to do the same.

Fourth, we have sent special letters to all members of Islamic states to adopt a position toward this and have explained to them the gravity of the situation which the recent aggressions in occupied Palestine have created, believing that the aggressions which occurred lately were not a sudden event or events directed exclusively at the persons against whom the aggressions were committed. I believe that it is part of a big scheme which will continue and will be aimed at creating a climate of terror among Arabs in order to throw them out and force them to emigrate.

That is, we have explained what Israel is aiming at to our brothers in the Islamic countries and we must resist this without enabling it to influence us and frighten us into abandoning territory to it. Thus we feel the need for rapid action. We will not let Israel get what it is aspiring to, as it did in the days of the British mandate when it succeeded in creating a climate of terror. We can mention what happened in Dayr Yasin as an example, and not just this alone.

/Question/ What has happened regarding the Palestine Liberation Organization's request to hold an urgent conference?

/Answer/ The Liberation Organization has requested the holding of an urgent conference. This might occur in early July and will be devoted to reviewing this issue. The Moslem foreign ministers will study a response to these aggressions.

I would like to stress that people can be liberated only by powerful struggle. By the nature of the case, people struggling for their freedom without a doubt need aid from their brothers, but they must be strengthened by them first. I sent an appeal to the Palestinians on the occupied territories when I visited our brother Bassam Shak'ah in the hospital in Amman.

I sent an appeal for them to continue their struggle and turn these aggressions into a greater resolution to continue their struggle until the enemy feels that no aggression it commits will deflect us from our determination.

/Question/ What about the United Nations resolutions--do you believe that they will serve our cause or that they are just transitory ones which are often repeated?

/Answer/ Naturally these resolutions do not solve the problem but they do serve our causes, and I say that they serve our causes from the standpoint of Arab pressure on Israel and the United States of America, which supports it. The stronger this pressure is, the more we will bring about a reduction of the United States of America's contributions to Israel or even the withdrawal of American support for Israel.

/Question/ Finally, what is required of you as a political organization?

/Answer/ We, as a political organization, are required to perform this political action in order to reach our goals, which are:

First, to put pressure on America (political pressure abroad).

Second, to confront Israel (revolution within).

While this action of ours is political, accompanied by the decisive revolution which we are witnessing in the occupied territories by our Palestinian brothers, which we are all hailing, we must continue and stress our continuing struggle to obtain our usurped rights.

Therefore, when these two actions are combined, it will be possible to reach our goals.

/Question/ What about war?

/Answer/ That is the one thing which is left. That decision is not one of the jobs of the organization. It is what countries decide when they have access to the resources to make that job succeed. However, as long as we have not decided on war, it is necessary for us to continue the two abovementioned actions, which are revolution within, firstly, and political pressure outside.

Through these two acts we will achieve many goals which will guarantee that we will reach our desired goals.

DEVELOPMENT OF AIR DEFENSE FORCES DISCUSSED

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 1 Jul 80 p 7, 11

[Interview With Maj Gen Sayyid Hamdi, Commander of Air Defense Forces, by Faruq al-Shadhili, in Cairo; date not given]

[Text] Maj Gen Sayyid Hamdi, the commander of the air defense forces, has spoken to AL-AKHBAR about steps to develop the air defense forces and supply them with the latest equipment. The equipment, including missiles, will cover all parts of Egypt. He has also said that studies on the results of the October war are currently underway in order to prepare the plan for developing the air defense. The development plan includes the eastern weapons used by the air defense forces. The following is the text of the interview with the commander of the air defense forces:

[Question] The entire world has attested to the accomplishments of the Egyptian air defense forces in the October 1973 war--accomplishments that are well-known to all. Can your excellency tell us the accomplishments that the Egyptian air defense has realized since the October war?

Benefiting From Results of October War

[Answer] A profound study has been made of the results and lessons of the glorious October war. These lessons have been put to use in preparing the plans to develop the air defense forces, to develop the military doctrine and to develop the military means and tactics of the air defense forces and, subsequently, to develop the available eastern equipment and to introduce engineering and technical modifications on this equipment to improve its performance in the face of the most modern aircraft. All this has been done with the efforts of the combatant in the Egyptian air defense forces and on the basis of the combat experience gained in the October 1973 war.

Development of Eastern Weapons

The development and modernization have not been confined to what I have just mentioned. There is another sphere of major importance, namely developing and prolonging the life of the eastern weapons and equipment that we have. There is no doubt that these weapons constitute a national wealth and a trust in our hands. We have been able to overcome all the difficulties, thanks to our experts and our military plants and the help of some European companies specialized in this field. We have acquired some complementary equipment that has added a lot to the eastern weapons. Our plants have also been able to produce critical spareparts for the eastern weapons with the assistance of some western companies. It can be consequently said that we have succeeded in solving these problems.

Diversifying Sources of Weapon

As a result of the historic decision of President Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat, the leader in war and in peace, to diversify the sources of weapons, contracts have been concluded with European countries and with the United States for various types of air defense weapons and equipment. These weapons and equipment are manufactured in accordance with the latest accomplishments of the 20th century technology and in accordance with the specifications set by the Egyptian air defense on the basis of the combat experience gained from the October 1973 war.

The delivery of these weapons and equipment and their preparation for combat is considered a major accomplishment that moves the air defense forces to the age of the modern western technology. Some of these weapons have actually begun to enter the service in the air defense forces, thus crowning the previous efforts to prepare and get ready for absorbing them.

Most Modern Firing Range

Moreover, the latest and biggest firing range for air defense missiles in the Middle East will be opened in the next few weeks, God willing. All the equipment for this range has been received and the final touches are being applied to its construction. This range uses radio-guided drones similar in their capabilities to the most modern jet fighters. This range can serve all the Arab and friendly countries, not just Egypt. The completion of this range attests to the superior ability of the air defense forces to absorb and use advanced technology. It will also contribute a lot to the practical training of the air defense weapons and to raising their efficiency and their combat readiness.

U.S. Weapon Deals

[Question] What has been the share of the Egyptian air defense of the U.S. weapon deals, when are these weapons expected to arrive in Egypt and what is their impact on the Egyptian air defense?

[Answer] I have pointed out that contracts have been concluded with the United States for some air defense equipment. It is no secret that the sophisticated Hawk surface-to-air missiles are a part of these contracts. It is not necessary for me to divulge the size of the weapons for which contracts have been concluded with the United States or the dates of their delivery. However, I assert that these weapons and equipment will be on the Egyptian soil as soon as the training of the Egyptian technical cadres necessary to operate them--cadres that are being trained in both Egypt and the United States--is completed.

Moreover, the volume of these weapons is considered appropriate and compatible with the needs of the air defense forces for the already mentioned development plans. Moreover, the Egyptian air defense has asked for the introduction of some modifications on these weapons and equipment to make them compatible with the requirements of tactical use by the Egyptian air defense forces on the basis of the combat experience of the October 1973 war, the U.S. side has agreed to the modifications and they are being made.

Future of Air Defense

[Question] We know that the air defense constantly uses the latest accomplishments of science and technology. Does this have anything to do with what has been announced about requiring the Air Defense College graduates to get a B.S. in electronic engineering in addition to the B.S. in military sciences and what is the effect of this development on the future of air defense?

[Answer] Dealing with air defense equipment requires the officers to attain a high level of command of many of the engineering sciences. Radar, which is the backbone of air defense, is considered fundamentally the science of electronics. The missiles that cruise at many times the speed of sound require full knowledge of the sciences of air dynamics and of rocket propellers and whatever scientific theories are connected with them.

Moreover, missile and fighter plane guidance systems use electronic computers extensively and depend on automatic-control theories. Moreover, some of these systems use infra-red rays or lazer beams.

Detecting and shooting down aircraft through the use of radar follows mathematical laws that are within the sphere of the theory of probabilities.

All these are examples of some of the engineering sciences needed by the air defense officers.

LAWS ISSUED ON ESTABLISHMENT OF ARMED FORCES MEDICAL ACADEMY

Cairo AL-JARIDAH AL-RASMIYAH [THE OFFICIAL GAZETTE] in Arabic 26 Jun 80 pp 944-45

[Law No 118 of 1980]

[Text] Law No 118 of 1980 Amending Some Provisions of Law No 57 of 1979 on Establishment of Military Medical Academy in Armed Forces:

In the name of the people,

The president of the republic announces:

The People's Assembly has ratified the following law and we have promulgated it:

Article One

The phrase "chairmen of the medical services of the air, naval and air defense forces" shall be replaced by the phrase of "the directors of the institutes under the control of the academy" mentioned in the formation of the Higher Council of the Military Medical Academy stipulated in article 5 of law No 57 of 1979 on the creation of the armed forces Military Medical Academy.

Article Two

The text of the first paragraph of article 9 of the aforementioned law No 57 of 1979 shall be replaced by the following text:

Article 9. The Academy Council shall be formed in the following manner:

The head of the Military Medical Academy as chairman.

The deputy chairman of the training staff as member. The chief of staff of the Medical Services Administration as member. The directors of the institutes under the academy's control as members. The armed forces chief surgeon as member. The chief internal medicine specialist in the armed forces as member. The most senior heads of the special sections according to their academic [al-'ilmiyah] seniority as members. Five professors of the Egyptian universities with qualifications and experience in the goals for which the academy is established and appointed as members on a decision by the minister of defense on the nomination of the academy's Higher Council after consultation with the Higher Council of the Universities and with the authorities concerned. Their appointment shall be for a term of 2 renewable years.

The deputy chairman of the Academy of Higher Clinical Studies as secretary.

Article Three

This law shall be published in the Official Gazette and shall go into effect on the day following its publication.

This law shall be stamped with the seal of the state and shall be implemented as one of the state laws.

Issued at the Presidential Office on 17 June 1980.

DECREE SETS UP LOWER STATE SECURITY COURTS

Cairo AL-WAQA'I' AL-MISRIYAH [THE OFFICIAL GAZETTE] daily Supplement of the Official Gazette in Arabic No 145, 22 Jul 80 p 3

[Decrees by Ministry of Justice]

[Text] Minister of Justice Decree No 1994 of 1980 on Establishment of Lower [juz'iyah] State Security Courts in Cairo, Alexandria and al-Jizah:

The minister of justice,

After perusing the judiciary authority law No 46 issued in 1972 and the approval of the general assemblies of the courts of first instance of southern Cairo, Alexandria and al-Jizah,

Has decided:

Article 1. A lower court shall be set up in Cairo Governorate to try lower state security cases. Its jurisdiction shall cover the area of jurisdiction of the two courts of first instance in southern and northern Cairo. Its offices shall be located in the Courts Complex on al-Jala' Street.

Article 2. A lower court shall be set up in Alexandria Governorate and shall try lower state security cases. Its jurisdiction shall cover the area of jurisdiction of the Alexandria court of first instance, except for Marsa Matruh District. Its offices shall be located at the Court of First Instance--'Arabi Complex.

Article 3. A lower court shall be set up in al-Jizah Governorate and shall try lower state security cases. Its jurisdiction shall cover the area of jurisdiction of al-Jizah Court of First Instance, except for the provincial centers of al-Saff, al-'Ayyat and al-Badrashin. Its offices shall be located in the premises of al-Duqqi Lower Court.

Article 4. This decree shall be published in AL-WAQA'I' AL-MISRIYAH and shall go into effect on 1 June 1980.

Issued on 25 May 1980.

MINISTER OF INTERIOR UNDERLINES DEVELOPMENT OF POLICE FORCES

Cairo AL-AKHBAR in Arabic 27 June 80 p 4

[Article: "Nabawi Isma'il Announces at Graduation Ceremony of Two Groups at Commanders Institute: New Powers for Security Directors and Strengthening of Police in Governorates; Strict Control of Prices and Fight Against Deviation"]

[Text] Nabawi Isma'il, the deputy prime minister and the minister of interior, has announced giving new powers to the security directors to enable them to face their responsibilities and to bolster the police agency in all the governorates with the means of transportation and with modern scientific means.

Isma'il Nabawi asked the policemen to exercise strict control over prices and to fight any deviation. He has said that the most important police responsibilities are to confront the attempts of the hostile foreign forces to undermine the peace march.

At a ceremony to graduate two batches from the Commanding Police Officers Institute, Nabawi said: The most important responsibilities of the police forces in bolstering the peace march include creating an atmosphere of security and reassurance and confronting any attempt seeking to undermine the atmosphere of stability and security prevailing on our domestic front and to damage the atmosphere of freedom and democracy which President al-Sadat is eager to provide to our homeland.

Nabawi Isma'il has also said: We believe in working according to a system free of complexes and fear and in keeping clear off the conventional methods so as to raise the level of our performance to the dimensions of the problems, accumulations and challenges facing us. Isma'il has also stressed the need to exert efforts to put an end to centralism in decision making, to bolster the local authorities, to release their capabilities and to provide them with all the means of success.

Isma'il added: The ministry's plan in this phase is based on strengthening the police agency in all the governorates with the means of transportation and with the modern scientific means, on developing all the laws and regulations and on giving the security directors powers and jurisdiction to enable them to face their responsibilities.

Nabawi Isma'il has also stressed the need to exercise stricter control over prices and to mobilize all the capabilities of the security agency to secure the people's food and to fight any deviation.

Maj Gen 'Abd-al-'Azim Lashin, the Commanders Institute director, had earlier delivered an address in which he explained the institute's work plan which has led to doubling the number of graduating officers.

At the end of the ceremony, Muhammad Nabawi Isma'il distributed the diplomas and the awards to the top graduates.

NETWORK OF RADIO STATIONS TO SERVE PROVINCES

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 19 Jul 80 p 6

[Article by Mustafa al-Damrani: "Broadcasting System To Cover Every Spot on the Map of Egypt"]

[Text] For the first time in Egypt, 16 regional radio stations will be constructed to cover all governorates of the republic [see map on following page]. The construction of 10 stations will start by the end of this year, and will take 5 years to complete. This will strengthen the role played by these stations in furthering comprehensive development in the regions, in keeping with the total independence which President al-Sadat has given to the various provinces.

What is the full story of these stations and the methods of financing them? What are the construction priorities, and will each governorate have a regional station, or will there be a regional station for more than one governorate?

Also, what is the connection between these stations and the mother station in Cairo? And what programs will these stations carry compared with the programs presented by the Cairo station?

Safwat al-Sharif, chairman of the board of directors of the Radio and Television System, says that "in light of the directives of President al-Sadat on strengthening broadcasting so that the voice of Egypt will reach the most remote village and hamlet, we decided to plan that our regional radio stations should have two objectives. First, they would be relay stations to help strengthen transmission, so that the mother station could reach far places of the countryside. At the same time, they would be regional stations reflecting the activities of the region, promoting its daily life and helping to achieve its progress. We will, thereby, have saved time by accomplishing two objectives simultaneously."

Safwat al-Sharif goes on to say: "The new plan of action which is now under way involves the construction of 16 regional stations, 10 of which will be built over the next 5 years."

[Map of Planned Network of Regional Radio Stations]

Key:

1. Al-Sallum
2. Matruh
3. Al-Bahriyah Oasis
4. Al-Minya
5. Asyut
6. Sawhaj
7. Al-Kharijah Oases
8. Al-Dakhilah Oases
9. Red Sea
10. Al-Ghardaqah
11. Qina
12. Al-Qusayr
13. Luxor
14. Idfu
15. Aswan
16. Abu Sunbul

With regard to the sites of these stations, the plan includes both Upper and Lower Egypt. Opportunity in Upper Egypt with regard to the construction of these stations is great, because work is now under way on strengthening the stations which transmit the General Program, the Koran and the People Program. This provides an opportunity to utilize [unused resources] after the strengthening operation is completed in the construction of the regional stations in Upper Egypt."

The chairman of the board has sent urgent letters to all governors in the republic on taking the initiative in serving the national and regional objective of constructing regional stations by setting aside the necessary land for these stations. The letter contains their construction, stating that the land should not be more than 5 km from the center of the provincial city, and should be a good site which would facilitate hooking up public utilities.

The system will send teams of radio engineering experts to the governorates which hasten to respond to the chairman of the board and which want a regional station in their province. The team will inspect the site, judge its suitability and draft the designs for the new station. It will then submit its report to the chairman of the board of directors on the suitability of the site, so that a start can be made in arrangements for implementation. A timetable will be laid down for installation of the antennas for these stations.

The system will install the equipment required for construction of the station after approving the decision of the team on the suitability of the site for construction of a regional station in the governorate. Priority will be given to the governorate which is most responsive to the chairman of the board of directors.

Increasing the Independence of Local Government

Safwat al-Sharif says: "Establishment of these stations will serve a specific philosophy ultimately aimed at accomplishing the hopes of the president about the independent character of local government and the achievement of comprehensive regional development. This philosophy has now become clear in the reorganization of the state, since the president has given the governors all necessary powers and resources of the governorates, so as to marshal all their capabilities toward reconstruction and prosperity in the climate of democracy presently enjoyed by the country."

With regard to the nature of these stations, Safwat al-Sharif says: "They will not be central stations in the usual sense of the term, but will be a product of the environment, addressing themselves to local society and the various segments of the populace in a manner adapted to their culture, customs, traditions and the nature of local work. These stations will differ from one governorate to another, from an agricultural governorate to an industrial governorate, from a governorate with a high educational level to one where there is a great deal of illiteracy, from a society where women use makeup to one where they are still veiled, and from a society with a high artistic level to one which has an illustrious historic cultural background.

These stations will be characterized by their ability to adapt themselves to the society of the region--stations of a new type which do not carry a one-sided media message, but are able to communicate with the man in the street in the region and motivate him to take part in the decision making process.

These stations will combine mass and individual communication. The citizen will hear himself on them, since they will ultimately express his problems, his hopes and his pains, and propel him toward a better future. They will provide an opportunity to play up the talent available in the rural areas in various spheres of life. The talents can glitter on the regional stations and even surpass those of the main station in Cairo in the areas of ideas, literature, art, economy, law, agriculture, industry, etc. In fact, there will be competition between these stations and the mother station in discovering new talents and in the various aspects of the arts which they will present to the masses.

Studies prepared in this regard suggest the construction of a major regional station to be called "Central Delta Regional Station." Its range would cover the governorates of al-Gharbiyah, al-Minufiyah, Kafr al-Shaykh, al-Buhayrah, al-Daqahliqh and Damietta. It would carry 18 hours of programs daily. These would be distributed equally among the 6 governorates, so that each governorate would have 3 hours of programs dedicated to it. These special programs would be channeled through the Central Radio Coordination Office whose experts would set the proper timing of each governorate's programs.

Studies and reports also suggest the possibility of combining two governorates for coverage by 1 station. The two governorates would join hands in drawing up a joint plan for programs beamed to them. This idea would apply to adjacent states. Each station would still have 3 hours of special programs dedicated to it.

The plan also contemplates construction of a major regional radio station in Lower Egypt which would serve the 5 governorates of al-Jizah, al-Sharqiyah, al-Qalyubiyah, Bani Suwayf, and al-Fayyum [al-Jizah, Bani Suwayf and al-Fayyum are in Upper Egypt]. It would carry 15 hours of programs which would be distributed so that each governorate would have its share of 3 hours of special programs.

The plan leaves it up to the governors to decide that each governorate should have its own station, if they do not favor the idea of a major station. The chairman of the board of directors says: "In this regard, the Radio and Television System does not at all object to the idea of establishing a station in each governorate, if the governor provides all necessary facilities to do so to the system. This is especially so, since our objective is that each governorate should have a station, if possible."

The plan seeks to establish seven regional stations in Upper Egypt in al-Minya, Asyut, Sawhaj, Qina, Naja' Hammadi, and Aswan and New Valley. The latter will serve al-Khariyah, al-Dakhihah and al-Bahriyah regions and Baris. There will also be two major stations, the first in the Red Sea governorate, serving the areas of al-Ghardaqah, al-Qusayr and Ra's Gharib, and the second in al-'Arish, serving the Sinai areas.

The Link With the Mother Station

With regard to the link between the regional stations and the mother station in Cairo, Safwat al-Sharif says: The plan is for a link between these stations and Cairo, so that there will be no isolation after construction of these stations. In fact, the plan calls for a sort of tie-in through allocation by the mother station of certain programs for broadcasting by the regional stations. By the same token, some regional programs will be carried by Cairo. In fact, all these stations can join the wavelength of the mother station in Cairo on national occasions or for important events. Moreover, the regional stations will have to avail themselves of the expertise of the mother station with regard to policies, planning, operations, and the social news portion of news programs.

The power of the central station in Cairo will be increased on all wavelengths so as to reach the various regions, so that their people can learn the ideas of Cairo, and so that regional station workers may be able to adapt ideas they like into their own broadcasts. The station of the people will be the central station with regard to the regional stations, because its programs address themselves to all segments of society in the various provinces of Egypt.

CAIRO AIRPORT PLAGUED BY CASES OF FALSE TRAVEL DOCUMENTS

Cairo AL-AHRAM in Arabic 19 Jul 80 p 6

[Article: "Decisive Steps at the Airport To Cope with Wave of Forged Travel Documents Totaling 200 Cases a Month"]

[Text] Strict measures have been taken at Cairo International Airport to cope with a serious wave of forgery of travel documents that has appeared recently. Maj Gen 'Isam al-Ramali, director general of travel documents and migration, and Maj Gen Muhammad al-Manshawi, director of the Port Police Department, have issued instructions to passport officers not to complete action on any passport, unless its holder himself is in front of them when action on the passport is completed. Passport officers are also instructed not to complete action on passports if any airport worker, who has a permit to enter the customs area, tries to assist any traveler in his passport arrangements. This came about after Brig Gen 'Abd al-Ra'uf Hasan, director of passports at the airport, discovered a number of attempts to travel on forged passports with the help of some persons who hold permits to enter the airport and work there.

Airport passport authorities have discovered about 200 cases of forgery in a single month, mostly by persons from rural areas of Egypt traveling abroad, who fell victim to gangs of confidence men. Each victim paid 600 pounds to one of these gangs to obtain a forged certificate of [fulfillment] of military service, or a forged passport, or a personal or family identity card falsifying his age so as to be able to travel abroad.

The new type of passport is expected to put a stop to passport forgery operations.

WORK OF NUCLEAR MEDICINE CENTER EXAMINED

Cairo AL-JUMHURIYAH in Arabic 2 Jul 80 p 6

[Article by Suhayr 'Abd-al-Sattar: "First Nuclear Medicine Center; Diagnosing Cancer, Heart Diseases and Heart Attacks With Atom; Treatment Is Free and at Economic Prices for Able"]

[Text] An Egyptian patient can now have his heart or his kidneys treated and have his ailment diagnosed very accurately.

He can also have any tumors that he may develop, even if they are malignant, diagnosed very accurately. There is no reason for concern. Early discovery, specialized physicians and the right treatment will wipe out the disease.

At a distance of a few steps and in the new building behind the Meridian--the building of the National Nuclear Medicine Center, the patient can, free of charge, reassure himself about his health, can have any disease discovered early and can have the treatment method and procedure determined.

AL-JUMHURIYAH has interviewed the center family on the nature of the center, its work, the meaning of nuclear medicine, how Egypt has entered this sphere and the possibilities of the success of our scientists in this precise branch of medicine.

The interview began with Dr Malmud Mahfuz, the international radiology expert, a former minister of health and the present center chairman.

Dr Mahmud Mahfuz has said: I will not be far from the truth if I say that the National Nuclear Medicine Center is the first of its kind in the Middle East. But how have we brought it up to this degree of capability?

Dr Mahfuz has said that Egypt entered the age of nuclear medicine years ago, but very slowly and more carefully. We had one floor in Qasr al-'Ayni Hospital and had equipment with very limited capabilities. Why?

The center chairman answers: Because the use of the atom in treatment requires highly specialized studies and extremely precise apparatuses that need a building with special specifications. You will find my words to be true when you study the building and its equipment and the system of operation inside it. You will then realize how extremely precise is the equipment and the system of operation inside the building.

Curative Diagnosis

Dr Shawqi al-Haddad, the center deputy chairman who holds the highest degrees of specialization in nuclear treatment and curative diagnosis, takes part in the interview. We can now, says Dr al-Haddad, use the atom successfully in curative diagnosis. We can diagnose with the atom any irregularity in the body's functions. We can, for example, diagnose heart attacks in their early stages. Naturally, any successful treatment depends fundamentally on the successful diagnosis of a disease in its early stages.

Moreover, says the center's deputy chairman, we can use the atom in evaluating the performance of the kidneys or any irregularity in the functions of the heart. We can also measure the glandular hormones, such as those of the thyroid glands or the endocrine glands. We can also discover any abnormal cells in the liver and can determine the right cure immediately in order to protect this regulator of the body's vital functions.

Blockage of Lung Capillaries

As for patients with chest diseases, the blockage of any lung capillaries or the presence of lung pus--which constitute extreme danger to a cancer patient--can also be discovered. An early discovery of such pus through use of the atom helps greatly to follow the right method of treatment.

We then move to the second part of nuclear medicine, namely treatment by radiation. This means the use of the atom for treatment. Dr Shawqi al-Haddad says: We have succeeded in treating a number of diseases by the use of the atom. These were hopeless cases are now improving or on their way to improving, especially cancer patients.

Free Treatment

Dr Shawqi adds that treatment is free daily in the morning only. There is also the system of economic treatment at moderate fees from 1500 to 1700 [daily]. Even though the center is new, nearly 3,000 patients, of whom 1,300 are cancer patients, frequent this center.

The presence of the center makes it unnecessary for a patient to go abroad [for treatment] and saves a lot of foreign currencies that be channelled toward the purchase of more sophisticated equipment to be used in the center. What is important, says Dr Shawqi al-Haddad, is that the equipment that the center has makes it unnecessary for a patient to go abroad for treatment.

[We have] nuclear scanners that determine very accurately the location of tumors in the body and that give the physician an accurate reading of the size of these tumors and, consequently, help him determine the method of treatment at the right time and in the right way.

We also have the (Gamma Camera) apparatus which is the latest apparatus existing in similar European centers. This apparatus is linked to a computer and through it, we can examine any part of the body. The physician can determine the type of disease on a television screen during the examination. He can also notice any irregularity and record it on the computer and can then refer to the data whenever he needs. As for treatment by radiation, Dr al-Haddad says that the radiation laboratory room has actually been set up and equipped with a capacity of 20 million volts of cobalt and that it is the latest in the sphere of tumor treatment. This room will go into operation shortly. These pieces of equipment and others are valued at 3 million pounds. They require constant maintenance and periodic checking because they are extremely sensitive.

Dr Jabir Ziyad, the young Egyptian researcher, then picks up the conversation to say: These apparatuses give the physician a very accurate picture and do not expose the patient to any side effects--such as in the case of some heart diseases for which it is difficult to make an (astra).

Equipment Maintenance

The first problem or issue brought up by the center's physicians and technicians is the issue of maintenance.

Dr Jabir Ziyadah and Engineer 'Abd-al-Halim Ibrahim say that any irregularity in any apparatus requires a specialist that we have to summon from abroad. The same applies to spareparts. The center is exerting efforts at present to provide a team of engineers specialized in maintenance, to train the center physicians on maintenance of the equipment and to encourage innovators to design spareparts for this equipment.

Dr Shawqi al-Haddad, the center's deputy chairman, says that the center makes it conditional when concluding contracts to purchase any apparatus that the company winning the contract have a maintenance center in Egypt.

Dr Hasanah Mustafa says: Nuclear medicine is a new sphere for research and discovery. Therefore, only a truly enthusiastic physician enters this sphere. The team operating the apparatuses is comprised of 3 professors, an assistant professor, 8 instructors, 4 assistant instructors and 36 technicians. This team needs to keep up with the scientific developments constantly. This is available to us because there are agreements with similar centers in the FRG, France, the United States and England. But what surprises Dr Hasanah is that the regulations applying to the workers of the Nuclear Energy Authority do not apply to the workers of this center and that these workers have no material priviliges other than an allowance of 3 pounds [monthly].

Material Temptations

The material [money] problem becomes clearer when presented by Dr Jabir Ziyadah, the instructor at the center:

Regrettably, the lack of any material priviliges stands as a stumbling block in the face of creating a second line or training second and third line cadres to take charge of the center after us. Moreover, we are not allowed to open [private] clinics because nuclear substances can be imported for scientific centers only. Besides, the cost of nuclear equipment is very high.

Medicine Is Sacred Profession

Despite of the center workers' awareness of the material problem, enthusiasm for work in this sphere urges young physicians to join the center. Dr Mamduh Hajjaj, who works in the center, says: I have graduated with an evaluation of "very good" and with a mention in the honor list. I have chosen the field of nuclear medicine because it is new. I know that nuclear medicine is no means for profit [enrichment] but I am satisfied and happy with science.

Cancer Can Be Treated

Dr Muna Najjar, the newest physician in the center, says: My grandfather and grandmother died of cancer. This is why I have the desire to research and to learn about this disease and why I have chosen to work in this field. I have found out that this disease is not a ghoul, as commonly believed. It is a disease like any other and can be treated if the patient sees the specialist at the right time. But unfortunately, some patients are scared by the mere mention of the name of this disease and others go to unspecialized physicians and so lose their chance.

ANALYSIS OF IRAN'S RELATIONS WITH ARAB STATES

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 23 Aug 80 pp 8, 9

[Text] In its analysis of relations between Islamic nations, newspaper LIBERATION writes:

The Iraqis feel that the time for the implementation of "the great plan," which Baghdad had always been thinking of, has finally arrived, this, despite the fact that contemporary history has turned Iraq into an "eternally isolated state." To make its dream come true, Iraq is holding three winning cards. Relying on its huge oil revenue, Iraq had been able to build a strong economy. Enriched uranium, received from France, has turned Iraq into a potential nuclear power. And, finally, the Iraqi army is undoubtedly the best organized army in the Arab world.

These three factors have helped bring Iraq and Saudi Arabia closer to each other on an equal basis. It may not be an exaggeration to claim that they are talking about the existence of a Baghdad-Riad axis which will also include Jordan. This is, in fact, the first step toward a new coalition designed to fight "contagious" Iranian revolution, influenced by the Soviets.

The adoption by Saudi Arabia of a more hostile position against Israel, particularly with regard to the question of the Holy City, it has made it possible for the alliance to remain safe from being accused of being a toy of the United States. At the same time, all indications point to the fact that the Fatah organization, the most important wing of the PLO, which no longer has cordial relations with Damascus, is in favor of the alliance especially now that their forces are locked in Lebanon in fighting with the Shi'ite Moslems of the "Amal" organization who support Iran.

In the long run, Pakistan and Turkey could join the axis, for they pursue the same goal for shrewd reasons. Considering the present deadlock in the Camp David agreements, Egypt could be accepted in the alliance at the price of breaking relations with Israel, which could be justified because of the policy Begin is pursuing at the present time.

Is this a foretelling? Recent turmoil in Libya is, no doubt, related with this change of direction, and recent religious clashes in Syria, where Moslem Brotherhood receive its arms from Saudi Arabia and undergo military training in Jordan, are all connected with this axis.

In this connection, advantage is taken of religion and a Sunni front is created to face the Shi'ite revolution. The Syrian 'Alawites (Hafiz al-Assad is one of them) are some kind of Shi'ites. Israel could disrupt all these arrangements by continuously keeping the tension high at its borders until it reaches the no return point and another war is erupted giving the Soviet Union the chance to return to the area with strength.

These developments will give the two most vulnerable states, meaning Syria and Libya, a good chance for survival. Will Israel go to the aid of the Soviets and its biggest enemies? The time has not yet arrived but politics has strange faces sometimes.

Relations between Syria and Iraq was not good. It is worse now. With the expelling of Syrian diplomats from Baghdad last week on charges of spying, their differences have broken open now.

Damascus expresses regret for the "petty dispute" at a time when "solidarity and common action by Arab states against plots and aggression is vital."

Iraq can say the same thing with the difference that by "plot" and "aggression," Syria means "American imperialism" and "Zionism" but for Iraq it means Iran and the Soviet Union.

In these two cases everything separates Syria and Iraq from one another. Syria is the Soviet ally in the Arab world and has not condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan while Iraq has done so in a strong term.

From the very beginning, Syria supported the Iranian revolution. Iraq took the opposite direction and publicly condemned it. Not a single day passes without border clashes between the two countries and Iraqi leaders have publicly given aid to anti-Khomeyni elements in exile especially to the shah's chief of staff General Oveysi and to former Prime Minister Shapur Bakhtiar.

DEPUTY SPEAKER DISCUSSES ESFAHAN ARCHBISHOP, CIA CONNECTION

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 2 Sep 80 p 15

[Article: "The Office of Bishop of Esfahan Received $500 Million From the CIA for Distribution Among Counterrevolutionaries"]

[Text] During an interview with a reporter of the PARS NEWS AGENCY, 'Ali Akbar Parvaresh, deputy for Esfahan and deputy speaker of the Islamic Consultative Assembly, has placed at his disposal a document concerning the bishopric of Esfahan. In the course of this interview, Parvaresh has stated that religious missionaries were introduced into Iran on England's initiative: they are under joint protection of England and the United States and they place at the disposal of these two countries the results of their spying. He added that documents were disclosed by the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Command in Esfahan that clearly connect this institution with the United States, England and the regime that grabbed Jerusalem. As an example of these documents may serve a letter dated 30 December 1960 sent by the British Embassy to the Bishopric of Esfahan, which mentions Queen Elizabeth as the mother of the Episcopal Churches and recommends emphatically that prayers be said for the President of the United States after church services. In another document connected with the unsuccessful coup d'etat plot in Iran it is said that 500 million American dollars were sent by the CIA to the bishopric to be distributed among counterrevolutionaries.

As regards "bishop Hasan Dehqani," 'Ali Akbar Parvaresh said that he was the priest of the "Luke's" Church, who took advantage of religious feelings of the youth for adverse propaganda and deception of the young people. Since this matter aroused suspicion, the activities of the bishopric were put under surveillance and it became apparent that religious propaganda was only deception and that behind it suspicious political activities were being carried out. Parvaresh showed to the reporter another document connected with espionage involvement of the bishopric and said: Many documents have come to hand concerning basic salaries and allowances that the American Embassy was sending to the missionaries working at the bishopric of Esfahan. There are also documents that relate to the military secrets of Iran such as air bases and naval stations, names of the air force personnel, and technical plans of the Esfahan refinery and the air base of Manjil, obtained by the bishopric and sent to the CIA agents.

Parvaresh added that a document was also obtained that clearly shows a direct connection of the bishopric with the radio and television networks of the United States and England, which actually are broadcasting imperialist and Zionist propaganda. This matter awaits analysis of documents discovered by the Revolutionary Guards Command of Esfahan and if something more will come to light then naturally the government and Majles will have to make firm decisions in the matter.

REAGAN LABELED 'SYMBOL OF FASCISM' BY BANI SADR

Tehran KEYHAN in Persian 16 Aug 80 p 20

/Article: "Bani Sadr: The Candidate for the American Presidency Is a Manifestation of Fascism"/

/Text/ Dr Abol Hasan Bani Sadr, the president, set out for Hamadan at 1000 hours Thursday morning to investigate the problems and issues of the Province of Hamadan.

On his trip to Hamadan, after visiting the Nozzeh Air Base at 1400 hours in the afternoon, our country's president left the site by car.

According to the same report, Dr Bani Sadr subjected this province's problems and issues to discussion in the course of separate sessions with clerics and persons in charge of revolutionary organizations and government departments on Thursday afternoon.

Dr Abol Hasan Bani Sadr then participated in a splendid meeting of the various classes of the people of Hamadan which had been organized at Azadi Stadium in that town.

In this talk, which lasted more than an hour and a half, the president discussed the people's readiness to confront conspirators, order and discipline, respect for the law, the need to establish morale in the country and other matters.

Aggressors Will Have No Refuge But the Grave

In his statements, referring to the remarks by one of the candidates to the American presidency and emphasizing the point that no aggressor will find any place of refuge in our country but the grave, Dr Bani Sadr said, "Usually, in various countries, including our own, armed forces are drawn up in order that there be confidence about domestic security in the face of foreign attacks, but it has very rarely been seen that a people is totally prepared to defend the existence of the country and the government which has come into being through a revolution in order to put up a resistance in the face of the piracies of foreign enemies and their domestic accomplices."

The president added, "Iran today is witnessing the creation of a nation which is prepared to stand in the face of conspiracy and resist with all its being and the participation of each of its individual members."

The president added, "According to the reports we have received and the relatively strong, clear information we have attained, this historic nation's enemies have finally determined to bring us to our knees through conspiracy and agitation. Forces have been readied outside our borders to be used to invade our country."

The Manifestation of Fascism in the Present Era

He went on, "The candidate for the American presidency, a person who perhaps could be said to be a manifestation of fascism in the present era, states in every speech that as soon as he is elected president he will conquer Iran."

The president stressed, "I, as the president of Iran, tell him: If you become the president of America and come to conquer our country, you will acquire in this land a series of graves which have been prepared for the aggressors you send to this land. You don't know anything about the state of Iran; you don't know what hard times this land has gone through and what savage invaders have been brought to their knees in the face of the will and the culture of resistance of this great nation and have been laid to rest in this land's soil. You do not know, and you do not recognize the spirit of these young people."

We Are Decisively Confronting the Conspirators

Referring to his relief that through the will of God and the aid of our people no conspiracy would reach a conclusion, the president said, "I am resolved to confront this conspiracy and I am sure that this resolute spirit exists among all our people. To all those who imagine that they can bring this nation to its knees through conspiracy and agitation and consider themselves the enemy of Iran, and have rushed into the embrace of Iran's enemies, I give notice and warning that these conspiracies will get nowhere. Iran, through the will of God, will remain alive and on its feet and will accept no regime except the regime of the Islamic republic. Iran has been born again through the Islamic republic. Iran, through the Islamic republic, has attained its independence."

In inviting the conspirators to the warm embrace of the nation, the president said, "If they do not respond to this invitation and pursue the conspiracies, they must realize that we have decided to desiccate the roots of every kind of conspiracy and conspirator in this country. We have put tremors and doubts behind us and have become resolved to confront the conspirators once and for all and categorically desiccate them for good as corrupt materials, and our armed forces are prepared today more than in any other period to defend the independence and existence of the republic in the face of every kind of conspiracy."

The Need To Respect the Constitution

At this point the president emphasized, "It is not only necessary for everyone to respect the constitution and carry it out, indeed it is necessary that the various officials of the country and the people who speak to the people observe truth in speech and especially not quote more or less than the statements of anyone who has important responsibilities in the republic. If they want to quote something from a statement by the president, let them quote his subject matter without adding or detracting."

In continuing his statement, emphasizing the maintenance and preservation of Islamic morality, the president declared, "So far, by virtue of the duty I have in accordance with the law and Islamic morality, which must be the guardian of the unity of the people, I have been silent on quotations from my statements which people have made with additions and subtractions, but from now on I will reject this approach because if a subject is quoted from the president's statements and that subject is not correct, the people will fall into error and this error could later cause a loss of confidence among the people. Loss of confidence in these historic, determining moments is not something which I as president can fail to note."

The president added, "Public opinion, the will of the people, and the fact that they must know the whole truth and not half the truth, which is the biggest of lies, prevent the people's confidence on those who have governmental and non-governmental responsibilities in the three powers, the executive, legislative and judiciary, from growing weak, failing which our republic will lose the basic ingredient of survival and victory which is you the people, and your attention and your protection. Therefore I hope that this issue will be regarded as a serious warning by everyone and from now on no subject will arise where I should be compelled to correct a statement, not to mention deny it. I must state that several of these subjects have arisen during these past few days and I am not talking at present but I hope that those who have stated half my words or have stated them inaccurately and want to attain their own ends will hear this statement and realize that to the point where I can state my words to the people I will do so and will not remain heedless regarding these acts."

Stressing the importance of breaking dead ends and advancing the Islamic republic and referring to the problems of the town of Hamadan, Dr Bani Sadr then said, "The problem of your town is the problem of all the towns of Iran and the reasons for them have also become determined and clear. There are forces, and there are forces relying on these groups, and if we want to break the barriers and dead ends we must turn these forces, which now have inhibited the road to progress and movement for the forces of progress and construction through destructive activities."

Security and the Economy Are Our Basic Problem

Referring to the point that, according to a poll which had been taken, the two basic problems of security and economics are among our basic problems and the people must constantly seek from officials the reason why problems and difficulties have not been solved, the president said, "We cannot keep these two problems ambiguous and not state why these two problems have not yet been solved. If the problem of security is not solved, there are assuredly reasons for it. If matters which must be carried out in the context of the economy if Iran is to obtain its economic independence are not resolved, that certainly has a reason and cause--why aren't these reasons and causes being subjected to serious discussion before the people?

"These whys must exist in the minds of all the people and the officials must be asked to come and give answers to these whys. One must ask what forces, whether intrinsic or foreign, are inhibiting the stability of this republic. If these issues are not explained, you the people will become a nation engaged in peripheral, false issues to make you forget your basic problems so that you will not be aware of the basic problems of your country. Therefore, if you have problems and issues from the security and economic standpoint in your own town, you must raise them so that they will be subjected to appraisal in your own presence, so that you yourselves will know why our country is not traveling on the road toward construction in the manner it ought to be and why defense security is not being established."

Referring to the point that one of the most important ingredients of security is that the ruling forces not overstep the limits of the law, the president said "The condition for the establishment of security is that the republican forces be bound to the law and not speak, not wish and not accept what is above or in excess of the law."

The Conditions for Creating Security and Solving the Problem of the Economy

The president added, "If the people's attention is not drawn and attracted toward morale, people's hearts are not united, the social groundwork for discrimination and inequality is not eliminated, and many other ifs, the economy will not get moving nor will real security come into existence."

Referring to the point that a good government is the government which begins first with itself, the president then said "We cannot state that because we need the institutions which existed before and after the revolution we must close our eyes to their errors. The importance of security has constantly been exhibited by the people in the course of 18 months. There is no criterion in which the first subject which is the object of the people's attention is not security and the economy, otherwise what is necessary to establish the republican regime firmly and what the people want cannot be carried out, and, if we want to get the economy moving, security is necessary and the security that that requires should not be combined with tyranny. It should not be the security of the previous regime--rather, it should be security combined with freedom, so that the morale of our people, religion and morality in society will become clearer to our people every day and will govern their acts more strongly."

In another portion of his speech, the president said "Why are you, who are so concerned about purging a given organization of one or several satanic employees, careless about purging your own social environment? Why don't you purge this environment of rancors, contradictions and hypocrisies? Why do you allow small groups which want to to weaken our republic by weighting down the atmosphere with contradiction and enmity? Why do we not purge our social environment? Why don't you promote the culture of unification in your own society? Therefore if you really want to conduct a purge you must keep the social environment of your won life clean most of all. You should abandon all harsh conduct, all vindictive conduct and all hypocritical actions and strive to create a sound social environment which will be able to bear the burden of the weightier duties of the age."

Continuing his statement, referring to administrative problems and issues and the people's complaints against agencies, the president said, "The people in charge of the administrative agencies say 'They don't let us work' and when I ask who and why they don't, they say 'when we want to work and solve a problem those secret hands come of the sleeve and hit us so hard they paralyze us.' One of our most significant dead ends is that devout, enthusiastic, sincere responsible people come and engage in work but cannot give in to all the expectations of groups and individuals in order to work. Essentially there is a contradiction between working well for everyone and working badly for individuals and groups. When an official wants to work for all the people of a town it is possible that a clash might arise with such individuals and groups."

Parliamentary Representatives Do Not Have the Right To Interfere in Executive Matters

The president then referred to the point that "I said in parliament and say here also that representatives in parliament do not have the right to interfere in executive matters."

He added, "Nobody must act as a representative for departments under the title of your representative, just as the executive agencies do not have the right to interfere in the activities of the legislative power. If there is interference in duties, as the emam's message stated and as historical experience has also proved, the administrative and executive agency will be paralyzed and then the people's affairs will remain suspended."

In responding to the people's slogans of "reveal, reveal," referring to the importance of the role of truthful revelation based on fact, the president stated, "Whenever I consider it appropriate, as you have seen in the past, I will come and tell you everything. It is clear that in the face of all the domestic and foreign forces which are against us, our only strength, beyond the grace of God, as a manifestation of the grace of God, is the force of you the people; your force is in your unity, your unity is in your awareness, and your awareness is in the revelations of actual fact. Revelation is different from labelling, insulting and agitating."

Throughout the president's speech, the people, stating "God is great, long live Bani Sadr, Bani Sadr, Bani Sadr, we will protect you, Bani Sadr, reveal and we will protect you," in reaffirming the president's speech, expressed feelings regarding him.

Likewise, at a meeting in the presence of Dr Abol Hasan Bani Sadr, the president, with the participation of the officials of Bu Ali Sina University of Hamadan, the problems and issues of this university were subjected to investigation and exchanges of views Thursday evening.

REPORTER ANALYZES IRANIAN SITUATION

Athens TO VIMA in Greek 17 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by M. N. Raptis]

[Text] The greatest danger for the besieged Iranian Revolution continues to come from the preparations and plans of the Western countries and the conservative Arab regimes in the explosive area of the Persian Gulf. When we talk about the Westerners, we should distinguish between North Americans on the one hand and Europeans on the other.

Both the former and the latter now desire and are preparing for the quick end of Khomeini in Iran and of the Islamic Revolution. But they differ in the means for achieving this goal.

On the one hand, immediately after their presidential elections, and assuming the burning question of their hostages will not have been solved at least by then, the North Americans are figuring on going over once again to purely military operations against Iran.

And this will be done not only from their bases in the Indian Ocean and their fleet at the entrance to the Persian Gulf, but also in combined operations with certain Arab countries, beginning with Egypt, of course. But recently the new Iraq-Saudi Arabia axis has intervened in these plans--an alignment which is being promoted especially by the Europeans, including France and Germany. The Europeans would prefer the fall of Khomeini to be the result of action by the Arabs, behind which the members of the Atlantic Alliance could hide. Whereas the Americans are trying to have the Arabs be more or less their rear-guard, so that the fall of Khomeini can be seen as tantamount to the dominance of American leadership in the sector of petroleum once again.

On the other hand the Frenchmen and the Germans, who are now seeking as well a political and even military "united Europe," would prefer to give prominence to the conservative Arabs--especially the Iranian and Saudi ones--within the framework of their new international strategy.

This strategy aims at a priveleged association between a "united Europe" and the Arab and African countries, thus thrusting aside to some extent America's influence over these countries.

The weaknesses of the Islamic Revolution in Iran are being exploited to the utmost now by the Westerners in order to conceal and justify their aggressive plans and their feverish preparations for their conclusive attack against the Khomeini regime.

But this person is still counting on the inexhaustible revolutionary potential of Iran, which--assuming a finally open military intervention--will surely manifest itself in the form of a general armed uprising against the invaders. Reliable observers maintain that the Westerners and the conservative Arab regimes are grievously mistaken if they now believe that "chaos" prevails in Iran and that the regime is collapsing. "Chaos" does exist, but it is a matter of the special unavoidable chaos of every great revolution in the phase of its continuing tempestuous development.

Despite its "Islamic" excesses, which deprive it of valuable allies, the Khomeini regime continues to be able to mobilize millions of the masses against imperialism whenever it chooses. The plebian masses of the country, poor people of the cities and countryside, as well as a very significant portion of the women and youth, do not view these Islamic excesses through the spectacles of the Westerners, but rather as a return to the springs of their particular national culture, as a very valuable revelation and gaining of their specific national and cultural individuality.

The Western nations should understand that our world continues to be very profoundly heterogenous in terms of its values, its ideals, and its ways of thinking, which is the result of a one-sided competitive development over the centuries.

Very profound and dangerous misunderstandings, and even veritable mutual unintelligibility between the different cultures, emerge from this situation.

The chief characteristic of the present phase of the Iranian Revolution is not the dominance of Islamism in the form represented by the Islamic Republic Party of Ayatollah Beheshti, which in any case is a weak dominance, but rather its strongly anti-imperialistic dimension, which is supported by the overwhelming majority of the plebian masses.

Perhaps only the Soviets understand this reality. And perhaps for this reason they will win ultimately the fight for Iran--a battle of worldwide strategic significance.

The Soviets are waiting, untroubled and almost with certitude, for their chance in Iran. Within the country their party, the Tudeh, calmly continues to give 100-percent support to the regime of Khomeini, despite the constant attacks and persecutions which it suffers. Abroad, Moscow is following a more complex policy. On the one hand, it is strengthening its military positions in Afghanistan, which it is definitely not going to abandon, as well as along the border with Iran, so as to be fully prepared at any moment to deal with the consequences which would result, for example, from an invasion of this country by the Western nations. But at the same time it is continuing to strengthen Iraq with arms, which is the chief enemy of the Khomeini regime in the Arab and Moslem sphere. Thus it is maintaining a constant, ingeniously applied pressure on this regime, which is now inclined to intensify its anti-Soviet campaign within the framework of its more general anti-Imperialist fight.

A struggle by Khomeini on three fronts, against the Westerners, the conservative Arabs, and the Soviets, seems hopeless and pointless. But no great revolution "thinks logically," having above all confidence in its own powers and in the influence which it can exert on the relevant international sector.

Khomeini, who continues to be the true Bonaparte of the centralist Jacobin policy of authority in the country, as the super-arbitrator between its various socio-political movements, is counting on the uprising of the Moslem plebian and anti-imperialist masses in countries such as Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt in case of foreign military intervention in Iran. Perhaps here he is laboring under a slight delusion, even though the armed uprising of the Iranian masses against any invasion or internal reactionary coup must be considered to be more or less certain and inevitable. Because aside from the enormous authority which Khomeini himself retains at all times, one should also consider the following factor which has been systematically ignored by the Westerners: In the state of affairs as it now exists in Iran, there is not yet a unique centralized State authority. There continues to exist an immense network of "committees" in the factories, in the neighborhoods, and in the villages, which is largely autonomous and able to mobilize millions of armed individuals at a moment's notice. This is the chief strength of the revolution.

It is against this that the future coup leaders or foreign invaders, or the two in conjunction, will have to fight. In a few months at most, the curtain will rise on a new bloody episide of the Iranian Revolution. The polymorphous foreign and domestic counter-revolution will inevitably and fatally venture to bring Iran back under the control of the West. With them, "peaceful coexistence" is ruled out. It is then also that the hour will chime for new developments in Soviet policy. In Iran, the fate not only of Khomeini's style of "Islamic Revolution," but also more generally of "peace" or war in our world, is being gambled. But perhaps also the fate of the revolution itself, which at some moment will need to cast off its personal, transitional garment of Islamic cassocks and black chadors.

FREEDOM MOVEMENT TO BE REVIVED BY FORMER PREMIER

Paris NAME-YE RUZ in Persian 20 Aug 80 p 7

[Text] In an interview, former prime minister and present Majles representative, Mehdi Bazargan, talking about Nazih, said: "I should talk about three Nazihs, the present-day Nazih, Nazih as managing-director of the NIOC and the Nazih of prerevolution era. All his friends in the Freedom Movement, members of the provisional government and myself condemn the present-day Nazih, believing that his activities are contrary to the Islamic principles and humanity and defies simple logic."

During the period he served as managing-director of the NIOC, Nazih was able, despite all the odds and problems that existed at that time, to get the work done and run his organization, even though he was not free from criticism, some of which I did bring to his attention.

In prerevolution era, Nazih had cooperated with Dr Mosaddeq and was the architect of the open letter by the Freedom Movement to the shah, the very same letter that many people would not have even dared to read at that time. He also had cooperated in the year preceding the revolution and after the revolution had become victorious.

Regarding Admiral Madani and Ayat, Bazargan said: "Madani did not appear before the Majles and I believe that was his greatest mistake. He should have appeared before the Majles and defended himself, like three other representatives. Had he appeared before the Investigating Committee, like the other three, who defended themselves and their credentials were approved, it is possible that his credential would have been approved too.

"About Mr Ayat, I must say that I did not know him and my knowledge about him came from what I had read about him in newspapers and from the report prepared by the Investigating Committee. Later on I abstained from voting when his case was put to vote."

In conclusion, the former prime minister said that Freedom Movement will be revived with a much better organization than before.

On cooperation with the leftist groups, Bazargan said: "Already there is a friendly and close cooperation. Their cooperation with us depends on how much time they are going to have. There are no sound bases for that." He added that there will be a newspaper, directly or indirectly. [sic] He said that most of the Freedom Movement members had held positions in the provisional government and had pledged themselves to the imam not to take part in any party activities.

'TOUGH MEASURES' AGAINST ISRAEL DEMANDED BY IRAN

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 16 Aug 80 p 10

[Text] The Foreign Ministry announced in a notice that the severance of relations with Israel's friends is not sufficient. In this notice the Foreign Ministry announced its positions vis-a-vis countries friendly to Israel in connection with the declaration of Jerusalem as Israel's capital. The text of the notice is as follows:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. As the Zionists' greedy desires soar to the so-called legalization of their aggressions in Jerusalem and the declaration of Jerusalem as Israel's capital, the government of the Islamic Republic of Iran has taken initiative in the international arena and has repeatedly announced its positions based on the complete rejection of this aggression. In particular it has announced its positions in sessions of the Conference of Islamic States and the United Nations which were convened in order to examine this problem and the national rights of the Palestinian nation. Unfortunately some Islamic countries have tried and are trying, vis-a-vis this plot, to threaten those persons supporting Israel's decision solely with the severance of diplomatic relations.

At the head of this plot is the fascist government of Iraq, which in words has always raised an uproar and displayed itself as revolutionary, and in actions has cooperated with and helped reactionaries and U.S. imperialism. The experience of recent years has shown that Iraq, in spite of not having visible diplomatic relations with the United States, has spared no effort in cooperation with the reactionaries and accomplices of the United States, and has always plotted against and continues to plot against those who are battling the United States. Examples of this are the murders of Palestinian leaders by its agents in recent years; the hostility it has displayed to the Islamic Republic of Iran and the anticolonialist Arab nations; the great effort it made to support the deposed shah's rule during its fall; the bringing of Farah Pahlavi's puppet show to Iraq; and the restrictions it brought about on Iran's revolutionary leader, leading eventually to his expulsion from Iraq. It even brought pressure of Kuwait's government to not accept him. However, God willing, an enemy can become a source of good. "They deceive, and deceive God, and God will give the deceivers their bounty" [Koranic verse]; the revolution was victorious.

The Foreign Ministry of the Islamic Republic of Iran has shown its positions in confrontation with this plot. It reminds you that the severance of diplomatic relations with Israel's friends is not sufficient. The economic channels to those who aid Israel must also be closed. Therefore the Islamic Republic of Iran calls for the revision of trade with Israel's friends, halting the export of strategic goods such as petroleum, and the removal of financial investments from countries friendly to Israel, the United States foremost among them. The Islamic Republic of Iran believes that this parasitical growth can be destroyed only by cutting the lines of nourishment. Therefore, it once again warns the Islamic community that severance of diplomatic relations with those governments which recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel is necessary, but not sufficient, and that if this action is enough for them, it is nothing other than a cover-up of their cooperation with Israel's friends.

BEHESHTI'S COMMENTS ON NEW CABINET, MESSAGE TO IRELAND

Tehran ETTELA'AT in Persian 16 Aug 80 p 10

[Text] According to a report from a PARS NEWS AGENCY reporter, Dr Beheshti, in reply to a question about activities of opposition groups and espionage organizations against the Islamic Republic of Iran, said: You observe that I have received no special report about details of this sort of activity, either outside or inside Iren. But as you know, great opposition exists to our Islamic revolution in Iran... These activities are only a part of our enemies' plots, particularly those of the United States, some European countries and eastern and western countries, against the victorious Iranian revolution. But our extraordinary good fortune is that our people are sufficiently aware of the plots of these enemies. I hope that the enemies of the Iranian Islamic revolution will realize that they have no chance whatsoever for acceptance in the Iranian nation.

Ayatollah Beheshti, in reply to a question about his message to the people of Ireland, a people who attach great importance to their religion, and who are in a good position for actions against the superpowers which have put them under pressure for some time, said: All people do not necessarily have to follow one special path. Fundamentally we believe that people must move in the right path. However, as long as faith in religion can place vital instruction of a special order based on faith in God in the hands of people, people may follow that path.

I do not know if the Christians of Ireland can display such an order and system or not. My message to the Irish people was that they intensify their efforts in the struggle against imperialism and for the purpose of preserving their land and people. I hope that the Irish people will be victorious in the near future.

The president of the Supreme Court, in reply to a question about whether Iran will establish normal relations with countries which halt support for imperialists and their decisions, said: In order to acquaint them with the Islamic revolution it is possible that even offices in these countries will be inaugurated.

Dr Beheshti, while pointing to the probable composition of the future cabinet, said: Usually the prime minister must freely select all the ministers, and afterwards the president officially confirms the ministers one by one. For this task they (the prime minister and the president) will have a sort of agreement in this area.

It was asked whether or not Majles representatives can become ministers at the present time.

Ayatollah Beheshti replied: They cannot be representatives and ministers at the same time. But they can leave their Majles seat to take a ministerial post, and afterwards, if they do not wish to continue their work as ministers, they can return to the Majles. However, this matter requires a new law. Ayatollah Beheshti, in reply to the question as to whether or not Raja'i, the prime minister, will consult with the Islamic Republican Party in the selection of his cabinet's ministers, said: We will ask all Islamic revolutionary groups, including the Islamic Republican Party, to give their recommendations in this area.

ETHNIC PARTIES GIVEN LITTLE CHANCE IN ELECTIONS

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 17 Jul 80 p 4

[Article by Avi Bettelheim: "Under Existing Electoral Methods There Is Little Chance for Ethnic Lists"]

[Text] Eliahu Elyashar, chairman of the Sephardic List (which won four seats in the first Knesset and two in the second) and for many years the president of the Sephardic Committee in Jerusalem, is the father of the ethnic party in Israel, and one of its success stories, until now, in the attempt of ethnic parties to gain seats in the Knesset.

Most of the attempts have failed. From the third Knesset until today, no ethnic party has succeeded in winning a seat in the Israeli legislative body.

The Sephardic List and the Yemenite Union have not succeeded in making the cutoff point in Knesset elections (the Yemenites had one seat in the first two Knessets).

In elections for the fourth Knesset, the "North African Likud," the "Sephardic National Party," the "National Sephardic Union," and the "Yemenite Faction" all failed.

"The Religious Sephardic Party" failed in elections for the fifth Knesset; "Young Israel, Sepharadim and Oriental Communities" failed in their attempt to get into the sixth Knesset, and in the race for the seventh Knesset no ethnic party won a seat.

Four ethnic parties failed in their attempt to get into the eighth Knesset: the "Yemenite List in Israel," "the Blue and White Panthers," "the Black Panthers," and the "Democratic Israelis." Failing in their bid for the ninth Knesset were "Bay Yisrael--the League of Yemenites"; "the Zionist Panthers"; and "Khofesh" headed by Shalom Kohen.

Eliahu Elyashar, who is 81 years old, says that under the present electoral method, there is no hope for the ethnic party, principally because of the absence of personal contact between the voter and the one elected. "As early as 1935, I demanded the introduction in Israel of a regional, personal, majority electoral method. I claimed then, as I do now, that such a method will lead to national unity. The one elected will have to pay attention to his region, and to be concerned with his voters. If this method were to be introduced, I would not care if all 120 Knesset members were ashkenazim, because this method would force them to work. If they did not work, they would not be re-elected."

Yehuda Toledano, chairman of the "oded" movement, does not see any prospect for the ethnic party "because the public which has to vote for them does not want to cut off its national membership. At the moment of casting his vote, the voter from a poor neighborhood prefers Israel, and only after his neighborhood. This is the reason that "Oded" has not raised the ethnic banner." Toledano also fears that as a result of the social deterioration in Israel, the ethnic party may find itself drawn into a violent and dangerous struggle. Following the failure of several ethnic parties in elections for the eighth Knesset, their chiefs adopted a new tactic: integration within existing parties, and conducting a socio-ethnic struggle from within. Charlie Biton entered Rakah as a representative of the panthers; Sa'adia Merciano joined the Sheli camp; Mordekhai Algarbeli and Viktor Tayar joined Dash.

Yet even this attempt did not prove itself. Beyond internal disputes, crises, and splintering, the representatives of the ethnic movements did not succeed in changing things. The extent of their success in solving social problems by means of legislation was very limited.

"All of those activists who represented the ethnic parties, at the moment that they entered the Knesset were swallowed up by the larger parties, and they became more Catholic than the Catholics themselves," says Eliahu Elyashar with some bitterness.

Mordekhai Ben-Porat was a past Knesset member on behalf of the Alinement and Rafi, and was among the leaders of the Iraqi Immigrants Union who ran in the last Knesset elections on the "Ze" list--the Movement for Social-Zionist Renaissance" (which did not make the cutoff point). Mordekhai Ben-Porat adds: "The integration of activists of the ethnic movement in existing parties is not effective. The Knesset operates on the basis of pressure groups. Justice and values do not walk on two feet, but rather according to the number of raised hands."

Ben-Porat's solution: "Some serious people in the country must rise to organize a movement on the basis of meeting face to face social and economic problems. I am sure that such a body could attract a lot of votes. All of the neighborhood people who in 1977 were sure that Begin and Likud would save them would now vote for such a body, on the condition that it be a serious body. The ethnic parties which have appeared so far in Israel--with the exception of Eliahu Elyashar's movement--have not been serious."

"I am a citizen of the country. I am an Israeli, and I am not ashamed of the fact that I am Morrocan," says MK Algarbeli ("Oded"). "The state of Israel has given the orientals the right to vote, but it still does not understand that the oriental communities have their own Berl Katznelson." The heads of this new social-political movement hasten to add that they speak of a Zionist party open to every man of conscience. "It is not an ethnic party," emphasize Algarbeli, Merciano, and Savisa, who two days ago convened their people at...Lichtenstein House.

GOVERNMENT SEEKS TO FURTHER CAUSE IN U.S.

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 14 Jul 80 p 5

[Article by Yuval Elitsur: "Elections in America and Promises in Israel"]

[Text] After last week's cabinet session, a short communique was issued which aroused particular interest among foreign correspondents: it was reported that the cabinet had conducted a short discussion regarding the exploitation of elections in the U.S. to advance Israel's interests, and it was decided to hand over the subject to one of the committees.

The idea that the electoral wars in the U.S. present an opportunity which appears only once in four years to gain for Israel explicit promises from candidates for the American presidency, on issues which are essential to Israel, is not a new idea. The new twist is that this time the Israeli government is doing less and talking more.

It may be assumed that when the electoral season and the conventions of the two large parties in the U.S. draw nigh, the Israeli foreign minister--perhaps with the advice of the prime minister--would issue instructions to the Israeli embassy in Washington regarding the most important objectives for Israel to accomplish in the following months. Embassy workers would establish direct contacts with members of Congress, or by means of Jewish leaders, so as to clarify what was "pressing" Israel, and what Israel expected of its friends in both political parties. These would be sophisticated contacts, in which the two sides would understand one another, without declarations, and sometimes without even direct contact between them.

We do not know if ever in the past the Israeli cabinet explicitly discussed this issue, for the ministers would be alert to the danger that the Israeli government would be accused of intervention in the U.S. elections, and so these things were not publicized. What is certain is that in the past, the issue occupied formulators of Israeli policy to a greater extent than today when they are preoccupied with other problems. The very fact that Minister of Religion, Aharon Abu-Khatsira, saw fit to raise the issue at a cabinet session raises the suspicion that there was an oversight of this issue, which in the past would have been obvious.

The four day visit of John Anderson, one of the three candidates, last week in Israel proves that more than ever, the American candidates are sensitive to Israel's desires and to the positions of its friends in the U.S. Anderson's visit constitutes a precedent: never before has such a visit been made by a candidate, such a short time before election day. The success of the visit, which might also bring to us the Republican candidate, Ronald Reagen, could mark the beginning of a tradition.

Every expert on electoral affairs in the U.S. knows that a candidate has never won the presidency without victory in the two key states of California and New York. President Carter lost both states in the democratic primaries. The victor in both was his opponent, Senator Edward Kennedy. If the president loses both of these states in the general elections, his prospect of re-election is very slim. Similarly, the prospects of Ronald Reagen will be reduced if most of the voters in California and New York vote for John Anderson or for Jimmy Carter.

This is the importance of the "Jewish vote" in the elections this year. Nationally, the Jewish vote constitutes no more than 4 or 5 percent of the total voting public, but in New York their weight approaches 20 percent of the total, a not insignificant amount in that key state.

In contrast to what is believed in Israel, the candidates in the U.S. do not like to spread around promises, especially if they believe that they will win and will have to deliver on the promises. They are forced into making declarations, so as not to trail their opponents. This year there is a feeling that in spite of the importance of the Jewish vote, the candidates will be more restrained than ever in making promises for Israel. The fact that the U.S. did not exercise its veto in the UN Security Council vote on Jerusalem, without provoking the outrage of the Republican or independent candidate, and the fact that the two other candidates did not jump on President Carter when it became known that he intended to authorize (after the election) the sale of sophisticated equipment for F-15 planes in Saudi Arabia, should have lit a warning light for us.

Even John Anderson, whose promises require less, has been careful in his expressions, even while he was in Jerusalem. The transfer of the American embassy to Jerusalem? Yes, but only after the vision of the end of days is realized, and the peace process in the Middle East comes to full fruition. The area in which the friends of Israel can change this disturbing trend of restraint in expression, and open a competition which calls for candidates' promises, is particularly in the area of aid and economic cooperation. In these areas, the candidates are less exposed to criticism for spreading "irresponsible" promises in terms of U.S. interest in the Middle East, and they also risk less opposition pressure from oil companies and business men. In Israeli terms, promises in this area could be of more practical significance than theoretical declarations on political issues which can have varying interpretations immediately after the candidate assumes the office of president.

The "obligations" with respect to Israel, the economic issues where the declarations of the candidates can be of great importance, and where the prospects of implementation are much greater, must include: a plan for "erasing debts"; the possibility of a transfer of technology, especially in the defense industry; American government aid in the development (jointly) of an airplane, and of other weapons systems; and American government support for research in the area of energy and the establishment of nuclear power stations in Israel. Likewise, Israel must exploit this non-recurring opportunity to salvage its oil agreement with the U.S. and to extract from each of the candidates a clear declaration that if Israel will have to pay a particularly high price for its oil, this will be equivalent to oil being unavailable, and the U.S. will have to supply oil to Israel.

During the Nixon period, Israel obtained from the presidential candidate a promise of long term economic aid. This turned out to be an empty promise; Congress had to authorize every dollar of aid. It is much easier to operate in the area of reducing the burden of loan repayment, which will leave in Israeli hands much greater sums for the development of its economy. It is not seemly for Israel to raise such a suggestion, but it would be different if such a proposal were to come from one of the presidential candidates.

Similarly, every one of the ideas proposed here have enormous importance for Israel and significant prospects of being realized, if included in the platform of one or the other of the candidates, or what is even more desirable--if included in the platforms of all of the candidates.

HARD-LINE POLICY SEEN ENCOURAGING EXTREMISM

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 15 Jul 80 p 11

[Article by Yehuda Litani: "Operation: 'The Fate of Eretz Yisra'el'"]

[Text] To the observer of events in the Territories it seems as of late, that most of the processes which took place in the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip during the 3 years of the Likud government administration, are about to intensify and become sharper in the final year of this session of the government. Both sides (Jews and Arabs) sense that the period up to the coming elections of the Knesset is an exceedingly important period--almost fateful.

This sense is particularly acute on the part of the head of the government, Menahem Begin, and his following in the government and in the Likud. As far as they are concerned, the period from now to the elections is a period of struggle over the "fate of Eretz Yisra'el."

New Settlements

Regarding the chairman of the ministerial committee for settlement affairs Ariel Sharon, the "struggle for Eretz Yisra'el," focuses on the establishment of more and more settlements for the purpose of whose construction more and more land must be expropriated. Despite reductions in the budgets of the government ministries, Ariel Sharon is planning to establish many settlements this coming year. This month alone, the bulldozers are scheduled to begin work in preparation of the land for 2 new settlements in the Katif Block in the Gaza Strip. In the near future, setting up construction of a third settlement in this block will begin, likewise, the establishment of a regional center for the Katif Block, which is situated mainly on government lands and these are not in abundance in the Gaza Strip. The residents of the Gaza Strip, headed by Mayor Rashad al-Shawa argue that the reserve of government lands should be utilized for the needs of the inhabitants of the Gaza Strip and particularly for the rehabilitation of refugees, whereas the government of Israel is taking this minuscule reserve for its own purposes.

Ariel Sharon's plan includes establishment of a block of settlements (in addition to the 3 that are to be established in the upcoming weeks, the Minister of Agriculture wishes to set up at least another 3-4 settlements in this block--all this in addition to the 3 settlements which presently exist in this block) in the form of an "L" in the south of the Gaza Strip. The block will be joined to Israel by a system of north-south roads. The plan to expand this block is intended mainly to create a buffer zone between Egypt and the Gaza Strip which will return--in accordance with the agreement with Israel--in approximately another 2 years to the international boundary. Similarly, Ariel Sharon is planning to establish at least another 2 Israeli settlements in the north of the Gaza Strip, adjacent to its border with Israel.

Additional settlements (totalling 6) will be established in accordance with the plan of the chief of the settlement department in the Jewish Agency, Matityahu Drobles, in the Jericho Corridor, with the aim of sealing the corridor against the possibility of its transfer to Jordan which was intended to create a physical connection between Jordan and East Jerusalem. The first settlement in this corridor is now in the final stages of work, and it will shortly be transferred to the settlers. Similarly, new settlements are planned during the coming year in the south of Mount Hebron, on both sides of the Green Line, in the northwest of the West Bank, in the heart of Samaria and in the Ufra area northeast of Ramallah (where during the coming weeks 2 new settlements are to be established).

As usual, the question remains if indeed all of the plans are to be carried out, since they are presently on paper only. However, even if only half of the planned settlements are established, this will be an important achievement for the government--in its own eyes, of course. The goal for the coming year is to firmly establish more settlements. As a result, less attention will be given to planning and to the actual prospects for the duration of settlement over the long range. Ariel Sharon--as well as Menahem Begin and his cohorts--believes that every additional settlement is an additional barrier to the partition of the country.

Likewise on the matter of the transfer of the prime minister's office to East Jerusalem. Although the U.S. ambassador in Israel, Samuel Lewis, threatened during a dialogue with the prime minister that both he and his colleagues from Britain and Germany will be unable to meet with the prime minister of Israel in his office in East Jerusalem, preparations for the transfer have not been halted (perhaps because Mr Begin knows that in the end the ambassadors of the West will be forced to go there if they wish to speak with him). The prime minister reacted sharply to the "advice" of the British foreign minister, Lord Carrington not to transfer his office to East Jerusalem. When King David transferred his capital from Hebron to Jerusalem--said Mr Begin--the civilized world had not yet heard of a city named London. This sharp retort of the prime minister, while he was still in the hospital, is evidence of the intractability of the decision to transfer his office to East Jerusalem into the building whose construction was recently completed.

In the Supreme Court the petition of the East Jerusalem (Jordanian) Electric Company against the government of Israel, to prevent the government of Israel's domination of the company, is being considered. The petitioners allege that Israel wishes to take control of the company in order to control the sources of energy of the prospective autonomous region. In their view, this is another symbol which the current government wishes to break down. The company represented a specific independence to the Arab inhabitants of the city. This is the sole venture in Jerusalem managed and operated by Arabs, and now--they allege--Israel has taken it too.

The Solution: A Flogging Stick

In addition to all this Israel has, in recent months, been taking a hard line with the Territories. Three personages from the Mount Hebron area have been deported. The military government prevents political meetings among the mayors and members of the Committee for National Direction, and prevents meetings among persons in the Gaza Strip and on the West Bank. Houses are being blown up. It appears that even this process will continue and will intensify since the present government has no positive solution--to resolve the matter of autonomy--on the issue of inhabitants of the Territories, and nothing is easier than utilization of the flogging stick.

The mayor of Nablus, Bassam Shak'a, said on Saturday--in remarks he made to the members of the professional societies of his city--that the Israeli authorities are at a loss. His perception is that the attacks upon himself and Karim Khalaf (both of whom accuse the government of Israel with responsibility for the attacks upon them) demonstrated this loss. It appears as if every hard line policy and every attack on him only serves to increase Bassam Shak'a's self-confidence, and the tone of his proclamations become sharper from one time to the next. Bassam Shak'a is now top leader in the occupied Territories--not only since his maiming--particularly because of the Shak'a incident: the decision of the Israeli authorities to deport him and the nullification of that decision. In Bassam Shak'a's opinion, his deportation was prevented because of the "proud stance" of the West Bank's inhabitants. Due to the strong arm policy adopted by the military government, the extremists (of the ilk of Shak'a and Khalaf) are becoming even more extreme, and the moderates (of the ilk of Elias Frij) must "straighten up" in accordance with the new line and take a more extreme line.

Since the success of the petitioners from the village of Rujayb to evacuate the settlers of Elon Moreh from their lands, hundreds of petitions have been submitted to the Supreme Court, particularly from rural areas of Judea and Samaria. It appears now as if the number of petitions from inhabitants of the villages to the Supreme Court will increase--from both Ariel Sharon's plans to establish new settlements as well as from the conclusions of the committee under his leadership, which investigated the situations of the lands in 8 settlements, and decided to expand them.

Against the foreign television cameras and the searching eyes from the Western countries (and particularly the U.S., Britain and France) the struggle in the Territories will continue between the establishers of the settlements on the one hand, and the owners of the lands on the other. Despite the strong arm policy and the flogging stick, agitation is increasing in the Territories. The severe outcome of all this is the serious crumbling within the camp of the moderates in the Territories.

It is difficult to believe that an accretion of settlements, transfer of government agencies to East Jerusalem and failure of the autonomy talks will prevent the partition of the land of Israel in the long run. It is clear that (because of those) during the coming year, the already tense atmosphere between the Jews and the Arabs in the land of Israel will be fouled.

SINAI GIVEAWAY AND SETTLEMENT POLICY DEPLORED

Tel Aviv DAVAR in Hebrew 24 Jul 80 p 7

[Article by Ehud Ben-Ezer: "Two Time Bombs--West Bank and Gaza"]

[Text] The Likud administration is leaving behind it two time bombs on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip. The one, which practically is unrelated to the administration, but which the administration has done a great deal to strengthen, and the second--almost entirely within the purview of the administration, and also because of which all of us shall suffer.

The first time bomb is the Arabs of the Territories. At present something is beginning to become increasingly clear, which was suspected by the pessimists (even though they are "doves") from the very start: that the entire matter of peace was perhaps nothing more than a glittering Egyptian exercise in misrepresentation (and perhaps an American one as well), in order to leave us without most of the relatively uninhabited areas (Sinai) and with all of the Arabs under our control (the West Bank and the Gaza Strip). Furthermore, leaving on the assumption that the Palestinian question not only would not calm down after return of the Sinai--but instead would become explosive. The result would present us with an awesome dilemma: to remain with those territories and, at the same time fearing that a Cyprus Syndrome would take place making life unbearable, putting an end to tourism and to the remnants of immigration, and increase emigration (of Jews, of course, not of Arabs), vis-a-vis the alternative--to rid ourselves of the Territories as early as possible, to withdraw from most of the areas of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. This would be prompted by an obvious fear that in so doing, we shall bring about a Lebanon Syndrome in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, by the absence therein of a central administration relying upon a single military, such as the situation is today.

The dizzy dream of Begin is to "outwit" the Egyptians by demonstrating generosity bordering on frivolity in the Sinai, in the forlorn hope that he will succeed, in effect, in annexing the West Bank and the Gaza Strip while ignoring their demographic status. This dream is going up in the smoke of the shootings and the bombings which are increasing day by day, and are causing people who previously would never have considered emigrating from our land, and who carried the burden of building and wars--to begin to ask themselves and their families if, in fact, this is the Israel in which they wish to spend their lives

If these perceptions were caused solely by the intensity of the Arab opposition to our existence, they would not be a factor in the undermining of the national consensus. The history of Jewish settlement in this land indicates that Arab opposition in almost all instances brought about a strengthening of the national consensus. The problem is, that in a significant portion of the public which is considered stable (and bearing the burden), there is the sense that the extremism in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip is additionally and mainly a direct outcome of Jewish acts of extremism; that the entire settlement movement is a chimera and an act of political lunacy.

Thus, Sadat is leaving us the Palestinian time bomb in the occupied Territories, while the Likud is leaving us, after its upset in the coming elections, a second time bomb hazardous and totally of "domestic" manufacture--the private army of the Gush Emunim in the Occupied Territories. Anyone observing the many Yeshiva [Talmudical Academy] youths circulating in our streets, particularly in Jerusalem, outfitted with skullcaps and bearing automatic rifles (most of whom, one senses, have never even served in the military but rather acquired the arms directly from the regional defense unit in the occupied Territories), cannot help feeling apprehensive about the future. For as long as the Likud Administration is allegedly governing and yet, is being led around by the nose by these somnabulists (who are polarizing us vis-a-vis the entire world), there is but one consolation--their weapons have not yet been directed toward Jews. What will happen when an alignment government takes over? In addition to the dismantling of the Palestinian time bomb in the Territories, it will also have to dismantle this Jewish time bomb. In other words, to remove most of the settlements in the heart of the West Bank, which were established during the period of the Likud administration, and to return at least the framework of the Allon Plan. The latter remains to this day, the security minimum or optimum that Israel may indulge itself; if it does not wish to expand or to contract to the point of self-destruction from one direction or the other.

Can an alignment government dismantle these settlements and their semi-private army? And what will the NRP instigate? What will the extremists of the Likud be shouting as they sit in the opposition? And who among the personages of the alignment will be able to head up a government which will be required to make decisions as difficult as these, so that to avoid a civil war the State will be brought to the brink of a civil war? Even Ben Gurion would find it difficult to survive this, however, he certainly would not have permitted an internal situation over which we do have control, to reach such a point.

Our land is becoming an untenable place for the human base that is most important to its existence--it is most stable from the age subsequent to service in the military and during the two or three decades of life following, prior to old age. This is not a country whose Arab citizens are fleeing from it. This is not a country whose elderly are abandoning it, nor whose rabbis and yeshiva students, nor even its disturbed and lunatic Jews who apparently are the only ones being ingathered most recently from several points on the globe--this is a country whose capable men are despairing of it. For they are the ones who are paying the price of the wars and current security situation, the swollen bureaucracy, and the deteriorating economy--from which the new finance minister does not prevent several political leeches from sucking munificent budgets for the purposes of somnabulistic settlement, for support of the needs of religious institutions, and questionable economic adventures for the favorites of the ruling party.

The aforementioned people in the country are bound, with torn hearts, to 'vote with their feet'. Or, they will one day arrive at the awesome conclusion that against the caprices of the Gush Emunim and the Rabbi Kehane people--who circulate armed with legal weapons in the occupied territories--it will be necessary (it has already been necessary) to use force. Otherwise, the state will fall victim to the hands of an extremist minority which is a cruel caricature of the Zionist idea, and to a subversion of the remnant of the national consensus.

Anyone not wishing the destruction of this state, anyone wishing that there be a shred of hope for a continuation of the peace process (extremely fragile, as well as hazardous), must stand up and shout from every possible platform--that the present administration can be changed, before the situation in Israel and in the Territories degenerates to a citizens' war not only between us and the Arabs, but also between Jews.

ANALYST REJECTS PERES' JORDANIAN OPTION

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 24 Jul 80 p 9

[Article by Yorem Aridor: "The Deception and the Interceptor"]

[Excerpt] The leader of the opposition MK [Member of Knesset] Shimon Peres is going all out to publicize the Jordanian option as the magic solution in his hand to achieve peace with Hussein. Within the framework of his option he agrees to transfer to Hussein, on condition of demilitarization, sections of the Land of Israel--in Judea, Samaria and Gaza but not Jerusalem. Peres even proposes, if it will not be possible to sign a peace treaty, to arrive at an interim agreement on the basis of transferring areas in the land of Israel to Hussein. He even made known that he has a basis for assuming that King Hussein will be prepared for talks stemming from these proposals.

The importance of the issue and the personality of the proposer require a detailed analysis of the proposal, particularly from the standpoint on which MK Peres bases his position: the pragmatic test. From this standpoint, it should be mentioned that MK Peres still opposes establishment of a Palestinian state west of Jordan, and finds no contradiction between his support of the Jordanian option and his opposition to the formation of a Palestinian state. However, this contradiction, as will be demonstrated, still exists. If MK Peres is able to realize the Jordanian option, its implementation, haphazardly, will bring about the formation of a Palestinian state and the demilitarization will be of no value. This allegation is amenable to clarification and to demonstration, on the basis of MK Peres' own arguments and reasons which have been publicly advanced by him. For this purpose it is necessary to return to another proposal by MK Peres, which is also related to the Jordanian option. In an essay which MK Peres publicized in YEDI'OT AHARONOT (6 Apr) he supported, under certain conditions, "self-determination" for the inhabitants of Judea, Samaria and Gaza. In this essay, Peres expressed support for the solution of the Palestinian problem by Jordan "including also the majority of the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza." Peres even expressed a hope that the Jordanian Palestinian state would convert to a democracy and added: "I hope that the Arab democracy will afford them self-determination."

A Question of Time

There are proposals which exist in the realm between MAPAM and SHELI--since the Labor Party has yet to adopt for itself the concept of self-determination which is identified by its characteristic and result as establishment of a Palestinian state. In reference to this proposal there can and should be a few questions propounded: Why particularly in Jordan will the first Arab democracy arise? Secondly, how will MK Peres be able to oppose the preparation of a plebiscite among the inhabitants of Judea, Samaria and Gaza--with the argument that a plebiscite is opposed to democracy? Third, how will MK Peres be able to oppose their proclaiming of a separate Palestinian state--with the argument that they are permitted to determine themselves only in accordance with what he, MK Peres, desires? Fourth, how will MK Peres be able to oppose the setting of Arafat at their head--with the argument that in the name of democracy they may reject Hussein but they may not choose anyone else whom they desire to replace him?

These questions suffice to demonstrate that between the granting of "self-determination" and between the formation of the Palestinian State there is nothing but a question of time. Indeed, Mr Peres in proposing the Jordanian option understands that when that is implemented he will not be able to evade "self-determination" which is why he proposed it as well, but that it would already be a Palestinian State.

In order to demonstrate the qualitative connection between the Jordanian option and the "self-determination," that is, the Palestinian State, it is not necessary to rely solely on MK Peres. Even King Hussein says that specifically, and leaves no room for deception or doubt on this issue. He said this at the conference of Arab foreign ministers in Amman on 5 July 80 when he proclaimed that the PLO terrorist organization is "the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinians" and that there will be self-determination on the Palestinian land, including Jerusalem, after the withdrawal of Israel. He said that also on 11 July 80, at the above mentioned conference, when he called for establishment of a Palestinian state on the West Bank and in Gaza. Hussein even rejected (on 2 March 80 in an announcement on the French station Europe 1, and on 30 May 80 in the newspaper AL-MAJALLA which appears in London) any idea that sovereignty over the "Conquered Territories" would be transferred to Jordan. That is to say: there is no discussion here of temporary and coincidental tactics, but of a consistent line, repeated and recurring proclamations of Hussein that the option called "Jordanian" does not exist. The outcome of the effectuation of this option is a Palestinian state--in 2 stages: Stage A--Peres transfers to Hussein. State B--Hussein transfers to Arafat.

By supporting the Palestinian option, King Hussein has entirely negated the compromise territorial proposals of the Alignment. We know What Hussein said about the Allon Plan: Decidedly unacceptable. The ideas of MK Peres regarding territorial compromise in the land of Israel as basis for a peace treaty were defined by Hussein as "naive." This definition was given by him immediately after a visit of Peres to Washington and his meeting with President Carter. The consistency of this approach of Hussein is also shown by the experience of 10 years from 1967 to 1977, when the alignment was in power and advocated territorial compromise in the land of Israel without the formation of a Palestinian state, as the basis for a peace treaty. It is a fact that there was no peace agreement achieved with Jordan, and the compromise did not materialize.

Peace did not come although the Alignment wished it--because there never was, nor is there now, a line in Judea and Samaria along which it is possible to agree on a territorial compromise, not with Hussein nor with Sadat as well (which is why there is no such line even in the peace treaty with Egypt). I would make another citation: "I find it very difficult to see a line on the West Bank that will satisfy the Arabs and the Jews at the same time. Whoever proposes a line--is proposing a new conflict." These are the words of MK Peres himself (AS HAMISHMAR, 25 Feb 75).

Since then a great deal has changed for Peres. He will hardly recognize himself. What in the past has been a "line for a new conflict," has been converted suddenly to a line for peace. But the line itself is hidden from view. Where will this secret line be? Even according to Peres' plan this line will not pass within Jerusalem. Will Hussein agree to this? It will include under our jurisdiction the Etzion block. Will Hussein agree to this? It will leave us with the Jordan Valley. Does Hussein agree to that? It's a line with a very strange characteristic--it doesn't exist. If so, therefore, where is the "Jordanian Option?"

The Disappearing Line

Mr. Galili, the expert in phrasing, who bridges actual gaps with bridges of paper, will be able to reveal mutual phrases to MK Peres and MK Sarid, to MK Peres and MK Talmi, and perhaps even to MK Peres and MK Rabin; even he will be unable to uncover the territorial compromise line mutual to MK Peres and King Hussein.

Mr Peres is certainly not naive, and is alert to these difficulties. He is thus prepared, in the absence of a practical possibility to achieve peace with Hussein on the basis of a territorial compromise, to reach an interim agreement with him based upon withdrawal even without peace. Thus Mr Peres also notified DIE WELT. There was a precedent for this in the Sinai, and there, too, the interim agreements did not bring peace. A return to the former policy of the Alignment will not change the outcome of the policy: there will be no peace, but one important difference exists in all of this. When areas in the Sinai were transferred, without peace, it was not possible to wave the Palestinian Flag there. If areas in the land of Israel are transferred to Hussein, that flag will immediately fly there. The Palestinian state in that area will certainly receive immediate recognition from many governments, the foremost of them being the Soviet Union. What will MK Peres do in such an eventuality? Will he ask the IDF to march into an area under foreign sovereignty?

PLO EVADES WEST BANK RESTRAINTS

Tel Aviv HA'ARETZ in Hebrew 25 Jul 80 p 14

[Article by Jehuda Litani: "A Committee in a Pressure Suit"]

[Text] Is the Committee for National Direction, the top body of PLO sympathizers in the Territories, continuing to function despite many restrictions placed in recent months on its activity, after the deportation of 2 mayors and severe wounding of 2 other mayors, all of them important and active figures in the committee? Sources close to the committee members state that despite many restrictions which the military authority has most recently placed upon its activity, it continues to function, mainly in secret and with a great deal of care.

Contrary to these, others on the West Bank are of the opinion that the restrictions which were placed, deportation of the mayors, and the wounding of Shak'a and Khalaf were a severe blow to its activity which has been frozen. One of the members of the committee, with whom I spoke this week, admitted that the activity has been much reduced, however, according to him, it has not been totally frozen.

General Recruitment

In a special review on the 3 deportees from Mount Hebron which a spokesman of the IDF made public at the beginning of the month (where it was said--"A special review which bares the true face of the three deportees"--as though until then they showed a smiling and pleasant face and now the IDF has come and torn this mask off of their faces), the stages preceding the organization of the committee are elaborated upon: ...in effect the PLO acquired a progressively stronger hold among the political public in the Territories through a long process in recent years, and particularly since 1976. However, the critical acceleration came particularly after the signing of the Camp David agreements. In the wake of the agreements, there crystallized in the Territories "an opposition front" and a local "rejection" parallel to the Pan-Arab one which came into being following the Sadat initiative.

This local "opposition-rejectionist" front was formed by the leaders of the public in the area of Judea and Samaria by means of a noteworthy flair for manipulating the public. To this front was recruited the politically conscious public (principally urban) with all its components (PLO supporters, Jordan supporters, communists, and religious circles) excluding some isolated mavericks. The attempt to recruit the village population as well (70 percent of the inhabitants of the Judea and Samaria region)--did not succeed for the most part, yet this did not bring about a reduction in the effectiveness of the overall success.

With respect to the actual establishment of the committee, the spokesman for the IDF writes in the review: "Crystallization of this local opposition front was brought about by a series of several central political gatherings (in Jerusalem and in the Universities of Bethlehem, Birzayt, and Al Najah in Nablus and in Hebron), as well as by a larger number of smaller political meetings on the premises of societies, associations etc., in the large as well as the small cities. In all of the gatherings (the central and the small), manifestos and proclamations were composed and publicly signed. These were later disseminated (publicly as well) by the various groups."

"Also established were 'follow up' committees whose function it was to continue this activity. At the head of this array, a group of mayors and leaders of public groups who are recognized radicals and militants took position. These individuals established the Committee for National Direction and included in the expanded forum some 22 persons, in order to lend a representative and legitimate character to it, both among their people, as well as among the Israeli, and foreign public opinion. As for themselves, they took a position of leadership as an "executive committee" of 6 people (Shak'a, Khalaf, al-Qawasimah, Ibrahim Dakak, 'Adil 'Anam, Giris al-Khouri)..."

In recent months, the movement of the mayors and other persons in the Territories has been limited. All the mayors on the West Bank, almost without exception, have been confined to their cities and every departure requires approval of the military government. Movement restrictions have also been imposed on the Gaza Strip: the mayor of Gaza, Rashad al-Shawa, is required to report his movements to the authorities, and the chief of the the pro-PLO movement in the Gaza Strip, Dr. Khaydar 'Abd al-Shafi, has been forbidden to travel to the West Bank without approval of the authorities. Mayors and other people, particularly members of the Committee for National Direction are inhibited from carrying on telephone conversations.

According to many of them, the military authorities eavesdrop on all telephone conversations. One of the members of the committee showed me a crack in the entrance door to his home which, according to him, was broken during an attempt by the security people to break in to his house, in order to install a listening device. Mayors and members of the Direction Committee say that they find alternatives: when they wish to transmit an announcement from one mayor to another, or from a member of the committee to his deputy, it is done by way of special messengers, or orally--generally not by written documents.

The most important personage in the committee continues to be Bassam Shak'a despite his severe wounding. Everyone read about what was termed the "Shak'a Affair"--his arrest, threat of deportation and the blocking of the deportation. Now, following his wounding, his popularity has skyrocketed. Shak'a now is not only the Mayor of Nablus but a symbol, as well, of the struggle of the Palestinian nation. Bassam Shak'a was, in effect, the organizer of the Committee for National Direction: that was a few months after the Camp David agreements. Personages from all parts of the West Bank, and especially mayors, gathered at Shak'a's initiative in the village of Anvata, in order to protest the expropriation of lands in the area. Afterwards, all of the participants came out to Nablus and there, in effect, the foundation was laid for the establishment of the committee.

Another member of the committee is the mayor of the municipality of al-Bira, Sulayman Tawil, who was miraculously spared injury (and who did not bother to pay a hospital visit to Border Guard Sulayman Hirbawi who was seriously wounded while attempting to dismantle the charge that was intended for Tawil). Tawil is not considered to be of superior ability among members of the committee, although until recently, he had been looked upon as the right-hand man of Karim Khalaf, Mayor of Ramallah.

Other mayors who are members of the committee are the mayor of the municipality of Tulkarm, Hilmi Hanun (the veteran mayor on the West Bank--since 1967 known to be a PLO supporter), the mayor of Jericho, Abdul Aziz Suwayty and the mayor of Anvata, Wahid Hamdallah. Bassara Daud, who previously had been mayor of the municipality of Bayt-Jala, (and was removed from his office following conviction on a charge of beating police officers) represents the 3 "Bayts" in the committee (Bayt Lahm, Bayt Jala and Bayt Sahur). To this very day, the members of the committee are as important as the person who was appointed by the military authority to the position of the municipality of Bayt Jala, Farah al-'Arraj (who had also been the mayor prior to Bassara Daud), and continue to relate to Bassara Daud as the mayor for all matters. Until their deportation from the area, the mayors of Hebron and Halhul Fahd al-Quwasimah and Muhammad Milham were also members of the committee.

The living spirit in the committee is Ibrahim Dakak who serves as a kind of secretary or coordinator of the committee. Dakak, owner of an engineering firm in East Jerusalem, secretary of the Society of Engineers on the West Bank, is a very shy man who prefers not to be exposed, but behind the scenes he manifests considerable activism. Jordan sympathizers in East Jerusalem and on the West Bank like to label Dakak "communist." Ibrahim Dakak is not a card carrier of the party, however, he is apparently close in his views to the Left.

Other members of the committee: East Jerusalem attorney Jiris Khouri, chairman of the Professionals' Societies on the West Bank, 'Adil 'Anam, Sayyid Alladdin (former minister in the Jordan Government), East Jerusalem resident director of the Chamber of Commerce Shaykh Ali Tazziz, chairman of the United Fund on the West Bank, Amin al-Hatif, the head sermonizer in the Al Aksa mosque, Akhramah Davri, the head of the Gaza Strip Red Crescent, Dr. Haydar al-Shaf and the head of the Medical Society in Gaza, Sayyid Bakhar.

Newspapermen are represented by the editor of AL-FADJAR, Ma'mun al-Sayyid; Akram Haniya, assistant editor of the daily AL-SHA'AB, and editor of the Communist weekly AL-TALIYA, Bassir Barguty (considered to be one of the most important and influential members of the committee.) Samihah Halil represents the women on the West Bank--she is head of the Committee for Prisoner Aid. She is better known by her nickname Um Halil, and has been glorified by all particularly because of her ceaseless energy and efforts on behalf of the prisoners.

A senior officer recently stated that the military authorities prevented a meeting of the committee (which had been scheduled for East Jerusalem on the 14th of this month), and that in the future, it will vigorously prevent all its activity. Some have interpreted this as imposing house arrest on all members of the committee; if they attempt to violate the edict of the government and continue their activism. One member of the committee told me this week that restrictions of the authorities have actually succeeded in blocking the public activity of the committee--meetings and announcements ments--yet, the foundation remains and it is now perfectly clear that the committee is healthy. In fact, members of the committee or others who think similarly to them, are placed at many key points in the Territories. It is now difficult for others, even if they wished to do so, to conduct a line opposing that of the PLO.

In the review of the IDF spokesman on the matter of the deportees from Hebron it is stated, that an extremism has developed among the radical sources, and that "the extremism will likely continue, with the active agitation of the Committee for National Direction, which leads the public, and particularly the youth in this direction." Despite restriction of the military authorities (says a person close to the committee), the public in the Territories knows how to react to events affecting it, by demonstrations or other means, such as for example, the reaction this week to the death of a prisoner in the Nafi'a Prison. The committee represents a militant and radical line, and, in general, the Rejection Front. On occasion its members have had confrontations and differences of opinion with the official stand of the PLO as expressed by its strongest branch, Al-Fatah. The best known confrontation was on the issue of resignation of the mayors, after the deportation decision of Shak'a. Members of the Direction Committee took an open position against the stand of Al-Fatah and of Jordan, which had advocated a collective resignation.

One Way Out--Terror

It would appear that in the near future the military authorities will make the restrictions even more binding. Therefore, there is a prospect that the most recent loopholes by members of the committee to continue their activism will be blocked. If so, the question is--what will be left for inhabitants of the Territories after this route of activism is denied them? If not political gatherings, strikes and demonstrations there is but one way left, the way which has already increased recently (its peak was the murderous act at the Hadassah building in Hebron). The Israeli authority in the Territories has been deluding itself in recent years that it is possible, in one way or another, to encourage moderate elements against the rising tide of nationalism, on occasion disruptive nationalism.

During this period, the more moderate elements (the intent being directed against the pro-Jordanians) do not dare to raise their heads. It is difficult for them, especially against the suppression by the members of the Committee for Direction and others. If they are now permitted to operate freely, they will be considered traitors and will bring public wrath upon themselves.

The reality in the Territories, and particularly in the West Bank in the summer of 1980, is that members of the committee represent more than any other factor in the eyes of many inhabitants the Palestinian issue. Imposition of restrictions to the point of silencing the committee will not create a vacuum in the leadership of the West Bank. In recent years, the leadership in the Territories is becoming progressively extremist. It is possible that in 1981, we shall find members of the Committee for National Direction replaced by a much more extremist leadership operating covertly, and calling on the public to resort to terrorism in the streets of the Territories. Perhaps then we shall remember, and yearn for the days when the Territories were led by people such as Fahd al-Qawasimah, Muhammad Milham and Karim Khalaf.

THOUSANDS LEAVE NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT TOWNS

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 17 Jul 80 p 9

[Article: "14,000 Left Northern Development Towns in 1978-1979"]

[Text] More than 14,000 people have left northern development towns in 1978 and 1979, according to data provided by the Central Bureau for Statistics to the mayors of northern development towns.

The mayors of these towns estimate that the number of "dropouts" is even larger, since their experience indicates that some of the "dropouts" prefer to be registered as residents of development towns in order to continue to enjoy the benefits of development town residents. According to their estimates, the number of those leaving who did not bother to change their address is 14,000, so that the number of "dropouts" for those years is in fact 28,000.

These figures were the center of discussion at a meeting yesterday of mayors of northern development towns held at Safad. At the meeting it was reported that the number of residents of the center of the country who request to move to development towns in the north is declining at an alarming rate. This is primarily due to employment difficulties in the northern towns, and the inflation of housing costs there.

More than 90 requests from families and single persons, requesting to join Kibbutz Misgav Am, have been received by the Center for Development Town placement.

The director of the Center, Zohar Gindal, reported yesterday at Safad that 8 families and 8 single persons have begun the process of practical absorption in the kibbutz on the Lebanese border. Twenty other families have organized themselves in an urban commune which will come to the kibbutz in another 10 months, after finishing the construction of housing at the kibbutz.

Mr Gindal also reported that following the success of the "Build Your Home" campaign in Upper Nazereth, where 114 families occupied 94 lots within the framework of this campaign, a similar campaign will be started in the near future in Tiberias. The goal is to provice 113 lots to those interested in building their homes in Tiberias.

Currently, the Center is working on another campaign: "To Go Up to Ma'alot, Stage 2." This stage will be conducted under the motto: "In Ma'alot there is work, there is housing, there is quality of life." Within the framework of this campaign, 130 new apartments and villas will be made available to interested parties. The price for a 3 room apartment will be 1.5 million pounds, with a 55,000 pound downpayment.

RISE IN NUMBER OF SERVICE WORKERS REPORTED

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 21 Jul 80 p 10

[Article: "Workers Leave Industry and Construction, Go to Services"]

[Text] In the first months of 1980, the number of public service workers grew by 8000 employees, while 14,000 workers left industry and 7000 left construction. All of this ran contrary to the policy of the Finance Ministry of reducing the number of public service workers.

These data were included in a report prepared by economists by the Bank of Israel on economic developments in recent months. From the report it is learned that financial services also absorbed 6000 new workers. In all, the number of those employed in the business sector declined by 18,000 workers. Due to the expansion of the public services, employment was reduced only slightly.

The flight of workers from the business sector, and especially from industry and construction, was the principal factor in the growth of unemployment. In the first quarter of 1980, the number of unemployed rose to 62,000, which is an unemployment rate of 4.7 percent, as compared to unemployed of 36,000 (2.8 percent) at the end of 1979.

The growth of unemployment was only one of the characteristics of recession which hit the economy at the beginning of the year. In addition to the unemployment, there was also a decline in personal consumption and in real wages, a decline in the activity of the business sector, a reduction in imports, and a growth in exports.

Industrial production declined by 10 percent in the first quarter. Housing construction in the private sector contracted, and the number of housing starts declined. The reduction of imports was especially prominent in the imports of raw materials for production, and the expansion of exports stemmed from a decline in local demand, which caused the shift of production from the local market to abroad.

At the beginning of the year there was a slowdown in the rate of inflation, and it stood at a monthly average of 5.8 percent. However, in the second quarter the inflation rate accelerated and rose to 8 percent per month. In the opinion of the Bank of Israel economists, this acceleration of inflation stemmed from the increase in price of oil, the increase in the money supply, the cost of living supplement payments, and the weakening of expectations regarding the stemming of inflation.

The increase in money supply stemmed to a substantial degree from the marked acceleration of collection of indirect taxes, a phenomenon explained by the contraction of private consumption.

In the last three months, the recession at least temporarily eased in activity and spending (according to partial information). Economic activity, and figures on employment services indicate that there has been no expansion in the scope of unemployment.

INCREASE IN EXPORT REVENUES REPORTED

Tel Aviv MA'ARIV in Hebrew 21 Jul 80 p 11

[Article: "Export Profits Increase By 2 Percent This Year"]

[Text] In the first half of 1980, export profits rose by 2 percent, in addition to support by means of credit.

The deputy commissioner of the Bank of Israel, Dr Eliezer Shafar, transmitted to MA'ARIV the summary of an audit in this matter. In the first half of 1980 the consumer price index rose by 49.4 percent, while the lira was devaluated in relation to the currency basket by 43.7 percent. Prices abroad rose in the same period, according to data of the International Currency Fund, by 6 percent. The general result was a rise in export profits by 2 percent in the first half of this year.

In addition, there was increased aid for exports by means of credit.

On the issue of proposals for insuring a rate of exports, Dr Shafar avoided responding because of the lack of a clear program. It is not yet clear if the intention is to insure by means of a premium by insurance companies, or if what is being considered is insurance by means of the budget.

He did not reject a rate insurance by means of premiums, but insurance by means of the budget requires, according to him, basic clarification.

An internal staff within the Ministry of Industry is currently studying various alternatives for preserving export profits by means of a system which will assure a realistic exchange for the exporter.

There is being studied, among other things, a plan for insuring the rate, whose purpose will be to assure coordination of changes in the currency rate to changes in the local costs in production.

A committee headed by Yoram Blizovski, the deputy director of finance within the ministry, will present proposals for establishing means of assuring profits in exports. The committee did not limit itself to changes in exchange rates.

For some time, the Ministry of Industry has supported the possibility of encouraging export by means of rate insurance. The ministry views this measure as complementary to credit extended to the exporter, and not as a device to replace credit.

INADEQUATE PROTECTION OF NEWSPAPER OFFICE CHARGED

[Editorial: "The Word, and the Explosives"]

[Excerpts] Very well. You have blown up our office. But we will continue; we will not stop. AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM will remain a shining beacon of free speech, both in our beloved country and throughout the greater nation. We knew that in this evil time for the Arab world we would pay a tax on what we say. We knew that the bats of the night would be proficient in placing explosives to destroy AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM, or firing pistols with silencers to murder its director. In other words, we were aware of the prostitution of this Arab period and the extent of the rift which has divided the Arab spirit. Out of this rift have emerged those who are working to silence its free minds and break the pens which have been dedicated to freedom and the cause.

While we extend our thanks to the state officials for their great concern after the incident, we must ask ourselves this question: Some 4 months ago, the Foreign Ministry notified the Interior Ministry that a certain group was threatening to blow up the office of AL-RA'Y AL-'AMM and murder its chief, but no one took the initiative to institute any protective measure. Meanwhile, dozens of security personnel could be seen in their vehicles guarding the American Embassy and other places. In this critical Arab phase, when the Arab press has become the vanguard in the fight against the plans for control and occupation and the elimination of the Arab cause and the Arab being, the Arab press should have received the same attention as the embassy of the great lords in Washington.

We say this not because we have lost what we built up over 20 years. For we have set upon this task, and we are certain that we will continue to bear the word as a weapon in the jungle. We are also certain, and determined as well, that we will remain content to bear this weapon against those who carry bombs and pistols. In other words, we believe that the protection of the cultural heritage of this nation, and the defense of its aspirations toward freedom, liberation and sovereignty over the land, is worthy of sacrifice and confrontation with the weapon of culture, which will certainly and ultimately be victorious.

IMPROVEMENT OF SECURITY FORCES URGED

[Editorial by Ahmad al-Jarallah: "Every Citizen Is a Guardsman"]

[Text] I believe that for a country such as Kuwait, which enjoys large revenues and extensive financial activity, security is a vital matter. We do not want to say here that security is inadequate or that members of the security forces are preoccupied with private affairs. All of this has been said many times. However, we would like to make one important observation. Switzerland is a country of wealth and affluence, and it is assured of extremely thorough security, although it is a country which makes use of foreign nationals. If the government of Kuwait were to utilize the security system applied in Switzerland, it would need nothing more than a knowledge of what is required to protect the country and a small amount of spending in the appropriate place. Funds allocated to the security forces would not be spent improperly and would not go to employees and domestics of some [officers] who are only interested in saving their own money.

The security system in Kuwait needs someone to man its forces with Kuwaiti citizens, just as the Swiss Security system is manned with Swiss citizens for the protection of their country's security. The citizen in Switzerland is in effect a citizen guardsman, because the Swiss have turned the security system into a cultural authority rather than a domineering, blustering agency. The Swiss security organization stands for culture and protection of the nation and the citizen; it does not stand for intimidation of the people and the stifling of the spirit of cooperation between the people and the security forces.

Additional spending with integrity and in the proper place will ensure this country's growth and development and make it a land for hard workers, not troublemakers, killers and saboteurs.

KUWAITI COMPANY CO-MANAGES DOLLAR LOAN

Kuwait AL-QABAS in Arabic 11 Jul 80 p 15

[Article: "Kuwait and Mideast States Participate in International Issue Valued in Dollars"]

[Text] Financial market circles in London reported yesterday that a major British real estate company intends to seek one third of a new loan valued at $30 million. This is the first international dollar-valued issue of its kind by a British company [involving funds] from a Mideast state--in this case, Kuwait--in 6 years.

The funds for the company Metropolitan and Property International, a subsidiary of the parent company, will be assembled through convertible Eurodollar bonds paying 8.25 percent interest.

The operation will be managed by two groups: Morgan Grenfell and Company and the Kuwaiti International Investment Company.

Also participating in the management of the loan will be the Industrial Bank of Kuwait; Morgan Stanley International; (Brussels Lambert) Bank; Pearson; (Heldring) and Pearson; S.G. Warburg; and (Odli) Limited.

A spokesman for the British company informed the Kuwaiti News Agency that at least 30 percent of the $30-million issue will be subscribed to in the Middle East area.

The spokesman added that the remaining portion will be subscribed to in Great Britain, Europe and the Far East.

The bonds will mature in 15.5 years and can be converted into shares of the Metropolitan and Property Company beginning in 1981.

The company is the second largest on the British stock exchange and possesses assets worth 643 million pounds sterling ($1.5 billion).

The company intends to use the loan to expand its interests in the United States, where it has a subsidiary called M.A.P.C. American Properties Bank.

The American subsidiary possesses holdings worth a little over $100 million. Its investment properties include offices in Houston, Las Vegas and Minneapolis.

The spokesman said: "We believe that this is a good time to expand the company's interests in the United States with the aim of relying on the success of its investments and in order to take advantage of new opportunities which will probably appear in the near future."

PHALANGE PARTY LEADER JUMAYYIL INTERVIEWED

Milan IL BORGHESE in Italian 10 Aug 80 pp 920-922

[Report on interview with Bashir Jumayyil by Duccio Di Michele: "Toward a Christian National State in Lebanon: Romulus and Remus in Beirut"]

[Text] Beirut--"There had to be bloodshed, unfortunately and alas! We had no alternative. Those other Christians had let themselves drift into the languors of Capua, and tolerated the bordello that has reigned [over the country] since the end of the civil war, leaving Lebanon not only at the mercy of the Syrians and Palestinians but also of the dope traffickers and smugglers. It was a terrible, heart-rending thing, Christians against Christians--absurd, incredible, suicidal. But Dany just let things putrefy, concerned only with [his] millions. His own father, Camille Shamun, suffered for it, but the spirit of the 'clan,' the family, was too strong. That's why we launched Operation Trojan Horse, and within a few minutes the Tigers no longer existed."

This is how the Phalangists explain the night of the "heavy hand" that overwhelmed the garrison of the "Liberals."

Was this tragic exploit really necessary or urgent? To Bashir Jumayyil, the new strong man of the Lebanese Maronites, it recalled the episode of Romulus and Remus.

All civil wars characteristically degenerate into clan warfare within factions, and Lebanon was no exception. It took 200 dead for Romulus to win the upper hand by force over Remus. Two hundred dead and 600 wounded in a nation of 3 million that lost 50,000 in the civil war would not have been a huge figure if the Phalangists' victory had not precipitated fundamental consequences for the future of Lebanon and the Near East. With the assistance of two collaborators, IL BORGHESE "shot a film" of that "night of the long knives."

'The Trojan Horse'

7 July--In his office, furnished in presidential style, Bashir Jumayyil, commander of the Kataeb, Christian Phalangists, conferred for the last time with his General Staff, garbed in the green uniform of the commandos--all young wolves with emaciated faces. There was Munzer, the Phalange Party's lawyer and spokesman. There was Pussy, commando chief who, in 1978, blew up the Palestinians' munitions factory at Tell Al-Zaatar in Beirut, making it with a handful of volunteers through the city sewers. There was Jo who, at 27, commanded the entire Christian quarter of Ashrafieh. There was Kamal, 28, and others. All of them repeatedly assured Shaykh Bashir, "We're ready!"

Dark and thickset, Bashir, 33, glances through the big window at the Bay of Beirut, spread out before his eyes, with ships lying gutted in the port and the sea-front boulevard lined with buildings reduced to rubble or pocked with shell-holes. Within a few hours he will rule over this city, once a tourist paradise, the joie de vivre of the Lebanese people, today a victim in the grip of chaos, racketeering, drugs and contraband, moral and national fragmentation--indeed, a whorehouse. Within a few hours he will see to it that the law and order of the Phalange Party dominates.

Noon. One after the other, the "operational chiefs" go out through the armored door on the way to their respective posts. Alone, Bashir prays, staring long at the single photo on his desk, a portrait of his only daughter, Maya, killed on 23 February at the age of 20 months when they blew up her father's car. He, the target, was not in the car at that moment. Whose target? The Shamunites', of course. This he firmly believes, although there is nothing to prove it. Between Lebanon's two [principal] Christian parties a long series of vendettas had piled up a number of corpses over the years. Officially they met, clapped each other on the shoulder, signed agreements and swore eternal friendship, but mortal rivalry seethed below the surface.

Since the assassination of Maya, Bashir has not been the same man I met in July 1978 (cf. IL BORGHESE, No 32/33 of that year: "Rome Dies in Beirut"). He wanted to end it all with the "Tigers." Thus, he summoned Camille Shamun, former president of Lebanon and several times prime minister, who called in the American Marines during the insurrection of 1958, and [subsequently] organized his own Christian militia: Numur, the "Tigers."

At 82, Shamun, with his elegant figure and wavy white hair, is still a leader of parts in Lebanon. Some of his powers he delegated to his 50-year-old son Dany. United in the common struggle against the Palestinians and the so-called "progressives," Tigers and Phalangists concluded a "political" truce and set up a united military front. But when the Palestinians were subdued and militarily driven well back and with the Syrians so beleaguered that they couldn't hang on much longer in Lebanon, the two [leading] Christian clans fell to fighting each other for supremacy.

The Phalangists were worried. The zones occupied by the Tigers left much to be desired, and many Tigers metamorphosed into wolves, avid for lucre and the indolent life. Too much contraband money floated around among them, and too much corruption was tainting Shamun's supermillionaire tribe. The superficial observer did not see that while the Phalangists lived in austere poverty, the Tigers were rolling in money, that where the former constituted a sort of petite bourgeoisie or Christian proletariat, the latter resurrected, symbolically at least, the old Lebanon of gambling casinos, dance halls in the mountains, and millions [of dollars] stashed away in Paris and Rio de Janeiro.

Jumayyil repeatedly brought these facts to the Shamunites' attention, but rien a faire. Bashir, therefore, decided to take action in the deepest secrecy. On the night of 7 July, 500 of his best Kataeb, all in mufti and unarmed, issued forth from the Phalangist garrison, gathered together at point X, and boarded supply trucks that served the Christian zone. In the cabins, the drivers likewise wore mufti. Behind them, 30 well-armed men per truck huddled among a few sacks of flour. This was Operation Trojan Horse, devised to "avoid bloodshed and a frontal clash with their Shamunite brethren."

The trucks headed for the Shamunites' main fortification at Saffrah, north of Juniyah. All unsuspecting, the sentries opened the gates to the garrison. Inside, the trucks disgorged a floodtide of Phalangists, who opened fire and demanded surrender. Knowing down to the smallest detail the most favorable positions to overrun, the Phalangists enjoyed the advantage of their surprise tactics. Still, slaughter was inevitable, and about 200 men died. A massacre? Perhaps. But the 3,000 prisoners taken indicated that the number of victims would have been higher had there been a frontal clash.

One by one all the Tigers' bastions fell after Jumayyil, who extended his offensive throughout the Christian-controlled area, spread the word that the Shamunites had surrendered. Suddenly the elderly Camille Shamun was left stripped of his arms and his legions, while Jumayyil was urging all militiamen to join the Phalangists.

But why all this, asked the defeated. "Why must we create a new State, a new, single Lebanese national army?" Because we want no more clans, the Phalangists replied.

At 5 that afternoon, Shamun surrendered officially to Jumayyil at the Monastery of St Antonio.

The Tragedy Behind the Scenes

An extraordinary meeting took place in the presence of Pierre Jumayyil, 75, founder of the Phalange Party. With his hair cropped in the style of the 1930's, with his raucous voice and pugilist face (he closely resembles the great boxer Georges Carpentier), Jumayyil Sr offered Shamun the honorary presidency of the united Christians, at the same time urging him to banish his son Dany from political life. (Although Dany obviously lacked his father's political acumen and the military expertise of his rival Bashir, Shamun had appointed him military commander of the Tigers.) Shamun accepted Jumayyil's suggestion but could not speak for his son, who had vanished from the scene.

Pierre Jumayyil gave the order not to "touch the Shamun family" and freed those (Shamunite) prisoners who swore they would take up arms again only as Phalangists.

Captain of [Lebanon's] national football team, at the 36 Olympic Games in Berlin, Pierre Jumayyil discovered the Italian team and their special style. Fascinated, back in Lebanon he established his circle of Phalangists, first as a sports association, later becoming a political movement with its own deputies and ministers, then a paramilitary group, which he ultimately transformed into a genuine, trained army. The Palestinians and the Syrians know something about that. So do the Shamunites who, with their 10,000 men, were helpless against Jumayyil's 40,000.

One after the other, like the [three] Horatius brothers defeating the three Curatii, the Phalangists eliminated the other Christian clans, which they accused of "double dealing and dangerous indolence." Among them was the faction led by Franjieh, 70, ex-President of Lebanon, who opposed a toll on the grain traffic imposed by Christian customs at the frontiers.

Someone may ask: what will Dany Shamun do now that he has teamed up with Franjieh, and the two have been "taken into serious consideration by the progressive Palestinians as allies in solidarity." It would be more to the point to ask instead what they can do against the strength of Jumayyil, who remains the only victor on the terrain. Of these three Christian clans contending for power, only one has emerged dominant--the Phalange Party. As Bashir explained, "Politics don't interest me. I have no personal ambitions. I would never have entered the arena if it hadn't been for the threat of a Christian genocide and the death of Lebanon."

But why this war among Christians today?

"Because there are too many abadays, small-time gang bosses, who rob, destroy like vandals, murder and run rackets--and, to cap it off, who are Christians, but not Christians of our stripe. I want to put an end to this anarchy, to this rabble-ocracy, drug smuggling, contraband trafficking, everything that dishonors us. They have forgotten that our war will go on until we free the country from the Palestinian and Syrian invaders. And if some Lebanese favor colonizing a part of the country, then we shall install ourselves independent and sovereign on the territory we control."

The New State

Bashir Jumayyil, now master of Christian Lebanon's destiny, tells me about the first measures his party has adopted: "Along the entire seacoast north of Beirut, from Tabarjah to Aquamarina, we are closing all the clandestine ports, bays and coves to the smuggling of heroin. Internally we are taking charge of public order. The time of gangs, clans, bosses and underworld crime is over. The Christian forces are now unified, with a single uniform, a single flag, a single command, a single name: The Lebanese Forces. We are a strong military and political power, working to reunite all combatants, including the tiger cubs and the Volunteers of the Cedar, into a single force de frappe of 40,000 men. We have our own supply ports, our heavy artillery, our tanks, our helicopters and, very soon, our fighter planes on our own airfields. From Thursday, 17 October, on, anyone who is not a member of our army or our police force will be forbidden to wander around the Christian zone in battle-dress, armed or transporting a weapon. Only our Phalangists with a mission ordered by the Lebanese Army chief of staff will be authorized to wear the uniform and bear arms. Those who violate the law will be arrested and tried by our courts."

This new de facto state comprises some 2,000 square kilometers controlled by Bashir Jumayyil's cohorts, extending from the Rue de Damas in Beirut to the south as far as the port of Batrun, north of Byblos, and from the Mediterranean to the line marking the crest of Mts Sannin and (Bsharri). To defend this Christian minirealm, Jumayyil can mobilize another 40,000 men in the mountain villages within a few hours, like the Israeli reserves. Every man is already equipped with arms; he only has to don his uniform, load his weapon, and join his unit.

"Because the Lebanese police are inept," Jumayyil went on, "we are forming our own National Guard, which will not only oversee road traffic and public order but also concern itself with criminal cases. If someone steals your car, our agents will find it. Justice will be reorganized on the Phalangist model, with civil and military courts functioning on the Western style. In other words, we have determined to fill the void left by the Lebanese State, which exists only on paper, thanks to the 'good heart' of the Syrians and Palestinians. At the moment, for example, 10 Phalangists are subject to court martial and threatened with the death sentence for violating a 7 July order and killing civilians."

Meanwhile, in all Lebanon, wracked by a succession of wars and guerrilla forays, the Christian zone is the only one to heal the wounds, to rebuild everywhere and restore collective life. In the east, the Christian telephone system works better than the state exchanges in the western sector of Beirut. The Christian municipalities are operating as before, whereas the other city administrations are nonexistent. The streets are clean and illuminated, while elsewhere there is only filth and darkness. There is no shortage of doctors or medicine in their hospitals. The Christians provide public transportation, with regular service between Beirut and the mountains. They even have radio stations: the Voice of Free Lebanon, which transmits from Juniyah, and the Voice of the Cedar, from the eastern sector of Beirut. Within 2 months, the Christians will have their own television.

This neostate collects its own taxes to construct empirically brick by brick according to its various immediate needs. Industrialists, traders, service station owners pay taxes at a fixed rate. For a gallon of gas you pay a tax equivalent to roughly $.20. In Brumana, a smart district of Beirut, a gas station proprietor declared that the Phalangists "administer taxes better than all the preceding parliamentary governments." Every restaurant check includes a contribution to the Christian State: 2 percent of the total.

"We need this money," Jumayyil explains, "because we will not stop. We mean to emancipate all Lebanon. What would Carter or Kreisky say if they were asked to cede part of the United States or Austria to accommodate the Palestinians? We don't want to chase them away, we only want them to remember that they're not in their own home, they're our guests. Then why should it be demanded of us, and at our expense? To win respect for Lebanon, we must be strong. The areas occupied by the Palestinians must be returned to us, absolutely. That's why we've had to reunite, for love or for strength, under a single banner. One day we shall reunite with our brothers in the south, the troops of Major Haddad, a Christian. They have already liberated their territory and opened the frontier with Israel. Meanwhile, we're beginning to send Phalangist ambassadors out into the world. I, too, intend to go soon to the United States, where we have a powerful friend: Ronald Reagan."

'ALI NASIR DISCUSSES UNIFICATION OF TWO YEMENS, ATTACKS U.S.

Beirut AL-HURRIYAH in Arabic 7 Jul 80 pp 8-13

[Interview with 'Ali Nasir Muhammad al-Hasani, prime minister of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, by Sarim 'Abdallah and 'Ali al-Shihabi; date and place not given]

[Text] 'Ali Nasir tells AL-HURRIYAH:

"Our confidence in ourselves and in the soundness of our progressive path is greater than hostile campaigns launched against us.

"Our basic task is to strengthen the party's leadership role and the conditions of mass organizations, and develop the state and our national economy."

Comrade 'Ali Nasir has been involved in the various stages of Democratic Yemen's struggle both before and after independence. During all this time he has maintained his revolutionary character which has always been like a compass which has oriented him in his relationship with the masses and their causes and led him to the forefront of the revolutionary leadership of the Yemeni people. Right now, he shoulders the responsibility of top man in this leadership. Nevertheless, he still finds time for theoretical, political, and revolutionary exchanges of views, with whoever has the opportunity to discuss with him the country's issues and domestic and foreign policy.

We wanted in this new interview with Comrade 'Ali Nasir to discuss new issues, particularly following the hostile campaign launched against Comrade 'Ali Nasir personally, against the party leadership, and against Democratic Yemen in general. The aim of this hostile campaign which follows recent developments is to suggest that things are not going well in the country, and that it has either taken a step backward, come to a standstill, or decided to make a change in its basic policies. In the face of all these hostile attacks, Comrade 'Ali Nasir gives a clear and frank response which demonstrates the confidence which this revolutionary has in himself as well as in his party, people, and the masses of his country.

'Ali Nasir emphasizes that a progressive path has been well established in Democratic Yemen, and that there is a continual struggle to stay on it and move forward. He says that this confidence in the revolution is greater than all of the hostile propaganda attacks against it. Finally, Comrade 'Ali Nasir speaks very frankly about Democratic Yemen's recent political positions and activities, and about the international visits he has been making.

Here is the interview which Comrade 'Ali Nasir gave to two correspondents of the AL-HURRIYAH who posed questions to him and engaged him in a frank discussion. AL-HURRIYAH has continuously followed and espoused the ideological and revolutionary experiment in Democratic Yemen, with all the hopes and aspirations it holds for freedom-fighters, revolutionaries, and progressive-minded people in the Arab world.

[Question] Democratic Yemen has come to have a prominent political status in the Arab world, because of the stability of its progressive path and the steadfastness which it has shown in the face of a series of evil plots ever since it gained independence. When you took over the duties of secretary general and chairman of the presidium of the Supreme People's Council, in addition to your duties as prime minister, the imperialist and reactionary media unleashed a large-scale campaign of skepticism which aimed at slandering Democratic Yemen's progressive status. When these media were at the height of their activity against Democratic Yemen, they did not hide their dissatisfaction with you personally, because of your well-known progressive positions. This explains why these media resorted to publishing misleading information in which they said that your being the leader of the party and the government is only a temporary thing. They said this in order to create misgivings about the unity and cohesion of the Yemeni Socialist Party which is leading the revolutionary process in your country.

What is your appraisal of the outrageous media campaign which has been waged against you following the recent changes? And in what manner did you confront it on the political level, within the party and among the masses?

[Answer] We know very well that the enemies of the Yemeni revolution are an inalienable part of the movement which is hostile to the forces of progress, peace and socialism in the entire world. This hostility and plotting against the Yemeni revolution and its achievements will continue as long as the struggle between the progressive forces of nations fighting for their rights, on one hand, and the imperialist and reactionary forces, on the other, is waged on the international level. This is because the strengthening and consolidation of the revolutionary process in our country is a cause of alarm and dismay for the imperialist and reactionary forces. These forces do not accept the existence of a progressive, revolutionary regime which defends its national sovereignty and participates, in an effective manner, in a struggle waged for the sake of Pan-Arab and international causes.

If we take a look at the series of plots which have been launched against the Yemeni revolution since the outbreak of the 26 September and 14 October revolutions, we find that hostile reactionary propaganda has been, and still is, one of the chief means utilized by hostile forces in their efforts to mislead public opinion and continue their psychological warfare against our nation and its progressive forces. For example, the forces hostile to our revolution beamed secret broadcasts to the northern part of Yemen during the hostile military campaigns which aimed at capturing revolutionary San'a' and bringing down the 26 September Republic. In addition to this, these hostile forces have engaged in biased media campaigns which are against all revolutionary developments in our country. They aim to create misgivings about our nation's progressive achievements through its patient and difficult struggle, in spite of the scarcity of our material resources and potential. These media campaigns have also sought to slander the relations of friendship and cooperation which bind revolutionary Yemen with all forces of liberation, progress, peace, and socialism in both the Arab world and the entire world.

It is no exaggeration that we were not at all surprised by this hysterical media campaign which was recently organized by forces hostile to our revolution. We expected a campaign such as this against all the new developments in our country. However, the confidence which we have in ourselves and in the soundness of the path we are pursuing has enabled us to face this hate-filled media campaign and make it backfire in the faces of those who are waging it.

The large-scale action we engaged in on both the domestic and foreign levels was very effective in more firmly establishing and consolidating the progressive, revolutionary course of the Yemeni Socialist Party and in establishing it as a rallying point for the masses. Also, the decisions of the 8th session of the central committee represent a consolidation of the militant revolutionary traditions of our party within a framework of democratic centralism and collective leadership, and of commitment to the basic charters of the party. On the economic front, the recent decisions made by the 8th session of the central committee were an expression of the attention which the party is devoting to the issue of continuing to boost our national economy as it proceeds along the course of comprehensive and planned development which aims at the material and spiritual improvement of the life of the working masses.

Likewise, the visits which we have made to Syria, the Soviet Union, and the northern half of our nation, as well as our meetings with the leaders of the Palestine resistance movement and the Lebanese National Movement, have helped to consolidate the firm, basic line which we are following with regard to issues which concern us on the national, pan-Arab, and international levels.

[Question] Some notorious newspapers and news agencies have published news items that consideration is being given to making new changes in the leadership of the party and the government. Is there any truth to this?

[Answer] These news items have no basis in truth at all. They are merely a vehicle by which our enemies want to say that political stability in Democratic Yemen is now lacking. But let me tell you in all frankness that these poisonous news items and hostile rumors, which are being circulated here and there to create misgivings about the leadership of our party, are no longer something which we are afraid of. Our enemies have tried these conspiratorial methods in the past. Every time they did so, they met with utter failure and revealed how much they hate and are hostile to our revolution and our nation.

There is a great difference between yesterday and today. By this I mean that our circumstances today are far better than they were yesterday. And this is what strengthens our confidence in our nation and in the ability of our party to confront the different types of sabotage which are being directed against us, whatever forms they take and whatever sources they might come from.

[Question] Could you clarify for us the extent to which you have made progress in consolidating the leadership role of the party in your society?

[Answer] The issue concerning consolidation of the leadership role of the party in our society is one of our most important central tasks. Its accomplishment is crucial to the success of our struggle to achieve the tasks of the current stage of the democratic national revolution which leads to future progress. At the present time, we are devoting special attention to consolidating mass organizations, developing the government administration, and developing the national economy in order that the party may transfer its momentum to the masses and to society in general. This guarantees consolidation of the leadership role of the party in the process of building a new life for our nation.

[Question] It is well-known that up till now you have played a prominent role in the Yemeni revolutionary movement since the outbreak of the 26 September and 14 October revolutions. How do you assess the progress of the Yemeni revolutionary process in terms of the achievement of the principal aims which have been realized and in terms of the aims which the Yemeni people are continuing their victorious struggle to achieve?

[Answer] Before answering this question, I would like to refer to my recent visit to the city of Ta'izz in the northern half of our nation. This visit brought back to me memories of the course of our revolutionary struggle in Yemen. I had spent quite a long time in this city during the time we were getting ready for armed revolution in the southern part of our nation, and I also made frequent visits to this city during the revolution. During that period of time, the thing which bound us to our great cause, namely, the cause of liberating the southern part of our nation and reuniting our country, was a set of great and complicated concerns which reflected the enormity of the national task we were faced with.

Great are the moments when a man recalls the victories of the past as he continues the struggle to consolidate current revolutionary gains. My recent visit to the city of Ta'izz brought back to me memories of many of the original freedom-fighters who used to come to this historic city in order to supply themselves with weapons and the things which they needed to pursue the struggle against British occupation of Southern Yemen. I was also reminded of the difficult circumstances under which our revolutionary battle was waged for our people in both parts of our nation. I was also reminded of the conspiracies engaged in, by some who had been thought to be with the revolution, against the revolution both before and after independence.

[Question] It is clear that both the national and international dimensions of the Yemeni revolution are among the most important features of the revolutionary activity of the Yemeni people. This has become apparent on the national level in the basic, resolute struggle of the Yemeni revolutionary movement to achieve the unity of Yemen in terms of territory and people, since this is considered to be one of the most important strategic goals of the 26 September and 14 October revolutions. This has also been apparent on the international level in the firm strategic alliance between revolutionary Yemen and the groups of international revolutionary movements, at the forefront of which is the socialist camp which is led by the Soviet Union.

It is a firm fact that hostile forces have come to judge the orientations of revolutionary activity in your country in terms of the positions taken with regard to the cause of Yemeni unity and the alliance with the Soviet Union. Following the recent changes in your country, there was a flurry of activity against you on the part of the imperialist propaganda media. You stood up and defended yourselves against these hostile propaganda attacks.

Following all of this, we noticed that a British journalist wrote in the British magazine THE ECONOMIST: "'Abd al-Fattah favors unity and 'Ali Nasir favors unity. 'Abd al-Fattah is pro-Soviet and 'Ali Nasir is pro-Soviet. Only Socrates can tell us the real truth about them." This reveals the fact that these news media realize that your revolutionary course has been set. It also confirms the vital importance of the issues of Yemeni unity and Yemeni alliance with the Soviet Union in the course of the revolutionary struggle of the Yemeni people, led by the Yemeni Socialist Party. This is something which both annoys and alarms forces which are hostile to you. Let me take this opportunity, dear comrade, to ask you the following: What has been achieved in the realm of Yemeni unity, and how do you see the future of the necessary struggle to bring it about?

[Answer] First of all, let me point out that we had a good laugh when we read what was written by the British journalist referred to in your question. The thing that was written in THE ECONOMIST is clear proof of the extent of the inaccuracy and sensationalism which afflicts imperialist news media. These news media have reached the level where their masters have become afflicted with confusion. This has robbed the people who work in the imperialist news media of the ability to comprehend the revolutionary developments taking place in our country. For this reason, they were forced to ask Socrates for aid in their search for the truth about us. Real strength lies in relying upon the masses which no power on earth can subjugate. We, the Yemeni revolutionaries, realize very well the power of relying on the people. By using our own resources, we managed to expel both the Turkish and British invaders, we were able to bring down the royalist regime and resist the onslaught waged against the Yemeni revolution by reactionary forces, and we were able to frustrate all plots aimed at eliminating the progressive gains and achievements realized by our people.

With regard to the Yemeni national cause, I want to emphasize the fact that the reunification of Yemen is considered to be one of the vital demands of the masses. Because this is true, the broad masses of the people, from the hills of the north to Aden in the south, are the forces we rely upon in our struggle to achieve Yemeni unity.

We know that there are hostile forces which are afraid of seeing Yemen unified. They want our country to remain fragmented and they want our people to remain under the threat of foreign reactionary political domination. They hope that they will be able to intervene in our internal affairs by means of this political fragmentation of our country. But our nation does not at all intend to allow interference in its internal affairs, nor will it allow any conspiracies against its legitimate struggle to reunify the Yemeni nation.

It is impossible for our nation to adopt any political concepts which justify fragmentation and consecrate it behind a facade of security and stability. This is because true security and stability are organically tied to the achievement of Yemeni unity. Events are confirming the fact that the enemies of the Yemeni people are trying to keep Yemen fragmented in order to be able to plot against the security and stability of our nation and place obstacles in the course of our nation's tireless, legitimate struggle for social progress and a new life. This applies to the entire region and constitutes a source of constant tension which threatens the security, stability and progress of all nations of the area.

For this reason, we believe in our legitimate right to achieve social progress and reunification of our country, just as we believe in the right of any nation to choose its own course of independent development. We believe that nations having different social systems can peacefully coexist on the basis of mutual respect of national sovereignty and non-interference in the internal affairs of others.

The fact is that we have made great progress by way of realizing our Yemeni national cause. It is impossible to abandon this cause, and our enemies will not succeed in stopping its growth, unless they strip the entire Yemeni people of their patriotism.

Yemeni patriots, as well as all honorable and upright people who believe in the principles of the 26 September and 14 October revolutions, are capable of carrying out the will of the nation by means of joint action and a responsible fraternal dialogue which lead to the achievement of Yemeni unity on the basis of peaceful and democratic principles.

Experience in joint action between the leaders of the two halves of Yemen, in keeping with unity agreements and declarations, testifies to the ability of honorable and upright Yemenis to solve the dilemmas of political fragmentation in a climate free of war and tension which foreign interference tries to promote in Yemeni internal affairs.

There is still a long way to go before our country is reunited. But we have already achieved quite a bit in our pursuit of national unity. We must preserve these achievements and continue to advance along the peaceful democratic course which the leaders of both parts of our country have adopted for the sake of realizing the unity of the Yemeni nation.

[Question] Among the Yemenis in both parts of your country, you are known to be a person who combines theory with practice and does not separate between them. This has been reflected in the position you adopted with regard to the issue of unity. You were the first one to sign the unity agreement in Cairo in 1972. Some people say that your conscious enthusiasm for the unity of your nation and people has earned you the love and respect of the Yemeni masses in both parts of the country. During your last visit to San'a', you enjoyed the broad support of the masses as was apparent in the tremendous reception you received in Northern Yemen from both officials and people there. How do you explain this?

[Answer] The leader of the great October Socialist Revolution said: "There is no revolutionary movement without revolutionary theory." All practice is of necessity an embodiment of a theoretical position or particular view of life and of the world. In my opinion, there is no practice which exists in a vacuum and apart from a theoretical position. Reactionary practice is the application of reactionary theory. When the imperialists do something in practice, they are doing so in defense of the theory of capitalism. The difference between revolutionary practice and reactionary or imperialist practice is that revolutionary practice is practice which is progressive. This is because it is based on revolutionary theory, the theory of scientific socialism. When we in Democratic Yemen dialectically combine theory with practice, we merely strive to realize our revolutionary dream. This dream is the building of a society of material and spiritual abundance and prosperity which will be free of exploitation of man by man.

Our feelings about practice are also genuine when it comes to dealing with the issue of Yemeni unity. Eight years ago we had the honor of signing the unity agreement. We did not simply shout enthusiastic or emotional slogans of unity. We have transformed this slogan into practice and made it a part of our national struggle. When the 14 October Revolution occurred, it was essentially a revolution against the fragmentation which had been caused by the colonialists in the southern half of the country, and was a step on the road toward reunifying both halves of our Yemeni nation. The fact is that the unity of Yemen is regarded as being a sacred cause of the Yemeni people in the same way that the cause of socialism is a sacred cause for the Yemeni working class.

During my last visit to San'a', and, before that, during the visit of 'Abd al-'Aziz 'Abd al-Ghani, the prime minister of the northern half of Yemen, to Aden, the masses clearly demonstrated that they held unity in just as high regard as the party does. Hundreds of thousands of people came out and demonstrated in favor of unity. Because unity is a sacred cause, it deserves struggle and sacrifice on the part of all of us Yemeni revolutionaries until it is achieved. While our conscious struggle for unity has earned us the high regard and respect of the masses, it has also furthered the status of the Yemeni Socialist Party to which we belong and which is the loyal fighter for, and defender of, unity. The Yemeni Socialist Party is considered to be unionist in the composition of both its leadership and rank-and-file, and in its political, organizational, and ideological life. Our explanation for all of this is the fact that our entire Yemeni nation, in spite of present circumstances, hungers for unity.

There is no power on earth which will be able to strip the Yemeni people of the ardent desire which they have to see their nation united. No matter how long it takes, our socialist party, as well as all other democratic national Yemeni elements and forces, will continue to pursue our struggle to achieve the unity of our nation. Our opinion is that the results which have been achieved so far can be considered positive and are providing the leaders of both halves of the country with the potential to continue the peaceful, democratic struggle to bring the dawn of the day of unity closer.

[Question] What is your analysis of the displeasure shown by American circles concerning your recent visit to Northern Yemen, as manifested in provocative statements, broadcast by the news agencies, made by American sources while you were in San'a'?

[Answer] It is only natural that American imperialist and reactionary circles should be annoyed by my recent visit to San'a' and dialogue with my friend Col 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih. And you can be sure that these circles are now annoyed by the results of the visit. The results were positive and were valuable for the Yemeni nation. Why are these circles angry about the rapprochement of the two halves of the country and about Yemeni unity? The reason is simple, but is a very important one.

First of all, there is the strategic position of Yemen which holds the key to the southern entrance of the sea which is an international artery of maritime transport. Second, Yemen is close to the world's reservoir of oil which international imperialism depends upon to keep its economic machine going. Third, Yemen contains considerable human potential, a large geographical area, and national resources which gave it the potential to achieve rapid social development. Fourth, Yemen is a source of cheap manpower for the labor market. For all of these reasons, these circles are afraid of unity and of any rapprochement between the two halves of Yemen. Motivated by their own interests, they prefer to see the two halves of Yemen remain caught up in a whirlpool of tension and periodic crises.

These circles are very obviously striving and conspiring to upset the peaceful situation which exists between the two halves of Yemen and to create a rift between them, as they have done before. Imperialist and reactionary circles believe that the Yemeni patriots and revolutionaries do not see through the imperialist and reactionary game and the plotting secretly going on against Yemeni unity. We know what is being plotted in various places, and we know what was going on during our visit to San'a'. These actions on the part of the imperialist and reactionary circles clearly reveal that they do not want the Yemeni people to be united and to march along the road of progress, although they sometimes give lip service to the unification of the Yemeni people.

Yemeni unity is the fate and destiny of the Yemeni nation. Since this is true, our enthusiasm, backed by a resolute struggle, will never slacken. If some of these circles feel that it is a source of stability for this whole area for Yemen to remain divided into two parts, they should know that we will never cease striving for the unification of Yemen. This is because we believe that the existence of a united and democratic Yemen is an important factor of stability for the area, whereas the existence of two Yemens does not help to strengthen this stability. In fact it could be that such a divided Yemen, supported by these imperialist and reactionary circles, threatens such stability. Past experience has taught us a lot about this.

[Question] A few weeks ago, you made a visit to Syria and the Soviet Union. There are news reports now which say that you have decided to visit Saudi Arabia and some of the countries of the area. Could you please clarify to us the rationale of these visits in the context of Democratic Yemen's foreign policy, and could you tell us what future changes are to be expected as a result of them?

[Answer] It is well-known that our foreign policy is based on the principles of peaceful coexistence, mutual respect for the national sovereignty of other nations, and noninterference in the internal affairs of others. It is also based on the principle of a firm alliance with the international revolutionary movement in its struggle against international imperialism. It is a policy which ultimately aims at providing suitable international circumstances for the development of the revolutionary process inside our country.

It is on the basis of this premise that we view our visit to Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the United Arab Emirates. It is a visit within the framework of the efforts which Democratic Yemen is expending to achieve stability for the area and fruitful cooperation between the area's nations--cooperation based on a good-neighbor policy, mutual respect for the national sovereignty of others, and independence. In our estimation, the area right now, more than ever, is in need of stability. This stability cannot be strengthened, unless all of the countries of the area make a contribution through exchanges of visits, coordination of policy, and cooperation based on respect.

One of the motives of our program of visits to the countries of the Gulf is our legitimate concern about actions being taken by the imperialists. We have seen such actions embodied in the establishment of military bases in Oman and in the threats to use military force to intervene in the area to protect the oil interests of the imperialists and keep the oil flowing.

Their plan has become clear. It has alerted the countries of the area to the danger of the situation in the future and to the necessity of confronting it. We share the opinion of all of our neighboring countries which have expressed their disapproval of the aggressive aims of American imperialism. We add our efforts to theirs for the sake of resisting the danger of imperialism and defending the peace and stability of the area. Perhaps some circles are trying to portray the danger as coming from the Soviet Union and as resulting from the good relations which exist between it and Democratic Yemen. But these circles cannot hide from the nations of the area the true intention of the plans being hatched by the United States, which is an ally of the Zionists--the enemy of the Arab people. In any case, we hope that the results of our visit to the countries of the Arabian Peninsula and the Gulf will be a positive factor not only in the development of relations of mutual respect, but also in the strengthening of stability and averting the dangers of the plans being hatched by American imperialism.

Concerning efforts to strengthen Democratic Yemen's status on the international level, we have planned a future program to visit a number of the countries in the socialist camp. They are Hungary, Romania, Poland and the German Democratic Republic. Naturally, visits to these countries are within the scope of international activity undertaken by our country to strengthen our relations of friendship and cooperation with the countries of the socialist camp. These relations are based on revolutionary internationalism and solidarity in the battle against international imperialism and the struggle for world peace.

Prior to the visits which we are going to be making, we have already visited our fellow-Arab country of Syria and our friend, the Soviet Union. The visit to Syria achieved very valuable results for us. The most important of these results was the strengthening of our ties with Syria in our mutual struggle. Syria is a country which stands on the front lines facing both the Zionist enemy and internal reactionary forces. Under these circumstances, Syria needs the backing and support of the Arab forces of national liberation and of all Arab regimes which are eager to promote Arab solidarity. Our visit to the Soviet Union was also one which acquired special importance. This visit emphasized the fact that our relations with the Soviet Union are basic and are deeprooted, and that their foundations cannot be shaken by anyone. The visit also emphasized the fact that the Soviet Union is a loyal friend of the Yemeni people as well as of all peoples who are freedom-loving and are aspiring to have a better future.

In short, the aim of the visits we have made, and are still making, is the creative application of the guidelines set by our Yemeni Socialist Party's first congress. The goal of these guidelines is the creation of international circumstances which are favorable to social progress in our country and to a growing international process of national liberation and world peace.

[Question] There has been talk of the existence of mediation between you and the Sultanate of Oman. What is your point of view with regard to recent developments in the Gulf area. In particular, we would like to learn what your position is with regard to this mediation, in view of the fact that the Sultanate of Oman is being transformed into a military base for American imperialism?

[Answer] All right, I will tell you my frank opinion about this subject. As you know, a number of historic and geographical factors bind our country to the Sultanate of Oman. We are neighbors, and there are close social and historic ties between the Yemenis and the Omanis. It is for this reason that, as you have noticed, our relations with the Omani people are special ones. The Omani people, like our people in Yemen, have been fighting for national liberation from foreign domination. Our Yemeni people and the Omani people have been faced by a single enemy, and they have had common goals. Our revolution has been victorious, whereas the revolution of the Omani people has been confronted with some difficulties.

Naturally, the political developments which have occurred in the Sultanate of Oman were having effects reaching beyond its borders. The aim of the foreign presence in Oman was not only to prevent the emergence of Oman's independent personality and to deprive it of any essence of national independence. This foreign presence was also threatening the security of our country and our citizens. This has been proven by the attacks which the sultanate's armed forces have launched against the eastern areas of our country.

When the sultanate was confronted with the revolution being waged by the Omani people, opinions and remarks started surfacing here and there, the upshot of which was that a normalization of relations with Oman could be a contribution on our part toward removing the foreign presence from Oman. Developments took place, and we agreed to mediation by fellow-Arabs for the sake of normalization of relations on the basis that this would serve the interests of the Arab nation as a whole. We expressed our opinions about this matter, and said that return of the sultanate to the ranks of Arab solidarity, its exit from the group of nations supporting Camp David, and affirmation of the independence of the Omani people, would be important contributors to normalization of relations between us and Oman.

Recently, while we have been waiting for practical steps to be taken by this sultanate to return to the Arab ranks, we have seen it do quite the opposite. First of all, it is agreeing to grant America military facilities on its territory. Our fellow-Arabs have alerted us to the danger of the situation to the security of the Arabs. When this sultanate saw no resolute response on the part of the Arabs, it went even farther and signed a military agreement with America. According to it, some land, ports, and airports in the Arab nation of Oman have been transformed into hostile military bases to be used by the American imperialists. This not only represents a danger to our people in Democratic Yemen, but also basically represents an open challenge to the feelings and dignity of the peoples of the region. These people, due to the position taken by Oman and due to the American military bases, have come to be at the mercy of the bayonets and battleships of the Americans. In view of this how is it even possible to talk about relations between us and the Sultanate of Oman, or of what remains of the Arab mediation efforts to normalize our relations with Oman?

Oman itself has set up a barrier to having relations with us, and has been content to be remote from all Arabs to whom freedom and national dignity are dear.

[Question] What is your assessment of the situation with regard to the Palestinian revolution and Lebanon, both of which face conspiratorial plans?

[Answer] There is no doubt that the steadfastness of the Palestinian revolution and its alliance with the forces of the Arab and international national liberation movements, are among the most important factors which have helped defeat all the hostile and conspiratorial plans aimed at liquidating the Palestine cause and imposing Zionist imperialist hegemony over the Arab peoples.

We know very well that there are plans being hatched under the cover of darkness to crush the alliance between the Palestinian resistance movement and the Lebanese National Movement, as well as weaken the Steadfastness and Resistance Front. This is within the framework of the action taken by the imperialists, Zionists, and Sadat to liquidate the achievements of the Arab national liberation movement and tie the fate of the Arab peoples to the wagon of international imperialism. But the steadfastness of the elements of the Arab revolutionary movement, when confronted by all forms of conspiracy and treachery, and their alliance with the forces of the international revolutionary movement--in the forefront of which is the world socialist camp, led by the Soviet Union--constitute a firm basis for continuation of our Arab nation's struggle for liberation. This struggle is being waged against the plots and plans of the forces of imperialism and Zionism, for the sake of total liberation, social progress, socialism and democratic Arab unity.

The fact is that the Arab national liberation movement, led by the Steadfastness and Resistance Front, has already completely thwarted the conspiratorial plans hatched against the Palestine cause. The failure of the treacherous and conspiratorial Camp David agreements has emphasized the futility of any such effort which ignores the force of the Palestinian revolution and attempts to obliterate the rights of the Palestinian Arab people. Just as the American-Zionist-Sadat Camp David conspiracy has failed, failure shall also be the lot of the so-called "European initiative." This is a desperate attempt to touch up the ugly face of the Camp David conspiracy. We are confident of the abilities of our Arab peoples, led by their revolutionary forces, to challenge any such conspiracies against them, whatever form they may take.

SOUTHERN POLITICAL SITUATION DISCUSSED

Khartoum SUDANOW in English Aug 80 pp 13-17

[Text]

In appointing his new Southern Region government in June, there were many factors for President Abel Alier to take into account: the tribal balance had to be maintained; experience weighted against new talent; the faithful expected reward; potential challengers had to be nipped in the bud; and public opinion and SSU principles had to be given their due. How did the new President make out? Regional editor Jacob Akol assesses the outcome.

THE VICTORY was overwhelming: the applause was clear and prolonged; the cheers appeared genuine – the handshakes, too! Even Vice-President Abel Alier, who had so far seen more victories than failures, was visibly moved by the response from the floor and the gallery of an Assembly that, until then, had never witnessed an open contest for the highest political office in the Southern Region.

Abel Alier: juggling with the odds

Samuel Aru: he held on to the end

Logali: curtailed ambition for unity.

Clement Mboro: trouble comes singly

For Alier's opponents, it was the end of the line; but for the man, it was merely the end of the beginning. He had yet to pick his team, a task only few would envy him.

Before the dissolution of the People's Regional Assembly in December, 1977, Mr Alier said (Current affairs, Feb '78), 'We have a difficult constitutional position. If someone offers himself to the electorate and he is not elected but immediately appointed to an executive position, it worries people a lot. I have felt this... there are sacrifices either way; sacrifices for the realm of democracy and vice versa.'

As far as ministerial posts were concerned then, Mr Alier had no worries – at least, for the first six months – about what to do with Dr Lawrence Wol Wol and Mr Natale Olwak Akolawin, both of whom, while having considerable ministerial experience, failed in the latest general elections.

Nor would he have to worry about Mr Clement Mboro, for whom troubles seemed never to come singly. Although the Assembly under his leadership had challenged the Executive, he had been forced out of office long before the Assembly was dissolved last February. Then, unexpectedly, he went and made it easier for Alier by failing to get elected at the last elections.

It would, of course, be naive for the victor immediately to consider his hardened opponents for executive posts, as it would be equally absurd and a mockery of one's principles if those opponents courted such offers. That neatly eliminated Mr Samuel Aru, who had contested to the finish; as well, perhaps, as Aru's closest lieutenant, Mr Ezekiel M. Kodi.

It is thought that Mr Hillary Paul Logali was promised a ministerial post just before he withdrew his candidacy for the Presidency of the High Executive Council. If that is true, his critics will undoubtedly consider his move opportunistic, although he sounded sincere and convincing when he told the Assembly that his supporters had persuaded him to curtail his ambitions in the interest of unity. But apart from his undoubted experience and prominence in Southern politics, he holds the vital tribal balance in the Juba area. He is now the Regional Minister of Public Administration, Police and Prisons.

Dr Gama Hassan has been appointed as Regional Minister for Agriculture. Tribal balance for the Loa and Nimule could explain this choice; although it could well be on merit, for although he has his critics, they are hard put to explain their precise objections to him. What appears to be his weaknesses, are, at one and the same time, his strengths. The fact is that the Regional Ministry of Agriculture is the best organised and most efficient in the Region, although Gama Hassan's critics are likely to credit this to Dr David Basioni, the Director-General of the ministry. Nevertheless, Dr Gama Hassan's flamboyant appearance and sometimes his unorthodox and even colonialistic approach to the running of his ministry – with staff having to stand to attention when he enters an office – must have a direct bearing on any failure or success it enjoys.

For the first time ever, the Zande representatives were split over whom they should back for the Presidency of the HEC, with the group backing Alier being led by Mr Samuel Abujon. Although the election of Mr Angelo Beda as Speaker of the Assembly is supposed to have gone a long way towards soothing tribal feelings in the area, the appointment of Mr Abujon as Regional Minister of Wildlife, Conservation and Tourism, although it may also reflect tribal balance, is regarded by many as reward for devotion to Alier's leadership.

Mr Joseph Oduho retains his post as Regional Minister of Public Service and Administrative Reform, in spite of his previously outspoken opposition to Alier and his support for Joseph Lagu. His reappointment will hold the tribal balance in Eastern Equatoria, as well as defuse the potential counter-challenge from Lagu.

The appointments of Mr Andrew Wiew and Mr Martin Majier – and a number of others – to ministerial posts might be seen as the infusion of new talent, though Wiew is, of course, a seasoned politician.

Dr Zakariah Bol Deng's appointment as Regional Minister of Health was more than just the need for new talent. He has been vocal about the ambiguous administrative and constitutional position of Abyei, his home area, which, though administratively part of the north – Southern Kordofan province – remains culturally and ethnically very much part of the South.

There were, of course, those whom Alier could not easily dispense with, even if he wanted to. As Alier's former Minister of Finance and Economic Planning, Lagu's minister in the same post, as well as being his Vice-President, and then Acting President during the election period, Mr Peter Gatkuoth was well placed to contest the Presidency of the HEC. But he was tactful and far-sighted enough to shelve his ambitions – at least, for the time being – and to throw his considerable weight behind Alier early in the race. It would, therefore, have been unreasonable for Alier not to have appointed Peter Gatkuoth, who now holds the important finance and planning portfolio, as well as the prestigious Vice-Presidency of the HEC.

All considered, the announcement of Alier's initial appointments was, to put it mildly, surprising to many Southerners. This was due partly to the widely discussed reasons that were supposed to have led to Alier's and Lagu's downfalls in 1978 and 1980, respectively. Although Alier's personal credibility, honesty and capacity for hard work were never questioned, he was constantly criticised for not taking a tougher line with those ministers whose public image had become tarnished for not having those qualities.

Peter Gatknoth: tactful and far-sighted

On the other hand, Alier's supporters insisted that if Joseph Lagu had given prominence to a 'government of unity' in 1978, instead of appointing only his supporters, there would not have been a constitutional crisis. Alier was, therefore, not expected to appoint almost half the ministerial posts from ministers of his previous government. Alier's action was widely seen as a return to pre-1978 policies, an acknowledgement that he had not changed – a slight to public opinion.

However, the later appointment of Mr Bona Malwal as Regional Minister of Industry had considerable impact in softening hostility to Alier's government. Bona Malwal, an SSU politburo member and a former minister in the national government, is, in the view of many Southerners, complementary to Alier.

Empathising with this point, a close friend of both men told Sudanow: 'Alier without Malwal is like having a car without an engine. Malwal without Alier is like a car with no brakes. Put them together, and you have a smooth and safe car.' One hopes so.

But adding the experience and influence of Peter Gatkuoth and Hillary Paul Logali, there is a chance that the South may yet see a period of stability and a vigorous and realistic approach to the problems of poverty in the Southern Region. ■

Bona Malwal: no-nonsense approach to problems.

Although Regional President Abel Alier's first executive appointments were generally received with guarded disapproval by many Southern politicians, underlying their fears, Sudanow learnt, was a genuine desire to bury the hatchet and get on with the development of the Region. Last month, our Juba correspondent Arop Madut and senior reporter Alfred Logune Taban sought the opinions of nine Southern politicians based in Khartoum. Their views:

OTHWON DAK, MP: 'The election of Abel Alier should be an advantage because he brings long experience into the government with him. But we hope that he has learnt from past experience and the two years he spent out of the government, to overcome the weaknesses and mistakes of the past – I mean the choice and control of the personnel with whom he works. It appears from his recent appointments to the cabinet and the SSU Secretariat, however, that not much has been learnt.

It must be remembered that Abel Alier was rejected by the South in 1978, not because of himself, but because of other people in his government. Most of them are now back in government, and in key positions. Abel is aware of these criticisms.

Othwon Dak

This is a disappointment to the many Southerners who had thought that the problem of national unity should have been tackled right from the start. Many will now think that Abel will sacrifice efficiency and effective contribution towards the regional and national spirit to personal loyalty. All five people appointed to the Regional Secretariat of the SSU are people who failed in the recent elections.

In a democracy, popular elections are the most critical measuring device. Anybody who fails in the election is automatically assumed to have lost the confidence of the electorate. The presence of these five men is going to affect the attitude of the people towards the political system itself. We think the appointments are unfortunate and should not have been made.

Another thing: on the eve of the HEC Presidential elections, a few people were trying to sell the idea of Dinka unity. We hope Abel will remain above this way of looking at Southern politics. We know that from the beginning of his political career, Abel has been a national leader, and that he doesn't have to resort to his tribal background to gain votes. In the past, and still now, he has been a man of national stature. The question of Dinka unity as preached by these few individuals was not, we suspect, meant for Abel Alier, but for the future ascendence of the preachers themselves.'

MARKO RUME, MP: 'I don't think the South is happy at the return of Abel Alier. I was in the South when it was announced that Abel had been successful. The situation looked as though a big chief had died and the people were in mourning. In Eastern Equatoria in particular, not a single human being was happy, not even children. A good number of people came to my house to ask my opinion. I told them that I sympathised with them. I asked a group of five people why they were unhappy with Abel. They replied by asking me what Abel had done in the six years he had been in power. I replied by asking them what Lagu had done in his two years in power.

They told me about the opening of the road to Kenya; the improvement in the road from Juba to Bor; the completion of the Shambe-Rumbek road; the improvement of conditions in Juba; the improvement of the Yei-Juba road and the Juba-Yambio road, which is near completion; and the ending of school fees. Orphans could not be educated in Abel's time they told me, because of school fees.

Therefore, I don't think Abel's government will last because he has put himself in the same shoes as he was wearing before, by bringing back the same people the electorate rejected in 1978.

Secondly, Abel, naturally, is tribalistic. He appoints and promotes people from his own tribe. There are cases of Dinka boasting of their positions. There are even labourers who challenge people from other tribes, saying: 'After all, who are you? We are the rulers.' This brings clashes. Abel should have spoken to his people and stopped this.'

OSMAN GAD EL RAB (MP): 'The events of the last two years demand wise leadership which is able to reunite the badly divided people in that part of our dear country. According to my observations of Southern leaders, such a leadership can be found only in the person of Abel Alier. One hopes that he will try to rule with an iron hand this time; to instill in the minds of the people a sense of responsibility, discipline, direction and respect for public funds and property. What I mean is that those who try to tamper with public funds and property should be made to account for their actions.'

AMBROSE WOL DHAL (MP): 'During previous administrations, Southern people hoped that sustained economic development would start immediately; unfortunately, nothing concrete happened except the declaration of intentions. On the contrary, the primary concern has been all along, how to render essential services, e.g. employment, to the people. This drained away the regional budget, while the economy remained in a state of stagnation. In the end the hopes and the aspirations of the people were frustrated.

The inability of the executive to tackle the problems of development also led to a popular desire for progressive government that should fulfill the aspirations of the people. But none of the previous governments was in the mood to achieve these ends.

On the other hand, the fact that both the Alier and Lagu governments were composed of groups without clearly spelt-out political and ideological philosophies to run the affairs in the Region led to manoeuvring. The needs of the people were, therefore, not given due consideration because of the persistent power struggle between those who were in and out of the government. Consequently, the economic situation in the Southern Region worsened. This was the state of affairs when the President of the Republic dissolved the Assemblies in February.

With Abel Alier now again in charge of the affairs in the Region, one hopes that the new administration will pledge itself to streamline the speed of progress in the South. This, in my opinion, demands clear understanding of the problems involved, and coordination with the central government.

Ambrose Wol Dhal

Another matter the new government should concern itself with is the way the meagre resources available in the Southern Region are being wasted. The excessive appointments and promotions without the necessary financial resources will always end in a complete ruin in the Regional economy, which to date is entirely dependent on the grants-in-aid from the central treasury.

Anyway, without economic viability, the autonomy, which is theoretically now being enjoyed in the Southern Region, will be meaningless. The new Regional administration should give this particular aspect serious thought and guard itself against unnecessary political squabbles intended to achieve individual gains.'

GABRIEL MATHIANG, MP: 'Before the elections, Southerners were divided, and after these elections, they remain divided. Unity would have been achieved if Abel had chosen his cabinet irrespective of whether they were his supporters, or of their tribal and ethnic origins. He should have formed his government on a broad basis. Now, for example, he wants to isolate Samuel Aru and his supporters.

The South faces many problems, especially of development. Such problems need a team of dedicated and righteous ministers. One would expect Abel to work to solve some of these challenges by appointing the right men to the right jobs. The same thing is happening in the SSU. Democracy in the South is being abused by appointing people who have not been elected to the SSU. In Lakes province, people were chosen to go to the National Congress in Khartoum in January and February, not because they won the elections, but out of loyalty to the commissioner. Now it is being repeated in the Regional Secretariat.

In conclusion, I hope that despite the difficulties the Regional government is bound to face, Abel has a chance to use his vast experience to deliver the goods and services and create stability in the Regional institutions. One must wait and see the success of his government in practical performance.'

Luigi Adwok Buong

LUIGI ADWOK BUONG: 'I think that time has come for the Southern Sudan to move positively towards socio-economic development and to render to the people the services they expect of their leaders. Therefore, those who are now in the leadership in the Southern Region should come together immediately and do what they can for the people by way of development, since their differences lie only in the ways and means to achieve the accepted goals. In short, Southerners now have the opportunity to learn from their immediate past – that they will never achieve anything by fighting among themselves.

Regarding the fears that the formation of the new administration is tribalistic, though the aim might have been to strike the tribal balance, I agree that that there was a basis for such fears. But these fears will die away the very moment people begin to see their leaders in terms of what they can do for their people, rather than the tribes to which they belong.

JOSEPH NYOK ABIEL (MP): 'Despite Abel Alier's obvious successes as an elected President of the Region in 1973, the fact that some of his inner circle were allegedly accused of corrupt practices led many to have reservations about him when he asked for a new mandate in 1978. His bringing some of these people back into his government is a challenge to the public. And unless these people take this also as a challenge and show that they have changed, the public will continue to have doubts about Alier's attitude towards those he rules and those who help him to rule. If they prove the opposite of what the public currently think of them, they could be welcomed like prodigal sons.'

JAMES AJING PATH (MP): 'The loss of trust in Mr Abel Alier's administration in 1978 was due to his lack of outspokenness about his attitudes towards national issues affecting the South, e.g. integration with Egypt and the Jonglei Canal. There was a lack of public enlightenment regarding the programmes connected with these issues.

Now that the South's confidence in him has been restored, one hopes that he will exert more effort to deal effectively with the problems. The best way he can do this is to have full public enlightenment and political education through the SSU's popular and syndicated organisations.'

ELIA DUANG AROP (MP): 'It became obvious immediately after the SSU National Congress and the dissolution of the Assemblies that Abel Alier would get the post after the elections. The reasons were as follows: First, Lagu's famous February reshuffle in which he brought into his government ministers previously in Alier's inner circles and gave them the key positions of security and finance, made many supporters of the wind of change movement feel that there was no clear differences between Lagu and Alier.

The second reason was Lagu's removal of all the Dinkas in key positions in his government, his anti-Dinka attitude and his treatment of those closely related or near to Alier in the South led many to sympathise with Alier.

The third reason is that Southern politicians accepted that elections should be run under Abel Alier's direct supervision, although after that he would be a candidate for the Regional Presidency.

Fourthly, there were the unfortunate events brought against Samuel Aru Bol, one of the outstanding potential challengers; that is the £s30,000 affair and the alleged letter to Sadig el Mahdi. These allegations led many members for the wind of change group to have reservations about Samuel Aru.

These facts put together, the members of the Third People's Regional Assembly had no choice but to look for a compromising figure. But in the absence of an alternative candidate with a progressive political programme, the choice went to Abel Alier due to his personal qualities and experience.

In any case, the so-called government of participation under brother Abel Alier, which included even those who were openly opposed to his coming into power, will not make any headway. Unless Alier comes out with a radical political programme based on self-reliance, and supplies the badly-needed exemplary leadership in the South capable of putting the only resources available to good economic use, his government will fall in the same way as its predecessors.'

SOLOMONA REFUGEE CAMP DISCUSSED

Khartoum SUDANOW in English Apr 80 p 25

[Text]

The Soviet-backed Ethiopian offensive of October 1978 resulted in not less than 100,000 displaced people. Yet all except a few chose to remain under EPLF administration in Eritrea, while others stayed in the EPLF-run Solomona camp in Sudan. Victoria Brittain of the British daily paper 'The Guardian' recently visited Solomona camp. This is her report.

SOLOMONA CAMP was set up in Sudan at the end of 1978 when the Dergue began their Russian-led ground and air offensive in Eritrea. The EPLF brought out one of the most vulnerable groups in their community – ten thousand people, of whom two thirds were children including 350 orphans.

They settled them in Red Sea Province, not far from the Eritrean frontier. As the camp also includes some 2,000 handicapped people, it sounds as though it should be the most pathetic of Sudan's refugee camps. In fact, it is the least pathetic – a triumph of will-power and organisation over what most people would have considered hopeless odds.

The camp lies along the stoney banks of a wide river which is almost dry for half the year. Steep hills rise behind, bringing torrents of water racing down to bisect the camp in the rainy season. For three months the camp is isolated except for access by camel. The sandy track from Port Sudan takes nine or ten hours at the best of times.

The turning to the camp off the rutted track to Karora is unmarked. The track twists between thorn trees and bounces over boulders. The first sign of the camp is an EPLF guard post where the car is briefly checked by two men. Our driver was an Eritrean with a brother and a sister in the camp. No stranger would ever find this place as every tent and every house is camouflaged with thorn branches and mud. From one end of the camp to the other is about ten miles.

Driving up the dry river bed the first signs of the camp are the water truck filling up at the pump and electric wire strung along a line of posts, indicating the presence of an electricity generator. On a flat space next to the river a group of boys are playing football. Other children are collecting bundles of firewood.

Everyone works in this camp unless they are in hospital. Outside the orphans' school are tiny vegetable gardens growing tomatoes, beans, peppers and onions. Each one has been carefully shaded from the sun by small screens of thorn branches and is watered daily by the children. In tent classrooms the small orphans, some as young as two or three, sit in rows on smooth mud benches singing about how the Eritreans will win and how they, 'small red flowers', are growing strong to replace the older generation. The children are undeniably happy, clean, well-organised, though their classrooms have not even the simplest piece of nursery school equipment.

'That is a gun. . . this is a bomb. . . . that is a bullet. . . . that is an elephant. . . this is a hyena.' In the next tent seven-year-olds are learning English from hand-made cards. No one makes a mistake and every hand is raised to answer every time a new card is raised. The atmosphere of quiet gentle discipline would put most European primary schools to shame.

Children over the age of seven go to the 'Revolutionary School' a mile or more away down the valley. Here a new syllabus has been drawn up and the children are taught with books in Tigrinia printed in Eritrea. They also learn English and Arabic.

The headmaster explained: 'Our curriculum is quite different from the Ethiopian government one, where they concentrate on a few individuals. Here we train the children to serve the people for the future and to be able to improve the standard of living of the people. We need scientifically-trained youth. We also try always to relate all theory to practice, when teaching them engineering or science for instance. Thirdly, we encourage an attitude of comradeship and working collectively. Previously, there was no unity among them.' . . . . . .

There are a hundred trained teachers for the 2,500 children in the school, many of whose parents are still in Eritrea.

Farther down the valley lies the village of the handicapped where the first impression is that everyone is on crutches. Working with used war materials these men make high-quality cupboards with well-fitting doors and book-shelves which do not wobble. New watch straps are made from bits of canvas and broken shoe buckles. New jikas and food covers are made from used ammunition brought back from Eritrea. Since the battle of Nakfa in December they have the raw materials for weeks of carpentry work with Russian ammunition boxes piled high.

Substantial houses are being built from pieces of rock fitted together and plastered with mud. The first ones are being used for community activities in this village and they plan soon to make dormitories for the Revolutionary School. Now the dormitories are merely delineated by lines of stones in the dust and the children sleep under the stars.

But all the ingenuity and hard work will not keep these people alive and well. Fifty per cent of the 11,500 people now in the camp are estimated as malnourished by the camp doctor, who is a highly-qualified paediatrician and previously was a front-line surgeon. He has two qualified nurses, one of whom is a midwife, and a dresser working with him. The clinic takes between 200 and 340 in-patients a month and sees about 2,500 out-patients, including many Sudanese who will make several days' journey to see him.

One quarter of the patients are simply ill and weak from malnourishment. Another 21 per cent have TB as a result of malnourishment. As in most camps in Sudan TB is on a steady ominous increase month by month and there is an urgent need of effective TB drugs.

The clinic has a spotlessly clean dust-proof operating tent given by Kuwait. All babies are delivered in hospital in a special maternity tent. In another open tent, a Sudanese child lies attached to a drip. She smiled weakly as the doctor went past. 'I thought we would lose her, but now she seems to be coming back.' Her family had encamped themselves under a nearby tree, prepared to stay a week, a month.

World Food Programme dura and lentils are supposed to be the staple diet of the camp. But the supplies, which come every three months, barely last for one, according to camp officials. A protein supplement is badly needed, as is vitamin C. There were 600 serious scurvy cases in October. A gift of lemons cleared them all, but now it is beginning again. Respiratory infections numbered 800 cases last month, malaria 600 and internal parasites even more.

All these health problems, like the TB, are serious because of the underlying malnutrition which haunts the camp. All the children you look at closely show signs of anaemia in the eyes. So far, extraordinarily few show the lethargy and inability to concentrate which chronic malnutrition brings. That they do not is a tribute to the organising ability of the Eritrean Relief Association (ERA) in Khartoum and elsewhere. ■

HIGHER EDUCATION IN NEED OF REVIEW

Current State of Education

Khartoum SUDANOW in English May 80 pp 10-12, 17

[Text]

Following the clashes at the University of Khartoum in March, in which one student died and several others were wounded, there has been much soul-searching behind the closed doors of the National Council for Higher Education (NCHE) committee rooms.

For many, the events of March pose questions whose scope extends beyond the campus of Khartoum University to touch upon the whole system of higher education in Sudan. Editor Fath el Rahman Mahjoub takes a look at the current state of higher education, including further education, in Sudan.

PREDICTABLY, THE RESPONSE to March's campus turmoil was the immediate formation of a 'fact-finding' committee, formed by the chairman of the Khartoum University Council, Dr Bashir Abbadi, to look into the events. More significant was the constitution of a committee, formed by Education Minister and NCHE chairman Mr Dafalla el Haj Yousef, to investigate the general 'phenomenon of instability in university campuses.' It was a recognition of the fact that the events at Khartoum University were far from being an isolated incident.

Similar events have occurred previously, both in the University of Khartoum itself and in other institutions of higher education. Only a few months ago, the students of both Juba and Gezira universities were on strike. Clashes between students were also reported in Juba, at the Khartoum branch of the University of Cairo and at Khartoum University, while last month, technical and some university students put in a claim for increased maintenance grants – a foreboding of future unrest.

The events at the University of Khartoum are thus only a symptom of a malaise which is general. They assumed such dramatic proportions simply because they occurred in Sudan's oldest and largest centre of higher education.

This malaise is not confined to students. In February, the academic staff of the University of Khartoum went on strike, followed in March by a similar strike amid final exams by the staff of the Polytechnic, who were pressing the NCHE for terms of service on a par with those of their colleagues in the University of Khartoum.

In a statement issued early last month, the trades union of the academic staff concluded that the only way to bring the University out of 'its deep and explosive crisis' is to 'conduct a critical and overall evaluation of all aspects of university life.'

The statement accused the University administration both of contributing to the problems facing the University and of failing to face up to them. Dr Adlan Hardallo, president of the University of Khartoum academic staff trades union, told Sudanow that the Higher Education Act of 1975 deprived the university community of the right to contribute to the administration of its own institution.

'In the past the leadership was chosen through elections – now it is appointed either by the Chancellor himself or through his appointees,' he said. 'The democratic participation by the University community in the past,' he continued, 'meant that the leadership was accountable to that community and not to any outside influence. The present lack of participation results in an administration that is out of touch with both the academic staff and the students.'

Some have accused the committees formed to investigate the current problems of basing themselves on the assumption that the students, rather than higher education itself, are to blame for the instability. 'Why else would the committees be composed primarily of those directly involved in the administration of higher education?' asked one observer. It is unlikely, argue some, that those responsible for the administration of the system would be capable of objectively identifying its problems.

That higher education faces problems there can be no doubt. People point to a drop in academic standards, a lack of balance between the turn-out of professionals and that of technicians, and above all to the fact that the intake capacity of higher education is stagnant, if not falling, at a time when the revolution in general education has meant that there is a total of about two million school places compared to less than 50,000 in higher education. Furthermore, 20,000 of these places are not in Sudan but abroad. Thus, according to one senior executive of the NCHE, this year 60,000 secondary school graduates were chasing the 11,000 places annually available in higher education, compared to only 37,000 hopefuls two years ago.

The intake rates of higher education are failing to keep pace with the rising number of secondary school leavers. But more worrying is the fact that intake into higher technical institutes – which at the moment have only 3,000 places – has actually dropped from 917 last year to 902 this year.

This failure in the field of technical education is a clear case of the imbalance which exists between technical and professional education. While a source in the NCHE said that this is being rectified by directing most of those studying abroad into technical education, nonetheless, the imbalance continues to be aggravated by such factors as the brain drain and the gravitation of technicians towards the private sector in the capital rather than to development schemes in the provinces where they are most needed.

It is the pressure on higher education to expand which makes the review of, as the NCHE puts it, 'the concept, the system, laws and regulations' of higher education all the more necessary.

There is a widespread feeling that the achievements of higher education so far have failed to measure up to the amount of money spent on it. Mr Ibrahim Mohamed Osman, a director of the executive office of the NCHE, told Sudanow that the large concentration of funds on just a few thousand students makes it practically impossible to extend higher education to provide additional space for the increased number of secondary school graduates clamouring at the gates.

Certainly, there is a markedly uneven distribution of funds, with a few institutions covering only those students in Sudan using up nearly all the £s30 million budget. Of this, the University of Khartoum, with 9,000 students, receives almost half – £s14.3 million – thus occupying an undoubtedly privileged position.

Yet the budget proposals submitted by the University of Khartoum for the coming fiscal year amount to £s33 million – more than the entire budget for higher education. 'This sum,' says a member of the University's academic staff, 'is an expression of the feeling of bitterness people experience at the many shortages the University faces, particularly regarding equipment and funds for academic studies and scientific research.'

Another member of the academic staff told Sudanow that there is an acute shortage of equipment and chemicals, and that a certain department has officially announced that it is therefore becoming impossible to teach.

At present the university has 670 academic staff, 110 of whom are expatriates. There are complaints, however, that this is not enough and that the University is suffering from a shortage. 'This is because the terms of service are unsatisfactory,' continued the lecturer, 'which contributes to the brain drain to foreign universities where better terms of service are normally found. Moreover, those who stay behind get involved in part-time activities to supplement their incomes, such as lecturing at other universities and educational institutes, running private clinics or working in offices. This leaves little time to spend on students and research.'

'There is no doubt that the academic standards of Khartoum University have deteriorated,' an expatriate professor, who had returned to the University of Khartoum after a period of absence, told Sudanow. 'For example,' he elaborated, 'I used to organise 14 practicals; now I think myself lucky if I succeed in organising four. There's no equipment and no research and it's impossible for a lecturer to be of any use to his students without these.'

Much of the expense of the University of Khartoum stems from the fact that it is a residential university. Historically it grew up as such, a result of the marriage between the Sudanese attitude towards students and the British 'liberal' concept of education. The word 'student' in Sudan always implied 'somebody who is paid for.' The 'Howar' – the student of religion – used to enjoy housing and food from the surrounding community.

When the colonial administration began establishing schools early this century, to satisfy its need for local staff and technicians, hostels were built beside the class-rooms and students were supplied with food and other services. The University of Khartoum, which grew out of The Gordon Memorial College founded at the start of the century, was part of this tradition.

Such a tradition is expensive to maintain. According to Ms Aisha Hassan, students' affairs secretary for welfare, £s1.4 million of the University's budget for this fiscal year is being spent on expenses related to housing, food and other services and on already established infrastructure, such as buildings and furniture. On top of this is money spent on salaries for the vast army of service workers – 3,715 out of the University's 5,640 employees.

The new universities of Juba, established in 1977, and Gezira, 1978, are following in the footsteps of their sister university at Khartoum in the provision of services to students. A lecturer at Juba, trying to persuade the doubtful father of a student from the North that the university students do not suffer the commodity shortages of the Southern region, had to admit that food supplies for the University of Juba are specially flown in from Khartoum. Meanwhile, Prof. Mohamed el Obeid el Mubarak, Vice-Chancellor of Gezira University, expressed his concern, in an interview with the daily paper El Sahafa, that students had demanded services – such as water coolers – which failed to consider economic realities.

'The money spent on the welfare and accomodation of students and the way they are treated is far from being educative, since it does not prepare the student to be part of the life that is waiting for him outside the campus after graduation,' observed Mr Ahmed Mahdi, acting dean of students at the University of Khartoum. 'It creates dependence and lack of responsibility.'

Other government-sponsored higher education institutes pay students grants for their maintenance and the students have to look after themselves. The present maintenance grants range between £s25-30 monthly for each student.

In March, eleven students' unions whose members are subject to this grants system, submitted a memorandum to the chairman of the NCHE claiming that £s52 monthly was the minimum necessary to meet the basic daily needs of students living in the capital, given the present rate of inflation. The number of students represented by those unions is estimated to be about 3,000, which means that a total of £s1.9 million is being demanded.

However, with most existing institutions of higher education concentrated in the capital and most students coming from the provinces, it is hard to see how students' basic needs could be met, if not by the government. Mr Suleiman el Amin Abbas, president of the University of Khartoum's Students' Union (KUSU), considers the benefits enjoyed by students at the University as necessary in principle, but in practice mismanaged. 'For example,' he said, 'a cup of milk is served to every student with each of his three daily meals. Yet, when we know that a large number of Sudanese children are suffering from malnutrition, this isn't fair. We are a part of this country and its grievances, and that shouldn't be forgotten.'

By contrast, 13,000 students studying in the Khartoum branch of the University of Cairo receive no money to cover maintenance or transport costs. These students receive their education, which is free, on a part-time basis, studying between four and nine in the evening.

However, while they cost the government nothing, the civil service is generally reluctant to employ those studying at the University of Cairo. More recently, greater coordination between the NCHE and the University has changed the system entirely, so that courses are now being held during the day; which raises the question as to how the students, who used to be free to work during the day, will be able to support themselves.

The 'phenomena' and 'fact-finding' committees have yet to disclose their findings. One thing is clear however, and that is that all parties concerned have an axe to grind.

The NCHE and its chairman have expressed their concern about the 'dilemma' of higher education in Sudan. As the chairman told Sudanow, long-term policies are needed to distribute resources more fairly as a prelude to the expansion and development of higher education.

'To put this policy into practice will take a number of years, as well as resources which are not readily available now,' he said. However, without greater cooperation all round, time and resources will not be enough to resolve the present crisis in higher education. ■

Necessity of Education Questioned

Khartoum SUDANOW in English May 80 pp 13, 14

[Interview with Dafalla el Haj Yousef, minister of Education and Guidance and chairman of the National Council for Higher Education by editor Fath el Rahman Mahjoub, place and date not given]

[Text]

Events at the University of Khartoum in March put higher education in the news. In the aftermath, many people are beginning to subject the system of higher education – including further education – to the harsh light of critical examination.

Is higher education an expensive luxury, of little relevance to a poor, developing country, or does it make a valuable contribution to Sudan's economic and social development? Editor Fath el Rahman Mahjoub put this and many other questions to the Minister of Education and Guidance and chairman of the National Council for Higher Education, Mr Dafalla el Haj Yousef. Extracts from their conversation:

SUDANOW: Some people argue that the present system of higher education is simply a replica of those in developed, industrialised countries which are not suited to the conditions in, or the needs of Sudan. Do you agree with this criticism?

Dafalla el Haj Yousef: I think that this criticism is completely unfounded. It has its origins, of course, in the fact that the higher educational institutions of most developing countries were established in the colonial era and when colonialism came under attack, so too did the institutions established under its rule. Khartoum University itself was at one time affiliated with the University of London.

Since then however, four new universities, a polytechnic and several higher technical institutes have been established. Besides this, the whole policy regarding higher education has been subject to constant review, culminating in the 1975 Reorganisation of Education Act. As part of this act, the National Council of Higher Education (NCHE) was established as the body in charge of higher education. The Council clearly defined the objective of higher education in Sudan, which is to provide manpower with the necessary skills and knowledge to meet the needs of economic and social development as embodied in the six year plan.

This is reflected in the way the universities are organised – in the structure of their courses and their methods of education. The emphasis placed on preventive medicine at the Gezira University; the admission of mature students at Juba; the new faculties of natural resources at both and the attention given to extra-mural departments are just some examples of the efforts being made to integrate higher education with Sudan's environment and its developmental needs.

Q How would you estimate the contribution of higher education to Sudan's economic and social development?

A: So far, higher education has provided the professionals and technicians needed both to administer and execute development projects. Also, before the National Council for Research was established, the Graduate College of the University of Khartoum was one of the most important research institutions. Over 150 post-graduate degrees were awarded for theses of outstanding practical relevance to the needs of Sudan.

We are always trying to maximise this contribution of higher education to development, and in our cultural protocols with the different countries which provide scholarships for Sudanese students, particularly Egypt, we always emphasise that the students should study science and applied technology.

At present, we are trying to expand the existing faculties and establish new ones geared to providing the manpower capable of adopting and adapting the technology necessary for development. We are, however, facing two major problems in this. One is that there is a lack of coordination between the institutions of higher education and government departments – there is no attempt to quantify and stipulate the country's manpower needs and then plan higher education to meet those needs.

The other major problem is that of the emigration of trained manpower to neighbouring countries. If we set a target for the graduation of, for example, 1,000 doctors over a period of three years, we know that during this time 600 doctors may emigrate. So, we have to readjust our plans continuously.

Q: There has been something of a revolution in general education over the past few years. The number of pupils enrolling in primary and secondary schools has increased markedly but, at the same time, there has been no proportionate increase in the number of places available in higher education. Why is this? Are there any plans to increase the intake?

A: Certainly there has been a revolution in general education over the last ten years, with the number of pupils receiving general education almost quadrupling.

This year over 60,000 students sat for the general certificate of education and this does pose a very worrying question as regards their future as at present we have places in higher education for only 11,000 students. However, it's not true to say that there has been no increase in the number of higher education places. Two years ago, the number of students admitted was no more than three thousand but, through tremendous efforts, we managed to secure over 4,000 scholarships for students to study abroad. Meanwhile, we've been able to increase the intake in Sudan with the establishment of new universties and the expansion of the extra-mural departments of the University of Khartoum and the Polytechnic.

However, there is no doubt that we need to expand higher education further. The crucial question is one of funds. If we want to make higher education available to more people, then we have to make it cheaper. A detailed survey has been carried out by the World Bank, in addition to studies presented by the NCHE secretariat and the grants committee, with a view to reducing the cost of higher education and distributing the funds more equitably.

At the moment, we are faced with certain anomalies in fund allocation. For example, we spend a great deal on universities of Khartoum, Juba and Gezira, which are fully residential, yet very little to support students studying abroad and nothing at all for the students of the Khartoum branch of Cairo University.

Yet accommodation and transport problems in Khartoum make it impossible to make the University of Khartoum non-residential without adverse consequences for both the university and its students. The same applies to Juba, where most of the students are from the rural areas and so have to be provided with accomodation.

However, we are envisaging a long-term policy aimed at providing all universities with residential quarters and self-service restaurants, introducing a scholarship system and doing away with the preliminary year by adding a year on to higher secondary school education. To put this policy into practice will take a number of years and resources which are not readily available now.

Q: Higher education in Sudan is, it is claimed, free. But what does 'Free' actually mean? There has been some unrest among students demanding higher maintenance grants. Can you tell us what expenses are meant to be covered by these grants?

A: Higher education is, in fact, free. Facilities are available to successful students free of charge. However, again we come up against the problem of inconsistencies, as 'free' has different meanings in different institutions. 'Free' in the University of Khartoum, which has always been a residential university, means the provision of every facility – lodging, food, transport, sports facilities. On the other hand, in other institutions, such as the polytechnic, 'Free' means a monthly grant of £s25 or £s30. Grants are not meant to cover all expenses; they are meant just to help a student support himself while studying. However, when some students see others getting more, this generates a feeling of injustice.

Q: The number of students studying in higher education institutions abroad is now roughly equivalent to those studying here in Sudan Doesn't this interfere with the priorities we have set for education here?

A: The number of students studying abroad is now roughly equal to the number studying in Sudan. There is a trend towards an increase in those studying abroad at their own expense as many of the over half million Sudanese working abroad can afford to educate their children at foreign universities.

We didn't have any control over such students in the past but the NCHE has recently been designated to control all study abroad, including that undertaken at private expense. We're trying to obtain places in faculties, and scholarships that cover the specialities we need for our development in line with our overall planning for higher education. Governments which are providing scholarships for Sudan have been very responsive to our requests in this respect.

Q: What part does the NCHE have in determining academic standards and curriculum of the University of Cairo, Khartoum branch? Are you satisfied with the present relations between the University and the Council?

A: Only students with very high standards are admitted to the University of Cairo. The question of the University generally and of its expansion projects has been the subject of several discussions – in which the NCHE was involved – with the Minister of Education in Egypt. This resulted in the formation of a joint committee, whose recommendations are in the process of being implemented.

The University's expansion is fully in line with the priorities of the NCHE and building is now under way to establish a new faculty of science and to expand the faculty of commerce, to allow particularly for fields of study not available in our universities, such as cost accounting, statistics and insurance.

There is now full coordination between the University of Cairo and the NCHE.

Q: Some people say that higher education is not as democratic as it was in the past when the university community elected its own leadership. What do you say to this?

A: One of the main features of higher education is the autonomy of higher educational institutions, something which has been emphasised by the establishment of university councils, senates and academic boards.

However, some people think that this autonomy is violated by the fact that vice-chancellors and deans are appointed rather than elected. Yet it is our experience that if the vice chancellor is elected, this opens the door to factionalism and division within the university. As things stand now, the vice-chancellor is appointed by the President of the Republic, based on the nominations made by the chairman of the council of the university, presumably after due consultation with the council's members.

Q: There seems to be some reluctance among educational and governmental authorities to acknowledge the existence of political organisation within the universities and other institutions. The reality is that the freedoms granted to universities have resulted in strong political divisions which must, to a greater or lesser extent, reflect divisions in society at large. Why don't the responsible authorities admit these realities and tackle the problems accordingly?

A: Student communities all over the world tend to find themselves in opposition to the establishment. A certain amount of latitude is always allowed to students because of factors such as their age and idealism, while freedom of expression is important for students to develop their character. In developing countries, subversive elements try to exploit this freedom of expression, turning campuses into places of political division.

It's always difficult to try and draw a line between students' genuine aspirations and subversion, but the situation could be improved if strong contacts were established between students and academic staff. This could be a means of enforcing regulations which, while encouraging students to involve themselves in public affairs which will help them become the future leaders of the country, would also ensure the prevalence of discipline in the university and put an end to lawlessness and violence. ■

Places of Study

Khartoum SUDANOW in English May 80 p 15

[Text]

University of Khartoum:

Established in 1902 as The Gordon Memorial College and expanded to become a secondary educational institution in 1924, it was upgraded in 1947 to a university college with a special relationship with the University of London. By 1956, it had developed to become the University of Khartoum as it is known today.

Islamic University of Omdurman:

This was established as the Omdurman Institute of Religious Knowledge in 1912. In 1963 it was upgraded to become the Islamic College, an embryo of the Omdurman Islamic University it was to become two years later. It reverted once more to a college – the Arabic and Islamic Studies College – in 1969, to have its status as a university restored in 1975.

Cairo University-Khartoum Branch 'Foreign':

This was opened in 1955 as a branch of Egypt's University of Cairo.

University of Juba

Established 1977.

Gezira Unv. of Agri. & N. Res.

Established 1978 in Wad Medani.

Khartoum Polytechnic:

This was established in 1950 as part of the Department of Works, later to come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Education. Granted autonomy in 1965, it was, in 1975, enlarged to include institutes such as the Shambat Agricultural Institute, the Veterinary Training Institute and the Forestry Experts College.

College of Mechanical Engineering (Atbara)

Established as an Institute of Mechanical Engineering for technicians in 1971, in 1976 it was promoted to the status of college, affiliated to the Polytechnic.

College of Hygiene:

Established as the Hygiene School in 1932, it was reorganised in 1967 and renamed the Hygiene College. In 1971 it was affiliated to the then Ministry of Higher Education and Scientific Research, to be upgraded in 1976 to the status of a higher education institution, with a special academic relationship to the British Royal Academy for Hygiene Officers.

Khartoum Nursing College:

This was established in 1956 under the sponsorship of the Ministry of Health. In 1972 it was transferred to the then Ministry of Higher Education and Scientific Research. In 1976 it assumed the status of a higher education institution.

Ahfad University College for Women 'Private':

This was established in 1966 as a private institution of higher education for girls.

Institute of Music and Drama:

Established in 1967 under the sponsorship of the Ministry of Culture and Information, it became a higher education institution in 1976.

Abu Na'ama College of Agri. & N. Res.

This was founded, with the help of the World Bank, as the Abu Hagar Agricultural Institute, located near Abu Naama. It came under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Agriculture, Food and Natural Resources until 1976, when it was upgraded to a higher education institution as Abu Naama Agricultural and Natural Resources College. In 1977 it was affiliated to Khartoum Polytechnic.

Higher Inst. of Radiography & Radiotherapy:

Established in 1970 as a joint venture between the World Health Organisation (WHO) and the Ministry of Health, it became a higher education institution in 1978.

Higher Physical Education Institute:

This began life, in 1969, as a higher institute under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Education. Transferred to the then Ministry of Higher Education and Scientific Research in 1971, four years later it was moved to the Ministry of Youth and Sports. In 1978 it was upgraded to become a higher education institution.

Politics on Campus

Khartoum SUDANOW in English May 80 p 16

[Article by Abdel Rahman Abdel Rahim]

[Text]

IT IS NO SECRET that political groups are found among students in institutions of higher education. These fronts publish their own journals and organise their own political debates and rallies. And there is little doubting the influence that student politics has on the national political scene.

However, administrators have persistently refused to recognise the existence and activities of these fronts. It follows, then, that there has been no move to organise student politics into a legitimate and rational framework.

It is argued by many observers that it is this very refusal to recognise political reality that has played a major part in the crisis and tragedy in the university. Political violence finds a fertile soil in the absence of political democracy, said a leaflet published by the Khartoum University Academic Staff Association.

A number of students commented that they regarded political liberties as a necessity and something for which they were prepared to fight – indeed, have fought in the past. 'Democracy wasn't the cause of the violence. Rather, it was caused by the absence of democracy,' said Sidig el Zaila'i, the secretary of the Khartoum University Students' Union (KUSU).

The students, themselves, seem to be unfair. 'In the past, they used to agree on the basic point – the preservation of the union and of liberties on the campus,' said Professor Faisal Taj el Din Abu Shama, the deputy Vice-Chancellor. 'These liberties were provided to enable the students to study and to discuss ideas freely.'

'What is meant by these liberties is political freedom: freedom of thought but not of political activity,' he said. 'There must not be this exploitation of the campus as a centre of political activity.'

'Of course, there should be liberties,' said Adil Ibrahim Hamad, head of KUSU's executive council. 'And the rational use of these democratic rights is the only way to stop violence.'

'The promulgation of any law that prevents political activity on the campus is not in the interests of the university,' said Dr Adlan Hardallo, who is on the committee looking into the recent unrest. 'We must remember that university students are Sudan's would-be leaders.' He gave the example of the 1957 Independent Students' Committee, seven of whose members were in the cabinet in 1972. Dr Hardallo is head of the Department of Political Science at Khartoum University and president of the Academic Staff Trades Union.

Others argue that the Univeristy of Khartoum and other places of higher learning constitute a too-liberal island in what is essentially an illiberal country. Such freedoms as are found on campus, says Suleiman el Amin, president of KUSU, should be extended to people outside. Indeed, he argues, it is the possibility of genuine ideological politics that encourages political organisations – denied the possibility of expression elsewhere – to focus their activities and ambitions on the University. This, he says, partly accounts for the hard-headed conflict that led to the recent violence. Since 1973, the Union has become accustomed to the idea that to achieve any of its demands, it has to fight hard.

Nobody seems to object to the conflict of ideas within the university – indeed, isn't this one of the reasons for its existence? However, administrators are reluctant to extend the notion to include politics and they balk at the suggestion of organised, ideologically-based bodies. So, to a great extent, the leading edge of campus politics is the line between what politicised students can effectively demand and what the administration can effectively resist – a sure formula for struggle.

KUSU took an important step forward late last year when its executive committee recognised student ideological societies. This, they say, is the first step towards establishing political and ideological bodies.

Much of the political argument between students and administrators reflects inadequate resources. The University simply does not have enough money and there is, inevitably, controversy over the way in which the little money they do have is spent. The University needs new lecture theatres, new laboratories, books and better hostels – and this last is a particularly bitter issue.

Lack of finance also affects staff, said Dr Hardallo, and leads to a rush for part-time work just to be able to pay for the basics of life. Time spent outside on part-time jobs means less time spent with students or at research, with a consequent threat to both academic standards and morale.

Students also complain of too much interference from the state in University politics, which has led to a marked hostility on campus to the state. In turn, this hostility has been manipulated for national political ends, they say. In 1970, for example, the government backed the, then, left-wing supporters of the regime, against the Muslim Brothers. Then, say students, in 1973, the government turned its back on the left and helped impose a right-wing leadership on the union.

However, this role is not played by the state directly. In practice, pro-government groupings would manipulate their patronage and connections, using this to suppress their political and ideological opponents.

The government-appointed administration is interested only in defending the interests of the state – even against those of the University, said a Staff Association leaflet published in March last year. The state, it said, moves into the campus when things are going against it and goes around with slogans urging the link between the University and the community.

Students would not mind this, provided, said the KUSU president, that it meant they could openly discuss the economy, development schemes and the State Security Ordinances.

PROBLEMS OF ETHIOPIAN REFUGEES DESCRIBED

Conditions in Camp

Khartoum SUDANOW in English Aug 80 pp 9, 10

[Text]

At the conclusion of the International Refugee Conference, held in Khartoum in June of this year, both the Sudanese government and various volunteer organisations set out to lessen the burden of Sudan's refugees, largely by promoting and assisting in the attainment of refugee self-sufficiency.

Freelance journalist and photographer Lynne Barbee attended the conference and travelled to several refugee settlements. Her view:

SOME REFUGEES are still building their huts, but already tea, coffee and suwa huts are mushrooming in Tawawa. For the 6,000 refugees in this new suburban settlement five kilometres from Gedaref, the problems are not of Sudan's making, nor can Sudan fully resolve them.

The overwhelming majority of Tawawa's population is made up of rural Tigraens, displaced for the second time in their lives – forced by hunger to leave their land in the southern part of Ethiopia's poorest province, men and women found work as labourers in the fields and homes of Humera, an agriculturally rich border town just east of Gedaref. Driven from Humera by fighting between the Ethiopian Democratic Union and the Ethiopian Army in 1976, they made their way to Sudan.

The refugee slum area in Gedaref, Raba'a, burned last November, largely because the authorities failed to get the fire under control. Most of the local residents were not particularly sorry to see the refugees go – Raba'a had been a tense and dangerous neighbourhood.

Refugees in Sudan, most of whom are Eritrean and Ethiopian, are of diverse social origin – lowland nomads, highland peasants, merchants, artisans and urban professionals. Their response to survival in a strange land has often been unorthodox, and although a few are successful, most are not.

One old man in Qala el Nahal settlement had been rich in Eritrea – he owned 300 goats, 100 sheep and 80 cattle. He fled with only five cattle, but this capital enabled him to begin smuggling from his new home near the border. His butcher's stall and sesame grinding mill in the settlement were funded by his meagre accumulation of wealth from smuggling.

For many of the urban refugees, the cheque from Saudi Arabia or Europe is the lifeline, and it is often the dream of similar opportunity for themselves which motivates them to live and work in the towns.

Life in spontaneous settlements has been difficult; those in rural areas have suffered from malnutrition and professionals in the towns have often found work as tea-shop 'boys'.

From the Sudanese government's point of view, the spontaneous settlement of refugees has been a drain on the country's already overstretched resources and a waste of valuable labour, both skilled and unskilled.

'Sudan, despite its vast agricultural potential, is a developing country, and it can no longer absorb such vast numbers of refugees independent of its development plans,' said President Nimeiri in his opening address to the International Refugee Conference in June. The proposals presented at the conference are designed to integrate refugees with Sudan's overall developmental plans, while providing them with essential services and promoting self-sufficiency.

The proposals range from rural wage-earning settlements, with or without land, to animal husbandry and fishing projects; from small-scale industries to technical training centres. However, the attainment of self-sufficiency will be no easy task.

The settlement of refugees as wage-earners on government-owned agricultural schemes has encountered great difficulty (See box). Yields, and thus wages, cannot keep pace with world-wide inflation that is exaggerated by the usual infrastructural problems of a developing country. Wages on the private rain-fed farms are higher, but the season is shorter and the income still inadequate.

The government proposes to improve these conditions by distributing land to rural wage-earning refugees. Each refugee family settled on the Rahad scheme will receive five feddans. Where land is not suitable for rainfed agriculture – for example, at the El Suki scheme, each family will get 1½ feddans for an irrigated vegetable garden.

However, even on the land-based settlements of Qala el Nahal and Um Gargur, yields have been as low as ten sacks of dura for ten feddans of land. The lack of spare parts, cash and sufficient food led to late planting and poor yields. In Qala el Nahal, the refugees went to work on private farms to earn cash to pay for the ploughing of their fields. Circumstances forced some refugees to sell their harvests early at reduced prices. Explained one man from Um Gargur: 'When the time comes to weed my land, I haven't any food to feed my family, so I have to go to work for cash.'

Refugees, like everyone in Sudan, suffer from the consequences of national transportation problems. World Food Programme rations of powdered milk sat on the docks at Port Sudan for seven months, and so the refugees diet was restricted to sorghum, fat and beans.

Even with the milk, 'they receive maintenance rations,' said one expert, 'and it is debatable whether or not these rations are adequate to maintain the health and strength of agricultural workers.' More dura will not really resolve the problem – according to one conference delegate, 'the refugees need a balanced diet containing protein, vitamins and iron if they are not to fall victim to diseases such as malaria and tuberculosis.'

Refugees who have settled spontaneously in the urban areas have little or no access to assistance for food and shelter, but they are reluctant to be transferred. They have come to Sudan with the hopes of an education and an opportunity to use their skills. The Refugee Orientation and Counselling Service in Khartoum is able only to scratch the surface of the needs of urban refugees. According to Annemarie Russell, Social Consultant at the Service, most of the refugees are seeking further education. Given the difficulty of finding jobs in Sudan that are appropriate to their skills and ambitions, they see more schooling as the means for success in the future. Although proposals such as technical training centres may help refugees in the long run, there is little hope for self-sufficiency in the immediate future.

'The most important thing is that refugees do things for themselves,' said one conference delegate. 'Without participation, the best funded and organised project will flounder on the apathy which arises when refugees feel they have no control over their lives.'

Refugee self-sufficiency is in the best interests of both the refugees and the people of Sudan. Project proposals presented at the Refugee Conference are a beginning, but to see them fully implemented will take time and great effort. As Mr Neil Marten, head of the UK's delegation to the conference, said, 'The conference is over, and now the work must begin.' ■

Lack of Necessities

Khartoum SUDANOW in English Aug 80 p 11

[Text]

Refugee settlements in Sudan have met with varying degrees of success. The plan for Km 26, a camp in the New Halfa area, sounds good in theory. In practice, however, both refugees and authorities have run into considerable obstacles:

WHEN THE HIGH Commissioner for Refugees met with New Halfa authorities to discuss the settlement of refugees around New Halfa to provide labour for the agricultural scheme, two sites were suggested. Only one, Km 26 Village, was found to be suitable.

Km 26, first established in March 1977, took in additional refugees in April 1979 and January 1980, making its current population 4,500. The last group of refugees, brought from Kassala, has been temporarily resettled in tents and makeshift housing. Although a filtration plant is now under construction, the refugees' drinking water presently comes untreated from the New Halfa Canal. The refugees have one equipped classroom, a dispensary and a flour mill.

The settlement was designed to provide manpower for the New Halfa Agricultural Scheme, which produces cotton, groundnuts and wheat. Although the New Halfa Scheme Corporation claims that it can employ 10,000 workers on the scheme of 350,000 feddans, the Agricultural Director of the scheme, Mr Ramses Aziz Mekhail, asserts that, 'We really need 18,000 labourers, employed throughout the year, to work the cotton and groundnuts, and an idle capacity of 40,000 workers.' 'Idle capacity' workers need to be available only during harvest time.

A small number of refugees are self-employed within the settlement as grocers, barbers, tailors, coffee- and tea-shop owners and merchants. Most find employment at the scheme.

The demand for labour, however, seems to be unsatisfied – 30 per cent of this year's cotton crop never left the fields.

'The majority of refugees refuse to pick cotton within the scheme, despite the fact that the corporation is paying adequate sums and facilitating transport and food,' said Taj el Sir Abdel Gadir, Director of the Dibaira section. Potential employment for both skilled and unskilled workers at the cotton ginning factory and a nearby sugar factory has also been ignored by most of the refugees.

It seems that there are several reasons why the original plan to employ refugees within the scheme is not working. Eritreans, who make up the majority of refugees at Km 26, are classified by the corporation as city people or village farmers; obviously, the latter are preferred. The urban refugees are considered unsuitable for agricultural work by themselves as well as by the concerned authorities.

At the International Conference on Refugees, refugee self-sufficiency was promoted as the primary goal of both Sudanese government and volunteer organisations involved in refugee aid. But because there is insufficient rainfall to make rainfed agriculture possible, there are no plans to allocate land to the refugees; the inhabitants of Km 26 can only seek wage-based, or dependent, employment.

The Settlement Project is developing a vegetable plot, irrigated by the New Halfa Irrigation Scheme and worked by both Project and refugee labour, which will allow the refugees partial self-sufficiency. However, it seems that the denial of total self-sufficiency, immediately or in the future, is a deterrent to the motivation of potential workers.

The health of the refugees in Km 26 is also a factor. Aside from intestinal disorders caused by unfiltered drinking water, many refugees complain of inadequate diet and medical care.

'At first, aid was presented every five days, then every fifteen days, and now it is once a month,' complained Osman Mohamed Mahmoud, the father of six children.

'We need soap, tea, sugar, coffee and vegetables,' said Halima Musa.

The usual transport delays directly affect the refugees, as World Food Programme and UNHCR rations rarely arrive on time. They are also in need of a car for emergencies and a refrigerator for storing medicines.

On the other hand, authorities complain of the refugees' laziness and inadequate security at the camp.

Outside the walls of Km 26, the acceptance of the refugees by the inhabitants of surrounding communities has been limited due to cultural differences and resentment based on the shortage of commodities. Within the settlement, there are occasional skirmishes between Ethiopians and Eritreans which have forced the authorities to hold raids. Some of the refugees leave the camp without permission to wander about the town.

There is a police station in Km 26, but officers complain that they lack the facilities to deal with the anticipated disputes between Arab nomadic tribes and refugees.

'As more refugees appear, security measures should be increased,' said one officer. 'We need better guns, a car and contact with our headquarters,' continued the policeman, who is one of a force of six policemen and one corporal who guard the camp.

The problems of Km 26 are jointly the fault of the authorities, who, in the absence of available background data, miscalculated the potential success of the plan and the importance of self-reliance to the refugees; and of some of the refugees themselves, who, because they are uncertain yet desirous of that self-reliance, have refused to work in the jobs offered them.

With the expertise and information now available in Sudan, it is hoped that exisiting settlements might be restructured and future settlements planned with the mistakes of the past taken into account and the goal of refugee self-sufficiency taken to heart.

LAND DISAPPEARING DUE TO DESERT CREEP

Khartoum SUDANOW in English Aug 80 pp 49-51

[Text]

Much of northern and western Sudan is desert, and more and more of the country disappears beneath the blowing dunes each year. Apart from the threat to agricultural land, desert creep also poses a real problem to the tribes of nomads who eek out a living in the tundra areas just below the desert belt. In spring this year, Mike Asher visited Mellit, Northern Darfur, and found out just how extensive the problem was and what measures were being taken to combat the desert menace.

THE TRADITIONAL way of life of the nomadic tribes of northern Sudan is being threatened; not, as in Saudi Arabia, by the advance of modern technology, but by the increasing aridity of their own environment. Government forestry officials in Mellit in Northern Darfur have been worried for some time about the rapid rate at which the desert is moving south, destroying much of the traditional grazing lands of the tribes of Northern Darfur and Northern Kordofan.

The rate of 'desert creep' is estimated at between five and ten kilometres annually; and officials say that between 1958 and 1975, the desert moved at least 100 kilometres further south. This encroachment has had a devastating effect on the Kawahla, whose livelihood depends upon finding sufficient grazing for their sheep and goats. Many Kawahla families have moved further south, or fled into Chad.

Tribes which depend to a greater extent upon camels, such as the Meidob and Zayadea, are in a happier position, since the camel is more able to tolerate the harsher conditions. Yet even these tribes have not been unaffected. Much of their stock has died due to the lack of fodder and water-holes. Many young Meidobis have gone to seek their fortunes in oil-rich Libya, leaving fewer men to nurse the existing herds, the numbers of which have declined markedly as a result.

Some tribesmen say that the answer lies in digging more 'donkeys' – the local name for artesian wells. But, as Mr Farah Yousif Suleiman of the forestry department in Mellit points out: 'Digging more wells is not a solution to the problem. Too many water-points in a restricted area only exhausts the soil more quickly.'

Meanwhile, the situation for the nomads only worsens: the Zagawa tribe for example, until recently living the life that their ancestors had led for centuries, have now been forced to look for work in the larger towns. Indeed, the Zagawa now account for some 40 per cent of the settled population of El Fasher, with many of them working as casual labourers and traders. Zagawa have also settled in Fataburne, Kutum, Tino, Kena and Umbau.

Some isolated patches of vegetation which have escaped the great shift of the desert have inevitably become highly prized and much sought after by local tribes. The largest of these is on the western side of Jebel Meidob, near Hellif, Jebel Esa, El Hara, Seleif and in Wadi Howar, in Northern Darfur. Here the Meidob have come into conflict with the Awajda clan of the powerful Kababish, with the Awlad Jerbe' section of the Zayadea, and with the Kawahla. In the past, disputes over ownership rights have led to violent armed clashes between the tribes and to camel-raiding; but local officials say that the situation has been peaceful lately.

However, successive years of drought have aggravated the problem, so that even settled tribes such as the Berti, have been forced to move. The entire population – save only the sheikh and his assistant – of the Berti village of Hashaba has moved to Libya. As with the nomads, the Berti have learnt that the shift to the city and employment as labourers was the only way to survive.

'This desert creep is a problem affecting not only Sudan, but all the countries of North Africa,' said Mr Farah Yousif. 'But what the nomads don't realise is that it is their own method of using the range lands which is helping to create the situation.'

There is a dispute among experts as to the precise cause of desert encroachment, but it seems likely that it is a combination of a number of factors.

'The goat has a lot to answer for,' continued Mr Farah Yousif. 'It not only defoliates, but destroys roots, which means that plants cannot renew themselves. The land is used continuously for so many years that it becomes exhausted, and as the nomads move south they take the problem with them.'

Both underground and surface water have decreased in proportion to the number of animals using it, and the presence of large belts of non-water-holding, or plutonic substrata means that there are additional problems in digging wells.

Deforestation is a direct cause of desert creep; trees have been cut down in regions where new growth is at best uncertain; and in Kordofan, large patches of forest have been removed to establish arable land. Acacia forests have also been destroyed accidentally by fire, usually because of carelessness by the nomads at their camp-sites.

Such drastic deforestation means that there is no barrier against the kataha – the shifting sand which sweeps across the desert, particularly between November and March, and which may raise the level of sand in a village by as much as 2.7 metres a year. The habit of some herdsmen, of burning off the dried gesh or straw, so that a new crop will grow more quickly, also helps to exhaust the soil.

'The encroachment of the desert has far-reaching effects beyond destroying the livelihood of the nomads,' said Mr Farah Yousif. 'The unstable, mobile dunes have obliterated many feddans of cultivated land and covered settlements even along the banks of the Nile.' Thus, it has led to a decrease in the production of millet, sorghum, groundnuts, sesame and the valuable gum arabic. It has also reduced the amount of timber available for fuel. 'Ten years ago,' went on Mr Farah Yousif, 'you could find wood within ten kilometres of Khartoum, but now you'd have to travel 500 kilometres.'

The question now is how to prevent the problem from becoming even greater. As usual, the difficulty is finance; or, rather, the lack of it. In Libya, the dunes are being stabilised by the use of waste products from the oil industry, of which the Sudan still has none. Expertise in forestry is, however, not lacking. There has been a well-established forestry school since the 1930s. 'As always,' said Mr Farah Yousif, 'we have the brains, but not the money.'

He believes that the problem can be solved by a careful programme of planting and cutting. Firstly, however, cultivation methods must be improved, and schemes for the conservation of water and grazing established. The only way to prevent soil exhaustion is to introduce rotation grazing, and this can be put into effect by the establishment of grazing cooperatives.

The government has plans to set up mechanised schemes at Umm Bayuda Sag el Narem, where the soil has high fertility, and where pumps may be used for irrigation. The idea is to settle some of the tribes there and to allocate land to each family. But here again, the problem is one of money.

Forestry men like Farah Yousif believe that the ranges must be intensively seeded so that the sand dunes become afforested and stabilised, developing shelter belts to hold back the invading kataha.

If this can be achieved, then plant and animal life can be made to renew itself indefinitely; but this can be brought about only through cooperation between organisations and governments, and by the spread of knowledge among people everywhere about the delicate balance of their environment.

'What people must understand,' concluded Mr Farah Yousif, 'is that we are not trying to conserve nature against man; but actively and practically to conserve resources for man himself.'

The efforts of men like Farah Yousif and the forestry departments of the world may not be able to save the traditional way of life of the nomad, but with the proper application of skill and experience they may yet be able to halt the juggernaut advance of the desert monster and thus achieve something worthwhile for the benefit of all. ■

ROADS, BRIDGES BUILDING PROGRAMS DISCUSSED

Khartoum SUDANOW in English May 80 pp 31, 32

[Text]

Historically one of the most neglected aspects of infrastructural development, roadbuilding has gone a long way over the past five years as politicians and planners have gradually come to realise the importance – both economic and political – of a national, integrated road system linking the main regions of the country.

Much of this building has been concentrated on linking the central Nile area to Port Sudan. But other roads are turning to the South and the West. Senior reporter Berhane Woldegabriel reports:

MORE THAN ONE MILESTONE was passed last month in the road-building programme designed to link the capital, the main central Nile towns and Port Sudan. On the 9th of the month, President Nimeiri inaugurated the 227 km Gedaref-Kassala stretch of the main Khartoum-Port Sudan highway. The ceremony included a symbolic journey to the village of Umm Shajara, some 15 kilometres from Gedaref.

This stretch of the road – like the whole highway, seven metres wide – was built by the Yugoslav engineers, Partizanski Put, at a total cost of £s31.9 million. There were two separate contracts – both won by the Yugoslav company. The first was for the road itself; the second, for two major bridges: a 310-metre bridge across the River Atbara, and a 150-metre bridge across the River Gash at the entrance to Kassala

The contracts were signed in May 1975, and completed after almost exactly five years to the month. Even then, the contract was not finished on time, and last month officials were reeling off the, by now, all-too-familiar list of problems that bedevil major development projects: lack of transport, fuel shortages, random power cuts and delays in the transfer of hard currency through the Bank of Sudan.

Financing for both road and bridges came in part from the government, who provided £s13.7 million; the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development gave a hard currency loan equivalent to £s18.2 million. This loan was made in two parts, with Partizanski Put receiving the final instalment only last month, the delay reportedly due to still outstanding debts to the Fund from Sudan. A second loan of four million Units of Account came from the African Development Bank.

There is a guarantee period of one year following completion of the road and bridges, after which the RBPC is responsible for maintenance. Since the road has been handed over to the Corporation in stretches, the guarantee period has in many cases already been passed, and the road is being maintained by the RBPC.

'Traffic counts conducted by the RBPC last December showed an average of 631 vehicles a day using the road. This included a good number of lorries and trailer trucks,' said Mr Abdu Mohamed.

Partizanski Put's project manager, Mr D. Jovanovic, became almost sentimental when he spoke of the strength of co operation among the 250 expatriate and 900 Sudanese staff involved in the construction work. Between them, he said, they had moved more than seven million cubic metres of earth while building the 107-kilometre road and the eight smaller bridges on it. Some 20,000 tons of asphalt and bitumen – about 85 tons for each hard-earned kilometre – were imported specially for the project.

Local people seemed pleased with the finished product. 'During the wet season,' said Mr Ahmed Musa, a driver from Umm Shajara, 'it used to take us all day just to drive into Gedaref. The 15 km journey now takes a quarter of an hour.'

The first stage – from Wad Medani to Sennar – of the 217 km road from Wad Medani to Kosti was opened by the President on the 22nd of last month. The new road will link centres of agricultural production and population with the main highway linking the capital with Port Sudan. It will also serve as the first step in a series of strategic roads linking the central region to the Nile towns in the south, and to the west and beyond.
